The Chinese Heritage Centre was established in May 1995 to promote knowledge and understanding of people of Chinese descent outside China and their heritage through research, publications, conferences and exhibitions. It also houses the Wang Gungwu Library which has a specialized focus on the Chinese overseas and their heritage. As the first organization to specialize in the study of Chinese communities outside China, it is most appropriate that the Centre be housed in the former Nanyang University's historic Administration Block, which itself is a relic of the landmark establishment of the first and only Chinese-medium university outside China founded by the ethnic Chinese.

The Institute of Southeast Asian Studies (ISEAS) was established as an autonomous organization in 1968. It is a regional centre dedicated to the study of socio-political, security and economic trends and developments in Southeast Asia and its wider geostrategic and economic environment. The Institute's research programmes are the Regional Economic Studies (RES, including ASEAN and APEC), Regional Strategic and Political Studies (RSPS), and Regional Social and Cultural Studies (RSCS).

ISEAS Publishing, an established academic press, has issued more than 2,000 books and journals. It is the largest scholarly publisher of research about Southeast Asia from within the region. ISEAS Publishing works with many other academic and trade publishers and distributors to disseminate important research and analyses from and about Southeast Asia to the rest of the world.

Foreword

This is a bold project recording the lives of a particular group of Southeast Asians in a distinctive framework. For more than a hundred years, various writers ranging from trade and government officials to journalists and scholars have studied the traders and workers from South China now spread around the world. Most of those adventurous people left China and headed towards neighbouring ports, kingdoms and colonies that are now recognized as a single geographical entity, hence the grouping in this volume of the lives that have contributed in their various ways to the new Nanyang, the strategic region of Southeast Asia.

If the authors of the biographies had to trace their respective subjects back to an earlier past, they would have been confronted by many different names for these merchants and adventurers overseas. For example, Europeans like the Portuguese, Dutch and English followed those in the Malay Archipelago by calling them China or Chinese, while they would normally refer to themselves as Tongyan, Denglang or Tangren 唐人. In China, they would be described as MinYueren 闽粤人, people from Fujian and Guangdong and, for a while under the Mongol Yuan dynasty, they were known as Nanren or southerners 南人; later, they were likely to have been referred to as the subjects or chenmin 臣民 of the Ming and Qing dynasties. Locally, in Southeast Asia, there were also a variety of names, like the Baba or peranakan for Chinese whose first language was Malay; and there were others like the Lukchin, the Sangley and the Hoa among those who lived alongside the Thais, the Filipinos and the Vietnamese. Chinese records rarely recorded the achievements of individuals and were not always polite when referring to those outside China, often purposely emphasizing the illegal status of those who had left their homes in China without official permission.

Most of the people whose biographies are included here have settled down in the ten countries that constitute the region. Each of them has either self-identified as Chinese or is comfortable to be known as someone of Chinese ancestry. There are also those who were born in China or elsewhere who came here to work and do business, including seeking help from others who have ethnic Chinese connections. With the political and economic conditions of the region in a great state of flux for the past two centuries, it is impossible to find consistency in the naming process.

Confucius had stressed that correct names make for the best relationships. In this case, Professor Leo Suryadinata has been pursuing for decades the elusive goal of finding the right name to give to the large numbers of people who have, in one way or another, made their homes in, or made some difference to, Southeast Asia. I believe that, when he and his colleagues selected the biographies to be included here, they have taken a big step towards the rectification of identities for many leading personalities. In so doing, he has done us all a great service.

I notice that he has modestly not included a biography of himself in this volume. Allow me therefore to say a few words about how he meets the criteria for entry into the volume splendidly, and also why I am proud to be associated with his lifework. I had the fortune to meet Professor Surydinata when he first embarked on his lifelong study of the Chinese in the Malay Archipelago. He has always been in a good position to capture in his writings the ambiguities that surround his subject of research. Born in Indonesia of Chinese parents, speaking and writing Bahasa Indonesia fluently, and fully immersed in the lives of those who have long settled in the country, he was formally educated in a Chinese school. The school was one that originally set out to redefine an identity that would fit in with the strong modern state that the new generation of Chinese leaders was building in China. After World War II, however, the school went through a time of radical transitions. Hard choices, therefore, had to be made. His arrival in Singapore to study at the newly established Nanyang University brought him deep into the heart of one of those transitions. This was a time when Chinese who faced the rise of new nations were asked to differentiate themselves from a revolutionary China that was beginning to sow alarm among its smaller neighbours.

That was more than 40 years ago. From the start, he faced a world of social discontinuity, political uncertainty and cultural transformations. It is no wonder that he was drawn to the study of nation building in Indonesia, to the political awakening of two generations of leaders both civil and military, to a sensitive understanding of the media and the country's opinion-makers, and to the thinkers and the creative writers and artists who were all struggling to ensure that a great nation would emerge out of the multiple challenges of decolonization, nationalism and Cold War ideological confrontations. At the same time, he could not but be troubled and fascinated by the special position of those of Chinese descent, the millions who were torn three ways by conflicting loyalties: the pull of their ancestral home, the temptation of their Dutch mentors' refuge, or the nascent patriotism inspired by the new Indonesian nation.

Professor Suryadinata was always interested in the study of literature and history and this interest took him to the subject of prominent people who had made their mark in the transition years from the Dutch East Indies to the Republic of Indonesia. It was therefore not surprising that one of his first published writings was on prominent Indonesian Chinese in the twentieth century (1972). A few years later, he completed his first collection of biographical sketches, a work that has received much deserved attention and one that he has updated and reprinted several times. In short, he has had the subject of personalities on his mind for a long while. For this volume, he has persuaded many others to join him, not only in telling fuller stories about so many lively personalities all over the region, but also to determine more precisely what is remarkable about the variety of Southeast Asians who can be identified by their Chinese descent.

When he retired from the National University of Singapore and the Institute of Southeast Asian Studies and was appointed Director of the Chinese Heritage Centre in 2005, Professor Suryadinata saw his chance to achieve the goal he set for himself. By careful selection of the personalities here, he provides a larger picture of men and women whose distinctive lives gave them a place in the history of modern Southeast Asia. That makes his a landmark study. I know no one better positioned than he is to produce this collective volume. And while it gives me great pleasure to commend this pioneering work to the reader, I know that he would see it but as a beginning. He would be the first to say that there are many other personalities who could have been included if only we knew more about their lives. Let me join him in hoping that future volumes will follow when more data and documents become available and more scholars are ready to tell the stories that are not in this dictionary.

Acknowledgements

This book is a collective effort rather than an individual venture. It would not have been written and published without the cooperation of many scholars, writers and friends. First of all, I would like to express my deep appreciation to the 176 writers of this book for their valuable contributions. I would also like to thank the country editors for their efforts and the panel of international advisers for their comments and advice. I am particularly grateful to Professor Wang Gungwu, chairman of the panel of advisers, who has been very generous in giving me his valuable advice, encouragement, support and writing a Foreword for this book.

I would also like to express my gratitude to Professor Tommy Koh, former chairman of the Chinese Heritage Centre (CHC), for inviting me to be the director of the CHC which gave me the opportunity to further develop my interest and research, and Professor Su Guaning, successor of Professor Koh, for his continuing support. Without the resources of the CHC, this project could have not been undertaken.

My sincere thanks also go to the former and current staff members of the CHC — Lim Boon Hock, Kwan Siu Hing, Ang Cher Kiat, Ho Yi Kai, Goh Yu Mei, Cheong Wai Yin, and Chew Kiat Yin — who helped me in this project. Special thanks also go to Dr Kevin Y.L. Tan and Dr Michael Montesano, who gave me special assistance when it was badly needed.

I want to record my deep appreciation to Mrs Triena Ong, Managing Editor of ISEAS Publishing, for her expert advice and kind assistance in editorial and publication matters. I would also like to thank the Lee Foundation and the Singapore Hokkien Huay Kuan for their generous grants for the project.

Lastly, while thanking all the authors for their valuable contributions again, I would like to state that they are responsible for the facts and the interpretations in the entries that they have written.

Introduction to Southeast Asian Personalities of Chinese Descent: A Biographical Dictionary

Leo Suryadinata

It is estimated that about 75 per cent of the ethnic Chinese outside China live in Southeast Asia. The Chinese Heritage Centre, established in 1995, is located in Singapore, one of the Southeast Asian states. It is thus understandable that the ethnic Chinese biographical project of the Chinese Heritage Centre started with this region. The biographical dictionary was conceptualized when I was invited to head the Chinese Heritage Centre in 2006. Most of the available publications (see references) at the time were mainly ethnic Chinese biographical dictionaries on a few individual countries, ethnic Chinese historical figures of individual countries, or biographies in a special field. Only three titles — all in the Chinese language — attempted to cover Chinese overseas all over the world (including Southeast Asia).

The first one, Shijie Huaqiao Huaren Cidian (世界华侨华人辞典，English title: Dictionary of Overseas Chinese), was edited by Professor Zhou Nanjing and published in 1993 by Peking University. The 1025-page book includes entries of overseas Chinese organizations, names and contents of publications related to Chinese overseas and biographies of leading Chinese overseas. Strictly speaking, it is not a biographical dictionary. The entries of the figures were very brief. Prof Zhou in 2001 edited and published another book, Huaqiao Huaren Baike Quanshu Renwu juan (华侨华人百科全书：人物卷，Encyclopedia of overseas Chinese: biographical volume), focusing on biographies of prominent "overseas Chinese" from all over the world. It was an ambitious and a pioneering publication. The publication is a major improvement of the previous one, but due to difficulty in gathering relevant information in China, the entries were mainly based on secondary sources and the write-ups were still very brief, they are mainly biographical sketches. Some sections on Southeast Asian countries were poorly researched and the information was also dated.

An overseas Chinese organization in Taiwan in 2000 published Huaqiao Da Cidian (华侨大辞典，A Large Dictionary of Overseas Chinese) which also attempted to present biographical sketches on the overseas Chinese in the world, but it is a much smaller number of entries than that of Beijing's publication, and more limited in the countries covered. Worse still, the emphasis tends to be on those who are affiliated with Taiwan. There is hence a need for a more detailed, informative and up-to-date publication in English on Southeast Asian Chinese personalities such as a biographical dictionary on twentieth-century ethnic Chinese personalities and beyond. Unlike some dictionaries which include only dead figures and the volumes of Who's Who listing only living individuals, this CHC biographical dictionary includes both the dead and the living. The purpose is obvious: to help the readers understand modern and contemporary Southeast Asia in which personalities of Chinese descent have played significant roles. Hopefully, readers and researchers will be able to get a clearer picture of modern/contemporary Southeast Asia and their personalities of Chinese descent from this biographical dictionary.

To start the project, I began to identify scholars and writers in the relevant fields. Some Southeast Asian countries have more experts than other Southeast Asian countries. Nevertheless, we were able to have a good team to begin with. Many of these experts were invited to come to the CHC for a brain storming sessions for a day to construct a basic framework. We also started to appoint country editors but the process was not very smooth as a few invitees were busy and declined to accept. After several attempts, the country editors were appointed. Country editors of Malaysia, Brunei, the Philippines, and Indonesia were the first to organize their respective committees followed by other country editors. Each country editor and his/her editorial committee came up with a list of contributors to be invited. As the project started moving forward slowly, a panel of international advisors led by Professor Wang Gungwu was also established.

In the brain-storming sessions, we discussed some of the basic concepts and frameworks of the biographical dictionary. However, as these are complex issues we were unable to resolve all. The following are based on my discussions with other scholars beyond the one-day brain-storming sessions. When there were disagreements I made my own decisions. The first major problem we faced was to come to grips with the definition of "ethnic Chinese" or "person of Chinese descent". How does one define an ethnic Chinese, or a person of Chinese descent? There are no easy answers. One way is to find out whether a person has/had a Chinese name. Those who have/had Chinese names are very likely to be ethnic Chinese. Leaders or members of Chinese organizations/associations are likely to be Chinese. But what about the descendants of those who intermarried with non-Chinese? If the father is Chinese and the mother is non-Chinese, the Chinese identity is usually preserved by their offspring (e.g. among the peranakan Chinese, especially those in Malaysia and Singapore), but if it is the other way around, the descendants are likely to be absorbed into the non-Chinese community.

In the case of those who no longer keep their Chinese names, it is more difficult to tell whether they are ethnic Chinese/persons of Chinese descent. The Chinese have lived in Southeast Asia for centuries and many have been assimilated and absorbed into the so-called "indigenous" communities. However, there are many who are only partially acculturated and still identify themselves as Chinese. Some have assumed a different nationality or nationalities but continue to regard themselves as being of Chinese descent. Therefore, while Southeast Asian Chinese share a common ancestry, they may not share the same culture. To determine whether a person is an ethnic Chinese/of Chinese descent, one often has to rely on self-identity, especially in the case of those who are still alive. If a Southeast Asian person of Chinese descent refuses to identify with the Chinese community, the person is not included in our selection. This is out of respect for the individual who identifies himself/herself completely with the "indigenous" community and no longer wishes to be regarded as ethnic Chinese or of Chinese descent.

It is also important to note here that many Southeast Asians of Chinese origin have been localized and even indigenized, and are reluctant to be called "ethnic Chinese", let alone "Chinese overseas" or "overseas Chinese". They claim to be Thai, Filipino/Filipina, Indonesian, Vietnamese, or Burmese/Myanmar, etc. Nevertheless, with the end of the Cold War and the rise of China, many of these Southeast Asians have openly admitted that they are of Chinese descent, e.g. Thai of Chinese descent, Filipino of Chinese descent, Indonesian of Chinese descent etc. In order to include this group of personalities, we use the term "Southeast Asian personalities of Chinese descent" rather than "Ethnic Chinese of Southeast Asia". In this usage, the former term includes both ethnic Chinese and persons of Chinese descent.

As a matter of fact, in China today, there are three Chinese terms, viz. Huaqiao 华侨, Huaren 华人 and Huayi 华裔, which may be used to refer to different kinds of "Chinese". "Huaqiao" refers to Chinese citizens who are sojourning overseas. "Huaren" refers to ethnic Chinese who are foreign citizens outside China, while "Huayi" refers to non-Chinese citizens who are of Chinese descent but have lost their Chinese culture. Such usage often does not coincide with the Southeast Asian Chinese usage, however. The Southeast Asian Chinese use "Huaren" to refer to those Chinese who were local born or even foreign-born but have lived and identified themselves with the local Chinese. Southeast Asian Chinese also use Huayi to refer to Chinese who have foreign (read: non-Chinese) citizenships regardless of their cultures. Many do not speak, read and write Chinese and are highly "indigenized".

Owing to the above reasons, in order to include a wide range of Chinese in Southeast Asia, we have called this biographical dictionary Southeast Asian Personalities of Chinese Descent, not "A Biographical Dictionary of Ethnic Chinese in Southeast Asia".

The term "Southeast Asian Personalities" rather than "Southeast Asians" is used for the following reasons: The leading figures included in this dictionary are not all Southeast Asians in terms of citizenship/nationality. As the nationality law of China was only introduced in 1909 and many Chinese in Southeast Asia before the second half of the twentieth century were of dual nationality as the law in China claimed all Chinese overseas as nationals of China while the colonial powers claimed local-born Chinese as their subjects. However, after World War II, many ethnic Chinese, especially the local-born, have adopted Southeast Asian citizenship/nationality; others have remained Chinese citizens or held non-Southeast Asian citizenship. Only after 1980, with the promulgation of the 1980 nationality law of the PRC which recognizes only single nationality, that the citizenship issue for the ethnic Chinese was resolved. Therefore "Southeast Asian personalities" here refers to ethnic Chinese in Southeast Asia, or Southeast Asians of Chinese descent regardless of their citizenships. The personalities that are included in the dictionary have lived in Southeast Asia and made a major impact, including contributions, to Southeast Asian societies or local Chinese communities or both. Foreign nationals of Chinese descent who do not hold Southeast Asian citizenships are also included if they fit into our categories as listed below. Who then are the personalities included in this dictionary?

Southeast Asian Personalities of Chinese Descent

Definition of "ethnic Chinese" and "of Chinese descent": The Southeast Asian personalities included in this dictionary are either "ethnic Chinese" or people who are of Chinese descent.

The term ethnic Chinese here refers to the Chinese who live or have lived in Southeast Asia and consider the region as their permanent or semi-permanent home. Many of them, especially the second generation, were born and brought up in Southeast Asia and hold the citizenship of one Southeast Asian country. Nevertheless, not only are they descendants of the Chinese, more often than not, culturally they still retain some degree of Chinese culture. However, "Southeast Asian personalities of Chinese descent" refer to Chinese people in Southeast Asia or their descendants regardless of their cultural backgrounds. Therefore, the term "Southeast Asian personalities" here is used to include both ethnic Chinese and those of Chinese descent in this region. These persons of Chinese descent were mainly born, raised, and resided or have been residing in Southeast Asia, and whose achievements in certain arena(s) have made a significant impact in the region from the twentieth century to the present. In other words, a person who was born in, but grew up outside the region, made a name outside Southeast Asia, holds non-Southeast Asian citizenship, and never identifies himself or herself with Southeast Asia will not be included in this dictionary (e.g. Hou Jiachang, a PRC badminton champion who was born in Java and "returned" to the People's Republic of China when he was 16 years of age and emerged as the top player in China and the world. He represented China and contributed to the development of badminton in China throughout the 1960s and the first half of 1970s. He eventually retired in the United States, not in Indonesia).

Citizenship: The current nationality of a selected personality may not necessarily be that of a country in Southeast Asia. For example, the personality may have been born and raised in Southeast Asia, but holds the citizenship of another country outside the region. (For instance: Professor Wang Gungwu, an Australian citizen, was born in Indonesia, grew up in West Malaysia and returned to Singapore and Malaysia to work and have made major contributions in those two countries.) It is particularly difficult in the case of personalities before World War II when the issue of citizenship was unclear and ambiguous. (For instance: Tan Kah Kee was born in China, was both a Chinese citizen and a British subject, and eventually returned and died in the People's Republic of China.) These two examples show that they have/had non-Southeast Asian citizenship but they made major contributions to and significant impact on this region and are hence included in this dictionary. A Southeast Asian citizen who has made a name and significant impact outside Southeast Asia and continues to identify with a particular Southeast Asian country will be included in the dictionary. (For instance: Michelle Yeoh, a Malaysian who became well known making movies in Hong Kong and Hollywood.)

Self-identification: As noted earlier, this is the primary criterion for inclusion in the Dictionary. The personality has made known the fact that he/she was/is a Chinese or ethnic Chinese, or that he/she is of Chinese descent. (For instance: Thaksin Shinawatra, former Thai Prime Minister who went to Guangdong to trace his Chinese ancestry and openly admits that he is a Thai of Chinese descent: he has a Chinese surname Qiu or Khoo with a given name Daxin.) Those who are alive and refuse to acknowledge their Chinese ancestry are not included in this dictionary:

(1) A few Chinese Indonesians and Sino-Vietnamese who belong to this category as most do not want to be identified as "Indonesian or Vietnamese of Chinese descent".
(2) Those who are ambiguous in their descendant background such as award-winning Thai movie director Apichatpong Weerasethakul who is a third-generation Sino-Thai but does not know the surname of his Chinese ancestor and identifies himself as Thai; Rany Bun, the First Lady of Cambodia who was noted by some Chinese publications as a woman of Hainanese descent but this was never confirmed by herself.
(3) Those who are known as of Chinese descent but there is a lack of detailed information, e.g. Deputy Premier of Laos, Somsavat Lengsavad, who was identified in Hong Kong's Yazhou Zoukan as Ling Xuguang.

Assessment of Influence/Impact and Recognition

The Southeast Asian personalities of Chinese descent who have been included in this biographical dictionary are selected because they are significant, prominent and have made a major impact, either positive or negative, in Southeast Asia. Because of the Dictionary's emphasis on personal impact/influence in Southeast Asia, they are not likely to be very young when they made their impact.

Evaluation Criteria: Some arenas have their own systems of meritocracy; others do not. The arts and sports arenas, for example, recognize talents by conferring awards, but in the political arena, dissidents or opposition leaders may not be ceremoniously honoured. Furthermore, the yardsticks for assessing excellence or measuring influence/impact, both positive and negative, vary across countries, or may be variably applied even within the same country, or may not be used at all. Each country editor was asked to draw up the general criteria for selection in accordance with his/her country's standards, use his/her power of discernment, and present a convincing case for his/her selection. Most importantly, the inclusion of these prominent individuals is subject to the quota of each category. The person may be quite prominent but he/she will not be included as the quota for that category is already full.

Various Categories and Selection Criteria of the Personalities

The personalities are evaluated and organized into categories in accordance with the areas of their expertise/occupation that are listed in an index volume.

1. Community Leaders: Every community has its leaders. For the ethnic Chinese, the community leaders come from various ethnic organizations/associations. The most common is Chinese clan associations (including federations of clan associations and dialect group associations). As there are many types of dialect groups, the selection of leaders from this category will be based on the eminent positions they held such as founding members, long-serving presidents or leaders that made major impacts on the community. Nevertheless, since the pool of such personalities is large, only 25 are selected for this category. It is well-known that many community leaders are also successful businessmen; therefore more often than not we are selecting the leading businessmen as well. Nevertheless, they were not necessarily the wealthiest. The personalities in this category are therefore not selected based on wealth and status, but merits and influence/power in the Chinese community within the country and beyond.

2. Businessmen/Businesswomen: The ethnic Chinese in Southeast Asia are often referred to as a "trading community" or "business community". They are the entrepreneurs, merchants, bankers, industrialists, real estate leaders, business consultants, etc. Those selected are top leaders in their respective sectors or those who won national or international recognition. Again, the number of entries in this category is limited to 30, and whenever possible, the number is evenly divided among various subgroups. As mentioned in category 1, some of these business leaders are also active in community organizations. But those who are included in the category of business leaders are specially successful and influential in their businesses, not in their community leadership and services. It should also be noted that business leaders who failed or got involved in illegal activities and were in consequence sentenced by the courts are also included.

3. Politicians: The ethnic Chinese in Southeast Asia are often thought to be apolitical. In fact this notion is incorrect; the reality has a lot to do with the environments in which they live. In some countries where political activities were/are restricted, no Chinese political leaders, or few of them have emerged. But in many Southeast Asian countries there has been a significant number of ethnic Chinese or Southeast Asians of Chinese descent who were/are leading politicians. A total of 25 of them have been selected in this category for each country. They include holders of important positions in major political parties of the countries, e.g. chairmen and secretaries-general in Chinese or Chinese-dominated parties, outstanding cabinet ministers, members of parliament and bureaucrats, revolutionaries and opposition leaders with strong influence, etc.

4. Professionals: Many ethnic Chinese in Southeast Asia are leading professionals such as lawyers, architects, engineers, physicians, natural scientists (such as physicists, life-scientists, etc.), and social scientists (economists, political scientists, historians, etc.). The selection is from among the holders of important positions in professional organizations especially those with achievements and influence, and also authors of works of influence as well as leaders in professions. In this category, a maximum of 15 personalities are selected. The number is, as far as possible, evenly distributed among the professions/fields.

5. Artists: There is also a large number of Southeast Asian artists of Chinese descent. They include painters, playwrights, movie directors, actors and actresses, dancers, choreographers and musicians (conductors, pianists, composers etc.). In this category, artists are selected based on their achievements such as the recipients of awards (international, regional and national); international award winners are given priority over regional and national award winners. If a country has not produced personalities of international recognition, the selection criteria are based on their achievements at the regional or national levels. The maximum number of entries in this category is 12 and when possible, it is distributed evenly among various sub-groups.

6. Mass Media Leaders: The achievements of Southeast Asians of Chinese descent are likewise well recognized in the field of mass media/mass communication. This category includes press editors, photographers and journalists, and film producers. The selection is based on the criteria listed for artists. The maximum number of entries in this category is 12.

7. Writers: Chinese in Southeast Asia are also well known for their contributions in the literary field. There are many writers who wrote/write in various languages including Chinese, English and some Southeast Asian national languages. The criteria used for this category are similar to those for the Artists. Nevertheless, the impacts of these writers may be confined to the local, rather than the national, community. For example, the impacts of some ethnic Chinese writers (writing in Chinese) are often confined to the local Chinese community, but are included for being equally significant. The maximum number of entries in this category is 15.

8. Sportsmen/Sportswomen: Southeast Asians of Chinese descent have been active in sports since the second half of the twentieth century and have made remarkable achievements in the world arena. These sportsmen and sportswomen include badminton players, swimmers, footballers, athletes, martial art experts, bowlers, table tennis players, weight lifters, etc. Again, the selection criteria are similar to those for the 5th category for the Artists. The maximum number of entries in this category is also 15.

9. Educators/Promoters of Education: One of the major characteristics of Southeast Asian Chinese is the great attention they place on education. The Chinese are known to value education highly and put a lot of effort into building Chinese schools for their children after migrating to new places. Initially they built Chinese-language schools but as time passed, they also built schools in local languages. In this category, we include personalities such as school principals and influential contributors to education who may not have been educators (e.g. Tan Kah Kee). The selection criteria are based on the national and international recognition of the individuals, the highest positions held/have held in the educational institutions and the extent to which they made/have made a difference. The maximum number of entries in this category is 12.

10. Religious Leaders/Promoters of Religion: After migrating to a new land, the Chinese also built temples, as religion became an important part of their daily life. However, they were not confined to worshipping traditional Chinese religions; some of them also took up non-Chinese religions. This category includes the founders of religious groups or religious leaders who made/have made significant contributions to the host country. The maximum number of entries in this category is 12.

11. Others: There are many other personalities who may not fall into the above categories. However, they have been included in this dictionary as they played important roles and made an impact on Southeast Asian Chinese communities and national societies. These personalities include philanthropists, social-political activists, public intellectuals, national heroes, military leaders, etc. The criteria for selection of these people include the extent of their recognition by the communities within the country and beyond. Many of them may also be included in other categories such as businessmen, professionals and education promoters. The maximum number of entries in this category is 15.

Number of Entries

The number of entries in each category (between 12 and 25) is arbitrary. The rationale is that Southeast Asian personalities of Chinese descent who are involved in the first three categories are large and hence have to be given a larger proportion (80 out of 188 entries). Nevertheless, the role of these personalities in eight other fields is equally significant and hence should be recognized (108 out of 188). If a country fulfils the quota mentioned above, it will consist of 188 entries. Initially we had hoped to gather around 800 personalities for the project, but we realized in the process of research and writing that it was impossible to get that number of "top leaders" in many countries, especially in the Indochinese states and Myanmar, where there are insufficient materials and where many personalities have complex identities which preclude them from being classified as personalities of Chinese descent (e.g. the deputy Prime Minister of Laos and the wife of Cambodian Prime Minister Hun Sen, who have been mentioned earlier). Besides, due to the different levels of development in Southeast Asian states, in countries such as Indochinese states and Myanmar, certain types of Chinese leaders are either very small in number or cannot be found. Even Bruneians fill only a few categories. Besides this, we also have problems in getting enough entries on Thailand as fewer Thai scholars/writers can write in English. We therefore set a more realistic target of around 600 personalities, the majority of whom are from the original members of the ASEAN states where there is a larger pool of personalities of Chinese descent and the materials relating to them are easier to obtain. On account of these limitations, this is not a comprehensive dictionary. Nevertheless, the editors are satisfied that it includes the major figures on whom rather detailed information is available. In other words, the Chinese figures included in this dictionary are fairly representative. To a large extent, it reflects the situation of their influence and impact in modern/contemporary Southeast Asia.

As stated, we have more than 11 categories and not every category has been able to reach the maximum number of entries. This is due to the fact that Southeast Asian countries are at different stages of development. The more developed the country, the more categories can be found in the country. It is not surprising that some countries have more entries in certain categories and fewer or even none in other categories. As such, the representation of the personalities across the countries is bound to be uneven. Nevertheless, we believe that this work is a fairly accurate reflection of the Chinese community in the respective countries. It is hoped that in providing some detailed information on Southeast Asian personalities of Chinese descent, this work will also be a useful reference for future research.

Country Editors and Actual Number of Entries

The following table shows the names of country editors and total number of entries of personalities in each country/region. The original members of ASEAN tend to have more "Chinese personalities" for obvious reasons: they have relatively larger Chinese populations and they have undergone longer stages of economic development which has brought about more notable personalities especially in the economic, professional, sports, arts and other arenas. Nevertheless, we have encountered various difficulties as there are not many specialists who studied Southeast Asian personalities of Chinese descent; it is especially difficult to find scholars/writers on Indochinese states and Burma/Myanmar. In the existing biographical publications on the Chinese in the above countries, entries on Laos and Cambodia are especially difficult to come by. Some dictionaries have only one on Laos and a few on Cambodia. We had foreseen some of the problems but had not been fully aware of the amount of work demanded for the completion of the project. We are fortunate that at various stages, we were able to bring in scholars in residence to write some of the entries. Lim Boon Hock, Grace Chew, Daw Win, and Goh Yu Mei deserve to be mentioned as they contributed tremendously towards the completion of this dictionary.

Countries/Region	Number of Entries	Country Editor(s)
(1) Singapore	§ 161	Ho Khai Leong
(2) Indonesia	§ 107	Leo Suryadinata
(3) Malaysia	§ 105	Ho Khai Leong
(4) Philippines	§ 92	Teresita Ang-See
(5) Vietnam	§ 40	David Koh & Grace Chew Chye Lay
(6) Thailand	§ 33	Michael Montesano
(7) Brunei	§ 31	Niew Shong Tong
(8) Myanmar	§ 20	Daw Win
(9) Cambodia	§ 10	Lim Boon Hock
(10) Laos	§ 6	Lim Boon Hock
Total	§ 605	—

Contents of the Entries

Each entry is between 1,000 and 1,500 words in length. The country editor assesses the suitability of the length in relation to the impact/achievements/importance of the personality, but a maximum of 2,000 words is adhered to. A few entries from the Indochinese countries and Myanmar barely make up 1,000 words as the writers had difficulties in obtaining more information. It is hoped that readers and researchers will build on the information provided in this dictionary in their ongoing research on those personalities.

Each entry includes the following:

- Formal names (local names, Chinese names and Chinese characters, if available)
- Year of birth and death
- Importance/Significance of the personality
- Country (of residence, not necessarily citizenship)where the impact/contribution was made
- Profile
- References (in general, maximum of six items)

The Structure of this Biographical Dictionary

The entries in this dictionary are arranged in alphabetical order of names of personalities, not countries. The names are often local names (official names), others are Chinese names rendered in local spellings. A personality is entered by his/her local name, not Chinese name, except for a few who have been well known by their Chinese names before they changed their names (e.g. All England champion Tan Joe Hok, not Hendra Kartanegara.) Readers who only know the persons' Chinese names (in local spelling or Hanyu Pinyin) should use the volume on Glossary and Index, which are listed in Volume II. The Glossary and Indexes are useful: not only do they give the definitions of some common terms used in the dictionary but they also provide lists of indexes, for instance, of names in Chinese and non-Chinese, of countries, and of occupations. Without these indexes, readers may find it difficult to use the dictionary effectively.

Concluding Remarks

This is a big project and is the first book of its kind. There are bound to be inadequacies. Despite obvious limitations as mentioned in the earlier sections of this introduction, I would argue that this dictionary which consists of 605 entries with more than 620 personalities has presented a generally correct picture of Southeast Asian personalities of Chinese descent. It has shown that the Southeast Asian Chinese are not a homogeneous, but a heterogeneous group.

The Southeast Asian Chinese do not fit into the old perception that all Chinese are traders who are only concerned with their own community and never change but remain "Chinese" forever. In fact they are not confined to one or two fields but many. They are not a group which resists change but many groups which have changed and are changing. They are not isolated but part and parcel of Southeast Asian history and society. They are Southeast Asian personalities of Chinese descent.

Readers and researchers who would like to use this dictionary and analyse the issues and problems relating to Southeast Asian personalities of Chinese descent will find Volume II Glossary and Indexes useful.

Dictionary User's Guide

1. The dictionary is arranged in alphabetical order.
2. The entry usually starts with the surname of the individual. For a Chinese name, it is easy as the first word is the surname (e.g. Goh Keng Swee; Lie Kim Hok), but for a non-Chinese name it follows the customary usage.
3. For Vietnamese-Chinese names/Vietnamese names, the first name is the surname and the entry is listed in accordance with the first name: Đặng Văn Thành; Ngô Dư Hiệp.
4. For Chinese Indonesian names, usually the Indonesian "surname" is often used in the entry, for instance, Salim, Soedono rather than Soedono Salim; Wanandi, Jusuf rather than Jusuf Wanandi.
5. The Indonesian Chinese name used in the entry is the original old spelling, unless the person himself changed it to a new spelling; For examples, Liem Koen Hian, not Liem Kun Hian; but Ciputra, not Tjiputra.
6. For Chinese Thai names, usually the first word of the Thai name is used, not the surname. For instance, Bunchu Rotchanasathian, not Rotchanasathian, Bunchu; Chuan Likphai, not Likphai Chuan.
7. Transliteration of Thai names and terms in this volume follows a modified version of the Thai Royal Institute/United States Library of Congress guidelines.
8. For Chinese Filipino names, usually the surname is used. For instance, Go-Belmonte, Betty; Ty, George S. K.; SyCip, Washington.
9. For Chinese-Burmese names, usually there is no surname; therefore the entry uses the first word as the entry name: Hoke Sein; Kyee Paw.
10. In general, the name used in the dictionary is the original name in the local spelling (e.g. Lee Dai Soh), the name can be Chinese (e.g. Kwik Kian Gie) or non-Chinese name (Silalahi, Harry Tjan), if it is not a Chinese name, it is followed by Chinese full name (if available) and followed by characters (if available), name in hanyu pinyin,year or birth and death, and category, and country where the contribution/impact was made. For instance:

Lee Dai Soh
(李大傻, Li Dasha, 1913–89)
Cantonese story-teller, broadcaster, Singapore

Another example:
Bunchu Rotchanasathian
(Ui Bun Bo, 黃闻波, Huang Wenbo, 1922–2007)
Leading businessman, politician, Thailand

11. If the personality is well-known by his/her other name rather than original name, especially for writer or artist, the other name (or pseudonym) is adopted as the entry name. For instance, Marga T. rather than Tjoa Liang Tjoe, Botan rather than Supha Sirisingha, Wu An rather than Qiu Liji, Tan Joe Hok rather than Hendra Kartanegara.
12. As noted, some individuals are known to have a few names, for instance, Rudy Hartono Kurniawan, a badminton champion from Indonesia, is listed under Kurniawan, Rudy Hartono. But many may only know his name as Rudy Hartono or Rudy Nio or Nio Hap Liang or Liang Hailiang, these names are listed in the accompanying Volume II: Glossary and Index.
13. It is therefore important for the reader to also refer to the accompanying Volume II which consists of glossary, indexes of list of various names, indexes by gender, by author, by country and by category.
14. Each entry contains basic information about the person. The length of each entry is between 1,000–1,500 words, except a few major leaders such as prime minister or president or a towering figures or two figures combined.
15. At the end of each entry, references are included. With the exception of a few entries, almost all have listed only six items due to space limitation.
16. Chinese or local languages in the text of the entry are translated into English; in the references section, Chinese and foreign languages are not translated as they are meant for researchers.

Biographical Dictionary (A – Z)

Former banker, leading businessman, Myanmar

Aik Htun is currently chairman of Shwe Taung Development Co. Ltd., one of the most successful construction companies in Myanmar, incorporated in Yangon in 1994. He is also chairman of the Myanmar International Trade Promotion Association which promotes trade between Myanmar and the People's Republic of China. Prior to this, he was associated with the Asia Wealth Bank (AWB), which was suspended during the financial crisis in Myanmar in 2003.

U Aik Htun was reportedly born in 1948 to a poor Chinese family in a village named Mong Kaing in the Nansam district of Southern Shan State in Upper Myanmar.

He received his secondary-level Chinese education at Yangon Nanyang Zhong Xue (仰光南洋中学), in Bahan township, Yangon, which is one of the two renowned Chinese schools in Yangon during 1950s-60s and currently the No. 2 State High School, Bahan. As such he speaks both Burmese and Mandarin (Putonghua) well. At the age of twenty he moved to Yangon and made his living as a humble driver, a roadside biscuit vendor, and later a grocery shopowner in downtown Yangon. When he turned forty-two, around the time Myanmar announced its open door policy in 1989, he reportedly ventured into business with his twenty-year savings of Kyats 3,000,000 (about US$30,000). Together with some friends in Yangon, he established the Olympic Construction Co. in 1990, which later became the Shwe Taung Development Co. (1994) and acquired the Asia Wealth Bank.

Between 1997 and 2000, in collaboration with the Government Housing Development Agency and Yangon Municipality, the Shwe Taung Development Co. contracted many housing development projects and supermarkets such as U Wisaya Plaza, Myaing Haywin Housing, Kanthaya Plaza, Olympic Tower, Junction Eight Supermarket, and later, Riverview Garden.

U Aik Htun became famous when he partially controlled Asia Wealth Bank (AWB) as a sister company of the Olympic Construction Co. AWB was registered on 30 April 1995 with an initial paid up capital of Kyats 664 million (World Bank 1999). It developed into the then largest and best known private commercial bank of the twenty private banks that were mostly established during the same period of time in Myanmar and had many branches countrywide. It had mainly Chinese business links and some agricultural projects in the Irrawaddy Delta and Magwe Division in Upper Myanmar.

As a successful banker, U Aik Htun had his name mentioned in Bangkok-based newspapers and, according to several reports, was even invited to attend the Asian Development Bank conference held in Chiang Mai, Thailand, in May 2000. Under his management, AWB introduced and distributed bankcards, gift cheques, and traveller's cheques. In 1996 it became the first bank in Myanmar to issue credit cards. At the end of 1999, the bank introduced "New Generation" credit cards to its clients and in 2001 also became the first Myanmar bank to offer "online" banking facility. By 2002, AWB had kyats 170 billion in assets, 3,000 staff, 39 branches, 1,000 computers, and claimed a 45 per cent market share in the bank-loan business in Myanmar.

In February 2003 several of his businesses became insolvent and were not able to pay their staff members and workers. To halt a serious bank run, several private banks were ordered to stop withdrawals that resulted from the loss of confidence when news of non-performing loans broke out. Some private banks were found to be in breach of the Financial Institutions Law in their lending. The local magazine, Living Colour (2 March 2003), noted that the AWB had made loans amounting to about fifty times its capital. The multiple failures of the bank led to the financial crisis in Myanmar in 2003 and AWB was suspended.

U Aik Htun recently re-emerged with a new "face" as chairman of Shwe Taung Development Co. and chairman of the Myanmar International Trade Promotion Association. He has also been appointed executive vice-chairman of China Trade & Commerce Promotion Association (中国经济贸易促进委员会常务副会长). In early 2011 China's Foreign Trade (Beijing) magazine published an interview which was conducted with U Aik Htun in its volume 4 issue of 2011.

Shwe Taung Development Co.'s business focuses on construction and property developments; national infrastructure construction projects such as Paunglaung dam, Yeywa (near Kyaukse, Mandalay Division), hydropower plant (the largest in Myanmar), Myanmar-India border roads, key bridges, among others. The company has cooperated with China's leading companies such as the Ge Zhou Ba Group (葛洲坝集团, a leading China dam building company) and Da Tang Group (大唐集团, one of China's leading telecommunication companies). Shwe Taung has also diversified its businesses to foreign investment, particularly in many provinces of China such as Yunnan, An Hui, and Guangxi.

U Aik Htun is the founding chairman of the Myanmar International Trade Promotion Association, which is a non-governmental trade promotion organization founded in 1998. The association started with forty members from Chinese-Burmese enterprises and now has fifty-eight members from all aspects of businesses, including property developers, manufacturers, jewellery traders, and others. The association has business networks in over sixty countries.

As chairman of the association, U Aik Htun leads Chinese-Burmese businessmen in travelling annually to China for business exposure outside Myanmar. For example, his team in 2006 travelled to Qin Zhou Beibuwan (钦州北部湾) in Guangxi (广西) Province; in 2007 to Maanshan (马鞍山) city; in 2011 to Yan Tai (烟台) city. He also led twenty-five Chinese-Burmese businessmen who actively participated in the Sixth ASEAN-Chinese Enterprises to invest in West China Promotion, and the Asia Pacific Dialogue held in Kunming (昆明) city, Yunnan (云南) Province in June 2008.

He often attends VIP business receptions and receives foreign business delegations. For instance, on 20 November 2010, he attended the inauguration of the Yunnan Trade and Business Office (Yangon branch), which was held at the Traders Hotel Yangon; on 23 May 2011, he received a business promotion team led by the executive director Li Zhi Qiang (李志强) of the Singapore China Product International Wholesale Market, a large investment cooperation company registered in Singapore with the support of the Chinese Government, the Singapore Government, and China Investment Holdings Pte. Ltd. He also led more than one hundred local enterprises in attending the promotion meeting where he even delivered the welcoming speech on behalf of the local enterprises.

For his dedicated service to the ethnic Chinese society, U Aik Htun has been appointed honorary president of the Myanmar Chinese Chamber of Commerce (缅甸华商商会名誉会长), honorary president of the Myanmar Overseas Chinese Charity and Reliefs Association (缅甸华侨慈善总会名誉会长), and honorary chairman of the Yangon Yunnan Clan Association (仰光云南同乡会名誉主席).

U Aik Htun is a charitable person, concerned with the education of the young, and the welfare of ethnic minorities. Among his other contributions, he also donated a twenty-five-bed hospital and a school building in Mong Kaing Township in Southern Shan State (New Light of Myanmar, 14 July 2004) on behalf of the Olympic Co. He is also involved in promoting the welfare of the Chinese community. For instance, in May 2008 when Myanmar was hit by Cyclone Nargis, he took part in the relief work and the rebuilding of houses for the victims in the Thanlyn area, Yangon division.

He has a Chinese wife, Zeng Yuan Xiang (曾圆香), and three children: Sandar Tun, Mi Mi Khaing, and Aung Zaw Naing.

(洪群, Hong Qun, 1957–)

Community leader, educator, Cambodia

Aing Khun is vice-president of the Cambodian Hokkien Association and head of the Hokkien Association Min Sheng School (福建会馆民生学校) in Phnom Penh.

Unlike educator Li Huiming who was a migrant, Aing Khun was born in Cambodia in 1957. His father was a graduate of the Xiamen Navigation Academy (厦门航海学院) in China who migrated to Cambodia to work as a teacher. Aing lived with his father in the teachers' living quarters, and was thus exposed to teaching in the Chinese language since he was young. In 1970, General Lon Nol who was pro-United States and anti-the People's Republic of China came to power, and most of the Chinese schools in Cambodia were closed down, except in the Kratie Province near the Vietnam/Cambodia border where the Khmer Rouge was in control. Aing's father, who was jobless, went to Kratie province to teach. Aing also continued his schooling there and Li Huiming was one of his teachers at Kratie.

According to Aing Khun, during his student days at Kratie, he often helped his father to communicate with his students as his father did not speak Cambodian well. In 1971 when he was only fourteen years of age, he started to be a teacher, with many of his students being older than he was. Apparently Aing enjoyed teaching and only ceased to be a teacher in April 1974 when the Khmer Rouge closed down all Chinese schools. There had been two factions within the Khmer Rouge and the pro-Chinese faction eventually lost to the anti-Chinese faction.

In 1975 the Khmer Rouge succeeded in "liberating" Cambodia and both Aing and his father became jobless. Aing was deported to a village to become a farmer. The Khmer Rouge was at war with the Vietnamese and many of its soldiers were killed. Aing was then forced to join the Khmer Rouge army and as he was tall and strong, they put him in the artillery unit. There were about fifty Chinese young men from his village who were recruited into the army and they received only three days' training before being sent to the battlefield to fight the Vietnamese. Aing who was then seventeen years old, was made a leader in charge of the rocket unit. While the Vietnamese had tanks and were armed with good weaponry, the Khmer Rouge used buffalo carriages to transport their weapons. Fearful of being killed, Aing and twelve other young Chinese decided to escape. At midnight, they abandoned their weapons and ran to the edge of the forest where they met the Vietnamese troops. Because they were unarmed and had fairer skin than other Cambodians, they were detained only for a while and were eventually released unharmed.

Aing Khun returned to Kratie Province and from there went to Phnom Penh to look for a job. In 1976 he started to run a small business on the Cambodian-Vietnamese border, from which he made a lot of money. Then in 1988 he purchased more than ten stalls at the Phnom Penh market at low prices and managed to resell them at high prices, thus becoming a rich businessman. He had a dream to reopen a Chinese school, but did not take any action towards this end until something happened to his two daughters and one son who were studying in a Cambodian school. His children were discriminated against by their ethnic Cambodian teachers and his son was even beaten by a teacher. Aing spoke up regarding the persistent ethnic prejudice in the Cambodian school and the fact that many Chinese children were ill treated by their Cambodian teachers. He eventually decided to take his children out of the school and teach them Chinese at home. Two months later, his Chinese neighbours started sending their children to his place for a Chinese education. The number of students increased rapidly and within two years, Aing's house could no longer accommodate the students.

Aing Khun then began to look for a place to build a proper school. By coincidence, he met Dr Haing Ngor, the movie star of The Killing Fields. Haing Ngor owned a piece of land near the Min Sheng School where Aing's father was a headmaster in the 1950s. Haing Ngor said Aing could rent the place to build a Chinese school, an offer Aing immediately accepted. He spent US$50,000 to build twelve classrooms and other facilities. Initially there were only 300 students. Within a short period of time though, the student number increased to 1,000. It continued to grow and soon there was a problem with space.

In March 1999, the Cambodian Hokkien Association succeeded in regaining the building of the old Min Sheng School that was being used by the Cambodian school there. However, before the building was returned to the Hokkien Association, the association was required to compensate the Cambodian school with another school building. Aing, who was a leader of the Hokkien Association, volunteered to offer his school in exchange for the Min Sheng School. However the land of his school belonged to Haing Ngor who had just passed away. Fortunately Haing Ngor's relatives agreed to donate the land to the Cambodian Government, which thus made the exchange possible. The Hokkien Association was grateful to Haing Ngor and his relatives and to commemorate the contribution of Haing Ngor, the Min Sheng School named one of the school buildings after Haing Ngor (吴汉纪念楼). It is interesting to note that Haing Ngor's younger brother is the minister for agriculture in Cambodia.

Aing became principal of the Min Sheng School, following in the footsteps of his father. Under Aing's leadership, Min Sheng has been able to develop into a good school in Phnom Penh.

Alim, Markus

Entrepreneur, community leader, Indonesia

Alim Markus, better known in the Chinese-speaking community as Lin Wenguang, is president-director of the P.T. Maspion and Maspion Group which produces plastic ware, glassware, and electrical home appliances. He and his family were listed in Forbes (2006) at no. 38 of "Indonesia's 40 Richest". Alim Markus is also general chairman of the Indonesian Federation of Fuqing Associations (印尼福清社团总会).

Alim Markus was born on 24 September 1951 in Surabaya and went to a local Chinese school. His father, Lin Xueshan (林学善), who later changed his name to Alim Husin, had four sons. Alim Husin was the founder of a modest business firm known as UD Logam Djawa, which produced aluminium kitchenware. Alim Markus was the eldest son in the family. After receiving only junior school education, he quit school in 1965 when he was about fifteen to help his father run the family's factory. He was, however, eager to learn and could read and write Chinese. Besides teaching himself English and Japanese, he also learned accounting. Through self-education he acquired a vision in business. In the later stage of his life, he went on to complete a management course at Pan Pacific Professional Management in Taiwan, and a short course in the executive education programme at the NUS (National University of Singapore) Business School.

At the age of twenty, Alim Markus was able to convince his father to expand the business. In 1971 father and son succeeded in establishing a new company called P.T. Maspion, with its Chinese name as Jin Feng (金锋 or golden peak). Maspion is an acronym for "Mengajak Anda Selalu Percaya Industri Olahan Nasional" (Inviting you to put your trust in national industrial products). To expand the business, the young Alim Markus paid a visit to the provincial governor and asked for a piece of land to build a new factory. He gained the support of the governor and the factory gradually developed into a multimillion business group. These days Maspion products are seen everywhere, and they are not only kitchenware, glassware, and electric home appliances, but also steel products and pipes for oil. According to its official website, the company employs 13,000 people in four industrial sites, including Sidoardjo and Gresik (East Java), and one factory in Jakarta (West Java). But according to Global Outstanding Chinese Biography, the company has sixty factories and employs 30,000 people.

Under the leadership of Alim Markus who is supported by his three brothers, Alim Mulia Sastra, Alim Satria, and Alim Prakasa, P.T. Maspion has become a multinational company with subsidiaries in Southeast Asian countries, China, Japan, the United States, and Canada. It has become one of the largest producers of consumer durables in the world and its products can be found in well known retail stores in the United States and other major countries worldwide.

Unlike many Indonesian MNCs which are based in Jakarta, P.T. Maspion is based in Surabaya, the second largest city in Indonesia. When asked by the Metro TV anchor whether this had helped or hurt his business, Alim Markus replied, "Surabaya, when you look at the map, is [located] at the centre of Indonesia…[it has] a good harbour and the workers are very good, very nice, and I think the costs of production are 25 per cent lower than in Jakarta, so we can compete." Because of his stronghold in Surabaya, East Java, he has been elected vice-president of the East Java Indonesia Chamber of Commerce.

When asked about his business philosophy, Alim Markus said, "We grow together with our distributors, suppliers, stakeholders or share holders, even our staff and workers." This "we grow together" philosophy has made his Maspion group grow increasingly bigger in Indonesia. In another interview with a business professor, he elaborated on this concept which has led to his success in business. He noted that it is extremely important to have a structured and systematized organization with appropriate boundaries, proper management, and utilization. He further noted the importance of "establishing strong ties with business partners, including suppliers, the management team, and every staff member. This is because each individual plays an important role in contributing towards growing the business".

It is interesting to note that in Indonesia, Alim Markus also uses patriotism to promote sales. Maspion's advertisements on television always end with the following remark: "Love your Indonesian products" (Cintailah Produk Produk Indonesia!).

He has also been active in the local political scene. It was reported that he was an economics consultant to President Abudurrahman Wahid (Gus Dur), as well as consultant to Speaker of the House Agung Laksono. He was also an honorary consul of Canada for Surabaya.

As the boss of an MNC, Alim Markus has also invested in southern China since the 1980s. He has led a few Indonesian delegations to China, and urged China's investors to invest in Indonesia. Owing to his business connections with China, he has been elected president of the Indonesia-China Business Council and has played host to various high-level PRC delegations to Indonesia; he has also entertained top-level Taiwanese delegations to Indonesia.

As a second-generation Chinese Indonesian who has received some Chinese education, Alim Markus has been interested in promoting the Chinese language and culture. After the fall of Soeharto, an organization for promoting Chinese language and Chinese education was established in East Java, and Alim Markus assisted the organization financially.

There was a "Study Mandarin" fever and he, together with his brothers, established a trilingual school called the Singapore National Academy (新加坡国民学院) which teaches English, Mandarin, and Indonesian from primary to secondary levels. One of the buildings in the academy is named after his late father who died in 2003.

Alim Markus has also been active in local Chinese organizations. He has served as general chairman of the Indonesian Fuqing (Hokchia) Organization, general chairman of the Indonesian Lim Surname Association, and permanent honorary chairman of the Indonesian Hakka Association. In addition, he has also served as consultant for various organizations in China and Indonesia.

Owing to his contributions to the Indonesian economy, especially in East Java, the Universitas 17 Agustus (17 August University) in Surabaya conferred on him an honorary doctorate degree in March 2009.

He is married to Sriyanti, and they have six children.

Amphon Bulaphakdi

Chinese community leader, businessman, Thailand

Amphon Bulaphakdi was a well known Thai businessman involved in the rice industry. As the owner of Thanya Thai Co., a leading rice exporter in Thailand, he was respected for his expertise in the trade. As a result, he was also involved in advising the Thai government on policies regarding the export of rice. He was also noted for his efforts to promote international trade and cultural exchanges between Thailand and other countries, especially China, during his term as chairperson of the Thai-Chinese Chamber of Commerce from 1962 to 1987.

Amphon was born on 11 November 1909 in the Talat Noi area of Bangkok. His father, Huang Ren (黃仁), was a rice trader in Thailand. When Amphon was eight years old, his father sent him to Shantou to receive his education. When he turned fifteen in 1924, he returned to Thailand, where he continued his schooling and learned the Thai and English languages in a local school. After he graduated, he worked in the Li Kun Ji Rice Mill (李坤记火砻厂) for nine years. He next worked in Qian Sheng Rice Trading (乾盛米行), where he gained a good reputation for his work performance. He was then invited by Ma Liqun (马立群), Thailand's rice milling tycoon, to assume a key position in the Thai Rice Company (泰米公司). In his years there, he gained more experience in the rice trading business.

In 1955 Amphon set up his own business, Thanya Thai Co., which specialized in exporting rice and local produce. He was also involved in the management of other companies, both related and unrelated to the rice industry, and became chairperson of the board of directors of the International Rice Trading Company Limited (国际米业有限公司), Zhen Xing Tai Rice Mill (振兴泰碾米厂), and Yu Xing Insurance Company Limited (裕兴保险有限公司). When he founded the Extinguisher Industry Company Limited of Thailand in 1958, he was concurrently the managing director of the Bank of Ayudhya.

His rich experience in the rice industry was highly regarded by the Thai government, as well as society. He assumed many important positions relating to rice exports and export policy. For example, he was the chairperson of the Rice Export Committee, the Joint Committee for Rice in the Board of Trade, and the Food Committee in the Board of Trade. In addition, he was also a member of the Quality Control Committee of the Ministry of Finance, the Import and Export Promotion Committee, and the Board of Trade. In 1959 he was elected chairperson of the Office of Rice Merchants (米商公所). As the organization's leader, he initiated the relocation of its office and the change in its name to the Association of Rice Merchants (米商公会). He was even invited several times by Thailand's agricultural university to give talks on issues in the rice industry.

Amphon was also one of the longest serving chairpersons of the Thai-Chinese Chamber of Commerce. He was first elected chairperson in 1962 and was re-elected consecutively for another three terms. After the organization re-registered under the government's new policy, he was again elected chairperson of the new committee for ten consecutive terms. As chairperson, he was enthusiastic in establishing trade between Thailand and other countries. For example, Amphon led a delegation to Malaysia and Singapore in 1964, meeting the Chinese Chamber of Commerce in these destinations, and examining the possibility of establishing trade between Thailand and these countries. In 1966 he hosted the Fourth Asian Chinese Businessmen's Conference (第四届亚洲华商贸易会议), and later the Second Conference of Chinese Logistics Businessmen (第二届华商航运业会议). During the conferences, he tried to initiate a global network in financial matters and transportation so as to facilitate international trade. After China and Thailand established diplomatic relations on 1 July 1975, Amphon, representing the Thai-Chinese Chamber of Commerce, led Thai commercial delegations to visit China in 1975 and 1978. He thus opened a new chapter in Thai-Chinese friendship. Under his leadership, the Thai-Chinese Chamber of Commerce played a leading role in promoting mutual economic and cultural exchanges between the two countries, such as mutual visit arrangements, business reconnaissance, business negotiations, and business investments.

Being the chairperson of the highest Chinese association in Thailand, Amphon was also concerned with the welfare of the local Thai-Chinese community. When the Thai government issued policies which undermined the interests of the Thai-Chinese, he would plead with the government for a revision of the policies. Often the government would heed his advice. For instance, when it banned the trading of second-hand goods Amphon pleaded, on behalf of many Chinese traders who had lost their jobs as a result, for a revision of the ban. The Thai government eventually accepted his request. On another occasion, the Thai government issued a policy requiring Chinese schools to decrease the number of hours of Chinese lessons. He pled for the withdrawal of the policy. The Thai government subsequently withdrew the policy.

Besides being active in the commercial sector, Amphon was also actively involved in the local community. He was director of the Hua Chiaw Poh Teck Tung Foundation, a member of the standing committee and honorary chairman of the Teochew Association of Thailand, director of the Thian Fah Foundation Hospital, chairman of the committee for the building of the Jie Shou Tang (介寿堂), and honorary chief director of the Huang Clan General Association (黄氏宗亲总会). When parts of southern Thailand were seriously damaged by floods, he initiated a fund-raising event in the name of the Thai-Chinese Chamber of Commerce, and enlisted the help of various Chinese associations. This event raised 379,600 baht, which were donated to the Thai government to help in the relief efforts.

In recognition of his contributions to the society and economy of Thailand, as well as the building of Thai-Chinese friendship, the Thai king bestowed a total of eight medals on Amphon, which included the Knight Grand Cross (First Class) of the Most Noble Order of the Crown of Thailand in 1969, and the Knight Grand Cross (First Class) of the Most Exalted Order of the White Elephant in 1979.

Amphon died of illness on 16 April 1987 at the age of seventy-seven.

Ang Kiukok

Artist, Philippines

Ang Kiukok's expressionist paintings are intense, distorted, and bold. They are testaments of the artist's worldview of the human condition: the angst and the anguish. For years, he endured the ignorance of the public, how they saw his works as ugly and violent. Instead of yielding to the whims of others, Ang persisted in creating visual metaphors of his honest image of the world. Resigned to being unpopular, he persisted in painting the world as he saw it. It was only in the latter years of his life that the public began to open their eyes belatedly to the genius that was always there. He was proclaimed National Artist for Visual Arts in 2001, the highest accolade bestowed on a Filipino artist, a master of contemporary art.

Ang Kiukok was born on 1 March 1931 to impoverished immigrant Chinese parents, Ang Sy Pong and Chin Lim. At the time of his birth, Ang's father, as testimony to his nationalism, named him Wah Shing, meaning "Chinese born". When it was later found out that an elder cousin was similarly named, the baby boy was given a new one, Kiu Kok, meaning "Save the Country".

Growing up in Davao City as the only male child in a brood of six, he showed early signs of his inclination towards the visual arts. While helping out with the family's sari-sari store, he would spend hours drawing and copying advertisements in newspapers. In school, he would be charged with drawing huge backdrops for activities.

He began formally studying art at the University of Santo Tomas in Manila from 1952–54. So focused was he in honing his craft that he barely paid attention to other aspects of his education. His hard work and dedication began to pay off though and he started to show promise as an artist. At the age of twenty, he was awarded an honourable mention by the Art Association of the Philippines for his work, Still Life. In 1954, he held his first one-man show at the Contemporary Art Gallery, a small gallery in Mabini Street, Manila City.

Under the tutelage of other great Filipino artists — Victorio Edades, Disodado Lorenzo and, most significantly, Vicente Manansala — many of whom were early modernists, Ang refined his art. Even as a student, Ang's brushwork was so impressive that Manansala used Ang's watercolour samples as teaching aids, showing these to future art students. Ang's early works were characterized by sombre and austere still life subjects: shanty houses, crates, cabinets, and fish skeletons. Most of these were rendered in monochromatic greys, greens, and yellows. They created the effect of palpable neglect and misery, a world of want.

Art critics noted the development of skills and techniques that would later characterize his body of work. His paintings of barungbarong or shanties were a study on perspective. The sizes and forms of the houses allowed him to sharpen his skill in rendering illusions of depth. The juxtaposition of different objects with varying colours allowed him to work on portraying distance. These incremental changes did not go unnoticed. In 1955, Calesa won third prize in the Shell National Students Art Competition. In 1959, The Bird was awarded first prize by the Art Association of the Philippines.

The 1960s was a prolific decade for the painter. It was during this time that he created his android series and still life series. When Ang began dabbling in depicting androids, he rendered human anatomy as geometrical examinations carefully transitioned to man as a machine. Not only did joints and limbs and heads become geometric planes, but they also became blades, sheets of metal, interlocking gears. The android was the epitome of man as he saw it: alone and desolate. On Ang's canvas, man has ceased being man, and is far removed from his nature.

It was also during this phase that Vicente Manansala, his lifelong friend and mentor, introduced Ang to Christian iconography. Manansala was commissioned to work on the "14 Stations of the Cross" murals for the University of the Philippines chapel at Diliman, Quezon City. Ang was his assistant.

This was the same decade that he began to be acknowledged as a worthy artist. In 1961, he was recognized as Outstanding Overseas Chinese in Art by the Overseas Chinese Affairs Office. In 1963, he was awarded various prizes by the Art Association of the Philippines for his works: Still Life in Red, Fish, and Geometric Still-Life Fish.

The year 1965 proved to be pivotal in his artistic development. When he went on his first trip to the United States with Manansala, he was exposed to a highly commercialized and industrialized society. He saw individuals who were isolated, alienated, and dehumanized.

After such an experience, his works resonated with powerful metaphors of anguish, dissatisfaction, and anger. Images such as knives, tongues of fire, claws, and fangs began to emerge from his canvasses. He began to ascend the pinnacle of his surrealist, cubist, and expressionist influences.

The 1970s saw the emergence of his series on domesticated animals, such as dogs and cocks (roosters), yielding to their fearsome nature. Dogs are seen baring their fangs in rabid frenzy. Cocks are poised to slit their challengers. No other artist has presented such fierce and aggressive images: metaphors of man's own menacing tendencies.

Of all the recurring themes the artist explored, his most seminal works were those involving Christian iconography. In the 1960s, Ang began the Crucifixion series. During this phase, he began to weave intricately together his Chinese ancestry, his conversion to Catholicism, and his insights of the world. The medium was the Chinese brush and ink on ecru, or off-white rice paper. The figures of Christ were shown in varied poses of excruciating pain. The geometric representations of Christ's body were a confluence of his works on androids. Paradoxically, while Christ became mechanical the grotesque positions and images seemed to heighten his suffering. Far from the sanitized images of Christ's crucifixion and death, Ang's works were distorted and disconcerting, an honest account of suffering, death, and salvation.

It was not mere coincidence that this mild-mannered man created his most violent and gruesome works at a time of stark repression, the Martial Law years. Although not a vocal critic of the Marcos regime, his visual representations of people living in squalour, contorted scenes of cruelty, and domestic animals such as rabid dogs and frenzied roosters in violent stances, were protest enough. He painted the world as honestly as he saw it: grim and ghastly.

In later years the public began to accept and embrace the visions he brought forth. He was known and appreciated for his figurative expressionistic style. In 1980, his Images of Modern Angst was a finalist in the Mobil Art Awards, sponsored by Mobil Oil Philippines through the Mobil Art Foundation. In 1990, he was featured with Onib Olmedo and Solomon Saprid in a show entitled, Three Figurative Expressionists, held at the Cultural Center of the Philippines. Figurative expressionism is a style characterized by its distortion of figures to represent emotions. Similar to Ang, Olmedo and Saprid amplified devices of distortion and warping to convey horridness of the human condition.

Throughout his years of painting, he maintained the intensity and stamina of a great artist dedicated to his craft. He drew and painted everyday, comfortably shifting media: oil, watercolour, acrylic, ink, and gouache. He once revealed that he sometimes worked on six to eight paintings at the same time. As he toiled daily on a chosen theme, he produced an average of ten sketches a day. When he finally arrived at the form and angle that best captured it, he transferred this form to canvas. His painstaking efforts to find the perfect form belied the swiftness of his work on the canvas. It was but typical for him to finish a large painting in about four days.

On 9 May 2004, Ang succumbed to cancer. His remains lie at the Libingan ng mga Bayani (Heroes Memorial Park, reserved for Filipinos with outstanding service to the nation — national heroes, including national artists and scientists).

His works remain mesmerizing and compelling in museums in countries around the world. More significantly, his works remain burning in our memories.

"It is not a pretty world," the painter said. Human life is riddled with pain and privation. Ang rendered this truth in his works, all sublime and transcendental.

Ang Peng Siong

(洪秉祥, Hong Bingxiang, 1962–)

Sportsman, national swimmer, two-time Olympian, Singapore

The fourth of five children born to Ang Teck Bee (a judo Olympian of 1964 and a former pool supervisor at Farrer Park), Ang Peng Siong (born on 27 October 1962) is best known in Singapore for having once ranked number one in the 50 metre freestyle. His record time of 22.69 seconds, which he set in 1982 at the United States Nationals, remains the Singapore national record. Ever since his father taught him to swim at the age of five, Ang Peng Siong's swimming techniques have grown from strength to strength. Much of Ang's success may be attributed to his father, who placed him on a strict weight training routine from a young age when most coaches believed it was damaging to the athlete. Due to the strict physical training regime of his father, Ang has a high regard for the man. Indeed, he considers his father to be a role model, leader, disciplinarian and motivator.

In addition to his father, Ang was also fortunate to have dedicated swim coaches in the form of Anglo-Chinese School teachers, Wee Moh Nam and Lenn Wei Ling. He met both these men at the Anglo-Chinese School Shaw Pool and they trained him rigorously. As he was a very gifted swimmer, he was readily accepted into the strong Anglo-Chinese School swimming family even though he was then a student of Anderson Secondary School. Eventually, he became a student of Anglo-Chinese School and was able to continue both his formal education and swimming training there.

By 1977, Ang had already established himself as one of the budding swimming talents in Asia when he won a silver medal in the 4×100 metre freestyle relay in the Southeast Asian Games in Kuala Lumpur. This further propelled him into the sport. In 1978, Ang made his debut at the Asian Games at the young age of 16, and went on to represent Singapore at the Olympics in Los Angeles in 1984 and in Seoul in 1988.

His truly first international competition occurred at the Hawaii International Invitational Swimming Championship in 1980. Whilst there, he was put in the spotlight when he became the only non-American swimmer to qualify for the 50 metre freestyle final. His excellent performance there, as well as his dedication to the sport resulted in him receiving a full athletic scholarship from the University of Houston.

While at Houston, he trained under swim coach Phil Hansel from 1980–86. Simultaneously juggling his swimming career and his academic studies, Ang rose from strength to strength. Hansel's coaching paid off when Ang won the first National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) men's title for the University of Houston. To be precise, Ang won the 50 yard Freestyle sprint title at the 1983 NCAA Division One Swimming Championships, a championship dubbed by sports pundits as one of the "most exciting and fastest swim meets in the world". He also finished second place in the 50-yard Freestyle at the 1984 NCAA Division One Swimming Championships.

Following closely upon his success at the Hawaii International Invitational Swimming Championship, Ang rose to the occasion at the Los Angeles Olympics by clinching the consolation final of the 100 metre freestyle in a national record of 51.09 seconds. Prior to the Olympics, Ang had already risen to national acclaim in the Asian Games in New Delhi in 1982 and by winning a bronze medal in the Asian Games at Seoul in 1986. His achievements to the Singapore sports scene led to national acknowledgement of his skills and he was named Sportsman of the Year for three consecutive years in 1982, 1983, and 1984 by the Singapore National Olympic Council. He was also inducted into the Singapore Sports Council Hall of Fame.

The 1980s were his golden period when he competed in many events and clinched several medals. 1982 was truly a golden year for Ang as he won the gold medal at the US Nationals in 22.69 seconds. For that achievement, he was dubbed the 'World's Fastest Swimmer' of 1982 by Swimming World magazine. It is a record that is still marvelled at today. Ang had many such achievements throughout the 1980s. For instance, he was placed first in the 100 metre freestyle for the Olympic B finals in 1984 after finishing at 51.09 seconds. He had missed the A finals of the Seoul Olympics by only one place. Although he has not competitively swum since the mid-1990s, Ang continues to be active in the sport. Indeed, he has participated regularly in one of the premier international swimming competitions, the World Masters, since 2000. The dedication with which he keeps himself in form was evident in 2002 when he clocked 24.64 seconds for the 50 metre free style at the World Masters in Christchurch. This timing is remarkable because it is only two seconds off his personal best record when he was aged 20.

Despite his retirement from competitive swimming in recent years, Ang still holds the record for the world's best time of 22.69 seconds for the 50 metre freestyle in 1982. Unfortunately, that record was set before the event was officially recognized in the Olympics. However, Ang repeated that feat in the Seoul Olympics in 1988 when the event was finally introduced. He held the fastest time by an Asian for the 50 metre freestyle event until 1996, and his time of 22.69 seconds remains a Southeast Asian record, thereby continuing to inspire young swimmers in Asia.

At the time of his retirement from competitive swimming in August 1993, Ang needed to raise $75,000 to compete in the Asian Games. However, sponsorship was not forthcoming. Two years later, in 1995, he established the Aquatic Performance Swim School at Farrer Park so as to promote swimming as a competitive sport and to encourage sponsor interest in the sport. Through the Aquatic Performance Swim School, Ang has trained national swimmers like Leslie Kwok and Mark Chay. He also coaches swimmers from the Singapore Paralympics Team.

Currently, he is deemed to be semi-retired from competitive swimming and has been head coach of the Singapore swimming team at the Southeast Asian Games, Asian Games, Commonwealth Games and Olympic Games, and has since become a member of the board of directors of the Singapore Sports School. In 2004, he quit his position as managing director of the Aquatic Performance Swim School so as to devote his time and attention to planning the policies and objectives of the national team with the Singapore Swimming Association. Furthermore, he has also established the Ang

Peng Siong Swim School where he continues to nurture the swimming talent of Singapore by promoting a water safe society, competitive swimming as a healthy sport, increasing the number of swim meets, promoting professionalism in swim coaching and teaching, as well as promoting synchronised swimming and quality learn-to-swim programmes.

Ang, Samuel Dee

Surgical oncologist, Philippines

Dr Samuel Dee Ang is a renowned surgical oncologist in the Philippines, who, throughout his career, has operated on politicians, celebrities, the clergy, taipans, and the poor alike. Earlier on, he had chosen to return to the Philippines to serve his countrymen, giving up a very lucrative practice in the United States.

Ang was born on 31 March 1951, the eighth among ten siblings. He has eight sisters and a brother, all born in Davao City, in the southern island of Mindanao. His parents, Ang Sin Tong and Dee So Cho, were from Nan'an in Fujian Province, China. Ang is the only one in his family to have pursued a professional medical career. His other siblings are all in business.

The Angs were one of the two major clans in Davao, Philippines. While most Chinese Filipinos in other parts of the Philippines were originally mainly from Jinjiang, most of those in Davao were from Nan'an, where the surnames Ang and Te were dominant. In fact, elder Chinese describe Davao as "Ang Thi Te Tue" (洪天载地), a Hokkien term which literally means "the Angs occupy the sky, the Tes occupy the earth." Ang's grandfather had been trading in Zamboanga in Mindanao during the late nineteenth century. He died just before Ang's father, Ang Sin Tong, was born. Ang Sin Tong came to the Philippines in 1917 to help his older brother, Ang Ang Tiong, who had already built a flourishing business by then. After a few years with the business, the younger Ang went back to China to marry Dee So Cho at an arranged wedding. The latter then followed her husband to the Philippines in the early 1930s. All their ten children were born practically one after the other between 1935 and 1955.

Ang's parents were hard-working people. His father sold copra and had a small variety store as well as a small restaurant business to feed the family of twelve. Ang had a typically Chinese-Filipino upbringing — helping out with the family business by watching over their store as well as helping around the kitchen of their small restaurant.

Among Ang's relatives include famous artist Ang Kiukok and successful engineer Alfredo Ang Hua Sing. Throughout Ang's childhood, it was his mother who carried the responsibility of looking after the family because his father was sickly and eventually died in 1965. At the time, he was just fourteen years old. He wanted to be an engineer like his cousin, Alfredo, but his mother's counsel paved the way for the young boy to choose medicine instead. He fondly recalls his mother being a natural healer, sought after for the treatment of ailments and injuries. When he was still young he noticed people paying her visits at their home.

After graduating from Davao Chinese School in 1967, Ang took Biology at Ateneo de Davao University from where he graduated in 1971 cum laude. From there, he took a proper course in medicine at the University of Santo Tomas where he graduated magna cum laude in 1975. Ang had actually applied for admission at two local universities — the University of the Philippines (UP) and the University of Santo Tomas (UST). However, as he was a Chinese citizen prior to the Naturalization Law of 1975, his application was rejected by UP due to citizenship issues. His entry to UST was not without difficulties either, as he had to overcome the foreign citizenship quota at the time. UST had instituted a quota of five foreign students from a pool of 120 applicants. Ang was chosen along with two other Philippine-born Chinese and two American citizens. He passed the Medical Board examinations in 1976, the year he was granted Philippine citizenship. He then decided to take up his general surgery residency at the Graduate School of the University of Pennsylvania, an Ivy League school in the United States. Before his departure from the Philippines in 1977, he married Vilma Uy. He was the first in his family to go overseas. After passing the American Medical board examinations with excellence, he was accepted for the surgical oncology fellowship at the Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center in New York. He was also later certified as a diplomate of the American Board of Surgery in 1983.

Ang returned to the Philippines in 1984 because of his ailing mother and took care of her until she passed away that same year. This was a year of many activities for Ang, as he opened his first clinic in the Chinese General Hospital. That same year, he was certified as a diplomate of the Philippine Board of Surgery, a credentialing board that certifies Filipinos as capable of practising surgery in the country. He also took up two teaching jobs — at UP and at his alma mater, UST. Due to his increasing duties, he later gave up his faculty job in UP, but kept the teaching position at UST as an assistant professor. In 1991, the United States beckoned him again, this time through the Wilshire Oncology Group in Los Angeles, the biggest private cancer group in the United States at that time, consisting of sixteen oncologists.

In 1993, Ang decided to return to the Philippines for good. He had wanted to stay in the United States to give his four children a better education, but they convinced him to go back home to use his skills better by helping his countrymen. The Chinese General Hospital gave him back his old clinic. A year later, William Quasha, the head of St Luke's Medical Center, invited him to head the newly formed Cancer Institute. Ang did this for eight years, and due to his contributions, he was elevated to director emeritus of the Cancer Institute. Subsequently, the Cardinal Santos Medical Center asked Ang to be chairman of the hospital's Department of Surgery. He also became chairman of the Philippine Board of Surgery in 2005. He has other prestigious honours, and is a proud member of various scientific societies, both in the Philippines and the United States. In his home country, he is a member of the Surgical Oncology Society of the Philippines, and a fellow in the Philippine College of Surgeons; in the United States, he is a fellow of the American College of Surgeons, and a member of the Society of Surgical Oncology, an institution based in Atlanta.

In his private capacity as a surgical oncologist, he has been keeping a database of all his patients. He hopes that one day this database can form part of a national database on survival rates of various cancers in the Philippines. He is now actively involved in the launching of the Philippine's Breast Cancer Society. His professional career spans many years and he has helped many people from all walks of life. He has operated on prominent citizens such as politicians, tycoons, and taipans, and has also done surgeries for people from the religious sector, which he does for free, seeing it as his way of helping people who selflessly do God's work.

Apart from his involvement in esteemed organizations and his practice, Ang has written various publications, both locally and in the United States. One of his notable contributions is a chapter on nutritional support in a book entitled, Parenteral Nutrition, edited by Professor John Rombeau of the University of Pennsylvania.

Ang now serves as associate medical director for the Chinese General Hospital, and also director for the Cancer Center of the Cardinal Santos Medical Center. All his four children have followed in his footsteps and pursued careers in medicine.

Ang-See, Teresita

(洪玉华, Hong Yuhua, 1949–)

Social activist, scholar, community leader, Philippines

Teresita Ang-See, wife of the late Chinben See (施振民), is a leading social activist, crime fighter and advocate for the integration of the Chinese into mainstream Philippine society. She is also a scholar of Chinese-Philippine studies and promoter of Chinese cultural heritage in the Philippines.

Teresita Ang was born on 25 December 1949 in Manila. Her father, Jose Ang, migrated from Fujian when he was eight years old to work in a restaurant near Divisoria, a marketplace in Manila. He received very little formal education but taught himself to read. Teresita's mother, Carmen Davenport Barraca was a Filipino-American mestiza who received two years of college education in pre-war Manila. They were married during the Japanese occupation of the Philippines. Jose Ang passed away at the age of 44, leaving Carmen to raise their eleven children. Teresita and her siblings knew the hardship of life from childhood, taking on odd jobs during summer vacations for their school needs. Her mother paid attention to her children's education and Teresita did very well as a student. She finished primary education as valedictorian at Anglo-Chinese School. She was an honour student through four years of high school at Chiang Kai Shek College. She obtained a four-year university scholarship and eventually graduated in 1971 from the University of the Philippines with a B.A. degree in Political Science.

After graduation, Teresita joined the Pagkakaisa Sa Pag-unlad (合一协进会 Unity for Progress) a Chinese-Filipino organization which advocated the integration of Philippine Chinese into mainstream Philippine society. Pagkakaisa, organized in 1971, actively lobbied for the adoption of jus soli principle of citizenship by birth at the Constitutional Convention convened that year to amend the Philippine Constitution.

With her degree from the University of the Philippines she could have opted to work in the corporate world but she chose to serve as the Executive Secretary of Pagkakaisa Sa Pag-unlad from 1971 to 1976. She led young college students, most of whom were children of affluent families, in volunteer work in indigent communities and in rural areas. She recounts: "I didn't expect that in my job, I had to help our volunteers to cross the street. These young adults have not experienced crossing a busy street in congested communities before."

When a big flood devastated Central Luzon in 1972, she led volunteers to the flooded areas, first riding a bus, transferring to an amphibian truck, and then to motorized bancas to reach the communities. "We slept in church pews with flood water under the benches and rain leaking from the roof. The difficulties were eye-opening experiences for our young volunteers," she reminisced. They went to rural areas on medical missions, meeting old people who shared that they had never seen a doctor in their lives before.

In 1975, just before the Philippines' establishment of diplomatic ties with the People's Republic of China, then-President Ferdinand E. Marcos relaxed the nation's policy on foreigners' acquisition of Philippine citizenship in the hope that not too many Philippine Chinese would become citizens of communist China. Pagkakaisa took the opportunity to encourage and actively help the Philippine Chinese to apply for local citizenship. Teresita, who was still in Manila then, worked a seven-day week to help indigent Chinese applicants fulfill their requirements. Close to 90 per cent of ethnic Chinese living in the Philippines became Filipino citizens by virtue of Marcos' Administrative Decree.

It was in the course of their work that Teresita met her husband Chinben See, at that time the Director of the organization for Southern Philippines. They were married in Taiwan where Chinben had a research fellowship at the Academia Sinica from 1975-78. Upon their return to the Philippines, Chinben and Teresita gathered the former Pagkakaisa core group members together especially when there were pressing issues affecting the Chinese-Filipino community. They started writing a column called "Crossroads" (十字街口) published in the Orient News (《东方日报》) during martial law. In 1983, upon the assassination of former Senator Benigno S. Aquino, the couple, together with Pagkakaisa core group members, started work to revive and reorganize the group. The Philippine economy was at its worst after the assassination because foreign investors pulled out and funding agencies refused to channel more funds to support the Marcos dictatorship.

During the 1986 EDSA revolution, Chinben and Teresita, together with other former Pagkakaisa members, participated in the People Power Revolution. Chinben was at that time diagnosed with liver cancer but continued to actively promote the cause until he was bedridden. He passed away that same year. Having lost the family breadwinner, Teresita took several part-time jobs to have flexible working hours and at the same time look after their two children, ages one and nine. The restoration of democracy after the fall of the Marcos government gave ample space for non-government organizations. Former members of Pagkakaisa and other like-minded young Chinese Filipinos, reorganized the Pagkakaisa into a new organization, Kaisa Para Sa Kaunlaran (华裔青年联合会) to continue Chinben's unfinished work. After some hesitation and reluctance due to family responsibilities, Teresita took up the challenge and responsibilities to be the founding president of Kaisa. They worked with the Chinese-Filipino community to hasten its full integration as a significant part of the country by participating in its social and political processes. With the help of all sectors of the Chinese-Filipino community, she spearheaded the foundation of the Kaisa Heritage Center which houses the Bahay Tsinoy — Museum of the Chinese in Philippine Life, the Kaisa Research and Data Bank, and the Chinben See Memorial Library.

Apart from promoting cultural activities Teresita was also a socio-political activist. In the 1990s the state of law and order in Manila deteriorated and many Chinese-Filipino businessmen were kidnapped by kidnap-for-ransom syndicates, some of which were linked to law enforcers. She came out to defend the kidnapped victims despite being threatened many times. Her children and her own safety were at stake but she did not back down. As a tribute to her the local Chinese newspaper called her "the Hua Mulan of the Philippines." (Hua Mulan was a young maiden during China's Northern Wei Dynasty who disguised herself as a man to join the army — in place of her aging father — to expel invading Mongols.) Teresita's courage in the face of adversity and her work for integration brought her recognition not only from the Chinese-Filipino community but also the Philippine government. President Corazon Aquino awarded her the "Outstanding Women in the Nation's Service" in 1992. During President Joseph Estrada's administration she was appointed member of the Presidential Anti-Organized Crime Commission. In 1993, she helped organize the Movement for Restoration of Peace and Order and the Citizens Action Against Crime, two of the country's leading anti-crime NGOs that worked actively to fight against the scourge of kidnapping and for reforms in the criminal justice system.

In 2005, in recognition for her work as a staunch advocate of peace and order, she was among the 27 Filipino women included in the 1,000 women of the world nominated for the Nobel Peace Award.

Teresita has long realized that scholarly pursuit is important in promoting the welfare of the Philippine Chinese community. Like her late husband, she became active in the study of the ethnic Chinese in the Philippines, not only nationally but also internationally. Teresita busied herself presenting academic papers in international conferences and was involved in establishing the International Society for the Study of Chinese Overseas (ISSCO) in San Francisco in 1992. She was subsequently President (2004–07) and currently the Secretary and Treasurer of ISSCO (2007–13).

With Kaisa as publisher, Teresita has written and co-authored more than 16 books, mostly on the Chinese in the Philippines. Among them are Tsinoy — the Story of the Chinese in Philippine Life, a coffee table book that documents the history of the early Chinese immigrants and their transformation to today's Tsinoys, significant members of mainstream Philippine society and the three volumes of Chinese in the Philippines: Problems and Perspectives published in 1990, 1997 and 2004 respectively. She delivers lectures and papers in local and international academic conferences.

Teresita has one daughter (Meah) and one son (Sean), who are both involved in teaching and research, Meah in Education and Sean in Chemistry.

Aquino, Corazon Cojuangco

(1933–2009)

President, Republic of the Philippines

When Corazon Cojuangco Aquino was proclaimed President of the Philippines, she was recognized as the first female president not only in the Philippines, but also in Asia.

The 1986 People Power Revolution, which catapulted Aquino into the presidency, proved that a drastic change in government, in both form and leaders, need not be marred by violence and bloodshed. The first television revolution enabled the world to witness different Filipinos from all walks of life coming together to overthrow the Marcos leadership. Instead of guns and ammunition, they brought flowers and offered rosaries and prayers.

People from all over the world admired the peaceful transition and Corazon C. Aquino was the centre and stronghold of this pivotal moment in history. She became an international symbol for peace.

In the aftermath of the People Power Revolution, similar revolutions took place in different countries: the Velvet Revolution in Czechoslovakia, Solidarity in Poland, the anti-apartheid protests in South Africa. Through these sweeping movements against authoritarian and dictatorship regimes, there was renewed belief in the change that can be achieved by non-violent protest — the influence of People Power in the Philippines.

The Aquino administration moulded the country in various ways. It was responsible for drafting the 1987 Philippine Constitution that restored democracy in the country. The political institutions that were newly restored or newly created slowly began to take their place in the structure of the government. It hurdled several coup d'état attempts that threatened to overthrow Aquino's presidency. It also led the country's economy towards the road to recovery. Most of all, it was responsible for the country's generally peaceful transition from a military to a democratic government.

Even after her presidency, Aquino continued to be a pillar of democracy in Philippine politics. When there were movements to oust then President Joseph Estrada for his string of political controversies, Aquino lent her support to what was dubbed EDSA People Power II. When former President Gloria Macapagal-Arroyo was charged with tampering with the electoral system, Aquino advised Arroyo to step down. Whenever there were threats to the democratic system — schemes to change the 1987 Philippine Constitution, plans to prolong the term of the president, policies that violated democratic rights — Aquino was there to reprimand leaders and remind them of their responsibilities.

Amazingly, Aquino did not personally choose to be an icon for democracy. She was thrust into the limelight and the fight for freedom when her husband, Senator Benigno Aquino Jr., was assassinated in 1983.

The Senator's outspoken criticism of the Marcos Administration earned him the ire of the authoritarian president. The ensuing years of his life, as well as the lives of his wife and their five children, were beset with the difficulty of his imprisonment for seven years, his campaigning from his prison cell, and his subsequent heart attack and exile in the United States.

In 1983, the country was going through political unrest, with Marcos' health deteriorating and different political forces clamouring for domination. During this time, Benigno expressed his desire to return to the Philippines in spite of the threat to his life. On 21 August 1983, while he was disembarking from the airplane, he was gunned down by an assassin. His death, though not unexpected, gripped the country with disbelief and outrage.

From the tumultuous political and social events that followed, Corazon Cojuangco Aquino stepped out of the shadow of her slain husband and became the symbol of hope for the country. When President Marcos declared snap elections in 1985, she competed with him for the presidency. The election results were believed to be fraudulent with the systemic use of guns, gold, and goons, in favour of Marcos.

On 22 February 1986, the military, headed by then Defense Secretary Juan Ponce Enrile and head of Philippine Constabulary, Fidel V. Ramos, broke away from the Marcos administration. Aquino, together with Roman Catholic Church Archbishop Jaime Cardinal Sin, called upon the Filipino people to take their protest to the streets and convene in the Epifanio Delos Santos Avenue (EDSA). This led to the 1986 People Power Revolution. Corazon C. Aquino made the great leap from being in the background to being in the limelight as the country's first woman president.

This was a far cry from Aquino's childhood spent in Tarlac, where she was born on 25 January 1933. The green fields of Tarlac, flourishing with sugar and rice crops, are comparable to the lands of Fujian, China. The similarity of Tarlac's land to the Cojuangco patriach's past homeland and the promise that it symbolized might have been crucial in luring him to bring his family to take root in this land.

In a state visit to China during her presidency, she made a side trip to the Hongjian manucipality in Zhangzhou, Fujian province, to meet the Co (许) relatives of her migrant ancestor, Co Giok Huan, who sailed to the Philippines in the 1800s. A son (Aquino's great-grandfather, Jose), later contracted their Chinese name from Co Giok Huan to Cojuangco, which she, a fifth-generation descendant, and her other relatives, still use.

On conversion to the Catholic faith, Jose Cojuangco and his wife, Antera Estrella, had three children —Ysidra, Melecio, and Trinidad, whom they nurtured to become productive and responsible members of society.

Melecio Cojuangco, being the only son, was encouraged to pursue a higher education. He was given the best education in preparation of his being the leader of the clan. On 16 October 1907, he was inducted as a member of the first Philippine Assembly. Unfortunately, his promising career ended early with a heart attack.

His four sons — Jose, Juan, Antonio, and Eduardo Sr. — were nurtured by his father, and then by his sisters, Ysidra and Trinidad. Of the three, Ysidra proved to be the greatest influence on the brothers' lives. When they became of age, each was given his own responsibility in the management and supervision of the family's growing business.

The eldest, Jose, married Demetria Sumulong, a descendant of a powerful family in the Rizal province. They had eight children — Ceferino, Pedro, Josephine, Teresita, Carmen, Corazon, Jose, Jr., and Maria Paz. While managing the Paniqui Sugar Mill, Jose was also a member of the Philippine Assembly, representing the First District of Tarlac. He also became president of the Philippine Bank of Commerce, the first 100-per cent Filipino owned private bank in the Philippines, which he and his brothers founded with the support of their aunt, Ysidra.

Jose Jr.'s sixth child, Corazon, took after his introversion and shyness. At an early age, she was exposed to the political leanings of her family. It was said that her mother was an indefatigable campaign manager for her father and even her brothers and sisters were involved in the campaign activities. It was only the young Corazon who constantly shied away from the limelight.

When the Second World War broke out, the family moved to the United States for their safety. She and her sisters continued their studies at Raven Hill Academy and then later at Notre Dame Convent School. Corazon Cojuangco obtained a bachelor's degree, with a majors in mathematics and minor in French, from the College of Mount St Vincent. Although most of her younger years were spent in the United States, she and her family went home regularly to the Philippines to rekindle their ties.

After graduating from university, Corazon Cojuangco returned to Manila for good. She enrolled in law school at the Far Eastern University because she was interested in the discipline involved in the profession. Meanwhile, she and Benigno Aquino Jr. continued their courtship that had begun during her junior year in university in the United States. They married on 11 October 1954, and were both twenty-one at the time.

On assuming the presidency, Corazon Aquino earned the distinction of being Time Magazine's Woman of the Year, the first woman to be awarded this since 1952, when Queen Elizabeth II was newly crowned. Her unique experience earned her an invitation to speak before the Congress of the United States of America, where she thanked the United States for its support for the resurgence of democracy in the Philippines.

Over the next twenty years, Aquino's voice of compassion and integrity acted as a barometer for politicians and public officials. For her, the words "Public Service is a Public Trust", never rung more true. She stood as a living reminder of that trust even when standing at the frontline during the impeachment of President Joseph Estrada in 2001.

In 2008 the Aquino family announced sad news of her fight with colon cancer. Filipinos expressed their commiseration through prayers and various forms of support. Her condition continued to worsen amidst fervent prayers for her recovery and on 1 August 2009, she passed away and the nation was swept with grief. Thousands of Filipinos flocked to her wake to pay their last respects. Hundreds of thousands gathered in the streets, thousands of Filipinos escorted the casket of their dear president. The outpouring of sorrow and grief was shown in the shower of yellow confetti that fell from the sky, the flowers and photos that lined her house, and the yellow ribbons worn by Filipinos. Even as the nation mourned her passing, it vowed to safeguard her legacy of democracy.

On 30 June 2010, her son, Benigno Cojuangco Aquino III, was sworn in as the fifteenth president of the Republic of the Philippines. On him rests the legacy of his parents, and the hope of the Filipino people, whose only desire is to be lifted from poverty, and live dignified lives.

Aung Twin

(苏天发, Su Tianfa, 1936–)
Artist, Myanmar

U Aung Twin is a talented artist in both visual and performing arts. Due to his outstanding drawing and sketching of the "Lawka Chantha Abaya Laba Muni Buddha image" and its moulding scale model, which happens to be the world's largest marble Buddha image, U Aung Twin was awarded a Medal for Excellent Performance in Social Field (Second Class) by the Government of the Union of Myanmar in 2002. He has delivered lectures on the performing arts in university as a professor, and he is currently an adviser with the Ministry of Culture, Myanmar.

U Aung Twin, born on 31 March 1936, is a third-generation Hokkien Chinese in Rangoon (now Yangon), Myanmar. He was the second child of U Chian Soon (Su Chain Soon) and Daw Kyin Hmone (Tan Kyin Hmone). His father was also born in Rangoon while his grandfather, Su Chain Ku, and grandmother, Tan Shu Wa, were migrants from Fujian Province, China, who settled in Rangoon during the prosperous years of the British Administration in Burma. His grandfather opened a small grocery shop at Sooratee Night Bazaar in Kyimyingdaing (West Yangon) after his arrival in Rangoon, with the financial support of a Pashu (Nyonya) lady who had migrated from Penang, and became a family friend. U Aung Twin was thus brought up in a family of mixed traditional Hokkien and Straits Chinese cultures.

As a child and teenager, U Aung Twin was educated in a Myanmar Buddhist school, an English missionary school, and later a Chinese school. He started primary and secondary education at a private school in Kyimyindaing township in Yangon, then at Daw Mya May Buddhist High School, where he met his first art master, U Thein Nyunt, a famous painter (1923–95). He matriculated from St John's Diocesan Boys School in Yangon, the top state high school currently. As a descendant from a traditional Chinese family, he was once sent to study Chinese for one year in Zhong Hua Primary School (中华小学) in 1947. The school was situated in Strand Road, Ahlone township in Rangoon, but has ceased to exist since 1962, when the military government under former General Ne Win took control of the country and nationalized all education institutions during his reign.

U Aung Twin was trained at the Teachers' Training College in Rangoon, but it was his further studies in the Fine Arts that really had an impact on his career. In 1960 he graduated with a bachelor of arts degree from the University of Rangoon (now University of Yangon), majoring in arts. Dissatisfied with his training, he actually visited China, two years before his graduation, to check out possibilities to further his studies. In 1965 he obtained a diploma in fine arts with a scholarship funded by the Chinese Government under a Cultural Exchange Programme of the Central Academy of Fine Arts (北京中央美术学院), an institution of the Chinese Government Ministry of Education, becoming one of the few Myanmar Chinese who furthered their education in Chinese studies during the turbulent years in Myanmar. In China, U Aung Twin learnt from famous artists such as painter sculptor U Hla Tin (1914–93), painter U Ba Kyi (1912–2000), who was well known for his graceful Buddhist murals. U Aung Twin also learnt Chinese painting and sculpture there from renowned contemporary Chinese artists such as Liu Kaiqu (刘开渠, 1904–93), and the then principal of the Central Academy of Fine Arts and professor Fu Tian Chou (傅天仇, 1920–90).

Besides the above mentioned award-winning artwork, U Aung Twin has done a lot of sculpture works as well, including colouring clay figures of a Myanmar couple in traditional costume, a duet dance in plaster of Paris, a princess in ceramic, a solo dance in postline, a variety of clay figures of people at the Myanmar palace, a Chinese steel worker in terracotta and postline, figures of Ramayana, Puppet belu (Orga), and Puppet Zaw gyi (Necromencer), etc.

In Myanmar, U Aung Twin has held several high profile exhibitions, some examples of which are the Annual Arts Exhibition (1957) at the Fine Arts Association of the University of Rangoon; the Annual Arts Exhibition (1960) at the Department of Education; the Annual Arts Exhibition (1962) at the Burma Arts Council; the Annual Arts Exhibition (1963) at the Burma Translation Society; the Ten Flower Arts Exhibition (2001) at the Envoy Hall, Yangon; the 57th Arm Forces Day Art Exhibition (2001) in Yangon, and the Golden Jubilee of Fine Arts School Exhibition in Yangon. Outside Myanmar, he has reportedly held several arts exhibitions in countries such as the Soviet Union (1973), Thailand (1991 and 1993), Japan, Yugoslavia, and Brunei Darussalam (1997), Vietnam (1998), Cambodia (2000), and Beijing, China (2001).

U Aung Twin last held the position of director of production at the Department of Fine Arts with the Ministry of Culture. In 1994, he was the leader of the Myanmar Culture Delegation which paid official visits to Laos, and later in 1995, as a member of Pagoda Festival Ceremony, visited Nepal. He retired on 31 July 1996 and became its adviser. Among other things, he is currently treasurer of the Myanmar Traditional Artists and Artisans Association, and a team member of the ASEAN Culture and Arts Ministerial Level Co-operation. U Aung Twin has continued his contributions to the arts and culture even in his current retirement years.

Besides being a gifted visual artist, U Aung Twin is also a creative choreographer of Myanmar traditional dance. His derivations of dance form from floral design, and ancient and modern Myanmar language alphabet, are good examples. His creations in Myanmar performing dance and costume design have been widely recognized and used in Myanmar performing arts. Through ASEAN culture and arts cooperation, he is able to promote his works in ASEAN countries. He visited Brunei Darussalam as a member of the ASEAN Performing Arts Tour in 1997, and later visited Hanoi, Vietnam, on the ASEAN Performing Arts Tour in 1998. He visited Phnom Penh, Cambodia, in 2000 on the ASEAN Performing Arts Tour, and as a member of the Myanmar Artists Delegation to China, in 2001. His creations, especially the Ramayana style, are still popular in Myanmar and have been appreciated and preserved by the lovers of Myanmar traditional arts. Among other places, it has been staged at the Annual Myanmar Traditional Cultural Performing Arts Competitions sponsored by the Ministry of Culture. Since 2006, the annual competitions have been held in Nay Pyi Taw (the new capital of Myanmar).

As a visiting professor, U Aung Twin delivered lectures on his creative performing arts to students of the Southeast Asian Studies course at the Southeast Asian Studies Centre, Chulalongkorn University, Thailand, during the 2002–04 academic year.

U Aung Twin is married to Daw Khin Nyein Lwin (王秀卿), whose parentage is Hokkien Chinese and Burmese. She became a Chinese teacher after completing Chinese high school education at Nanyang Zhongxue (南洋中学) in Rangoon. They have a son, U Myat San, who runs an accounting and auditor firm after obtaining a bachelor in commerce degree from Yangon University Institute of Economics.

Aw Boon Haw

(胡文虎, Hu Wenhu, 1882–1954)

Pharmaceutical dealer, newspaper publisher, banker, philanthropist, Singapore

Aw Boon Haw was best known as the "Tiger Balm King" for the promotion of the Chinese cure-all "tiger balm". This traditional medical oil is still a household name among overseas Chinese not only in Southeast Asia, but also in many parts of the world. His other major contribution was his newspaper publishing business, especially various Chinese dailies in Southeast Asia, Hong Kong, and mainland China. The most notable Chinese daily that he founded is Sin Chew Jit Poh which continues to be published in Malaysia and Singapore (where it ceased in 1983 after merging with Nanyang Siang Pau to form a new newspaper called Lianhe Zaobao) since 1929. He was also a professional banker who set up Chung Khiaw Bank in both Malaya and Singapore in 1950. The bank was later merged with other local banks to form the current United Overseas Bank (UOB). He was equally well known for his charitable activities. Aw donated a huge sum of money to education, hospitals, orphanages, and homes for elderly. He also built the Haw Par Villa, one in Singapore and the other in Hong Kong; both villas have become tourist attractions in the two cities respectively. His only regret was his controversial visit to Tokyo to meet the then Japanese prime minister during the Second World War, and this visit somewhat tainted his fame as a patriot during the war.

Aw was born in Rangoon, Myanmar (Burma), in 1882. His family was of Hakka roots which could be traced to Eng Teng District (永定县) in Fujian Province, China. In Rangoon, his father (Aw Chu Kin, 胡子钦), together with his uncle, founded a medical shop, the Hall of Everlasting Peace (Eng Aun Tong, 永安堂) as early as 1870. His father had three sons, but the eldest passed away at a young age, leaving Boon Haw, the second eldest, and Boon Par (文豹), the youngest. Aw Boon Haw was said to be very notorious as a child. He played perpetual truant from school and was banished at the age of ten to his family's ancestral village after he was expelled from the school for beating up his teacher. He was then educated in traditional Chinese classics in the village for four years. After his father passed away in 1908, he, together with his brother Boon Par, inherited and managed the business.

It seemed that the two Aw brothers were bequeathed a secret recipe for a pain relieving ointment from a local pharmacist. They perfected the recipe and called it "ban kim ewe" (ten thousand golden oil), which later became known as the Tiger Balm. Apart from the tiger balm, his medical shop also sold other Tiger products such as headache cure (头痛粉), pat kwa tan (八卦丹), chee thone san (止痛散), and "chinkawhite wind mixture" (清快水). Boon Haw made use of his ethnic Hakka ties to sell his ointment to local Chinese medicine shops in Myanmar. He then expanded his business to other parts of Southeast Asia. In 1923, he expanded his business in Singapore by opening a branch in Amoy Street, and in 1926, built a factory in Neil Road. He then turned the Singapore branch into his business headquarters while his younger brother, Boon Par, still remained in Rangoon. In 1932, Aw Boon Haw moved his headquarters to Hong Kong so that he could capture the larger market in China. During the Japanese Occupation, he continued to operate his business in Hong Kong while his brother closed the Singapore branch and went back to Rangoon. After the war, Aw Boon Haw returned to Singapore and re-established his business there. As a result of his success in marketing several of his patented medicine products, he became one of the richest men in Asia then and was known as the tiger balm king. By the mid-1930s, his business empire reached its peak, covering Southeast Asia, Hong Kong, and southern China. In the late 1940s though, his business empire in China faded somewhat as a result of his loss of favour from the Nationalist Kuomingtang Government due to his son's involvement in a currency smuggling incident. It was also rumoured that he cooperated with Japan during the Japanese Occupation.

Aw Boon Haw was also a press magnate. As far back as 1913, he went into the newspaper publishing business by founding Yangguan Jit Poh (仰光日报) and Chen Bao (晨报) in Yangon, but his publishing business only made headway when he founded Sin Chew Jit Poh, a Chinese daily in Singapore in 1929. Two years later, he published another Chinese daily, Sing Hwa Yih Pao (星华日报) in Swatow, Guangdong Province, China, followed by Sing Kong Yih Pao (星光日报) in Amoy in Fujian. In 1935, he founded another Chinese daily in Singapore called Sin Chung Jit Poh. Three years later, he published two additional newspapers, Sing Tao Yih Pao (星岛日报) in Hong Kong, and Sing Pin Jih Pao (星槟日报) in Penang. Then he formed the Sin Poh (Star News) Amalgamated Limited or for short, the Star Group, to manage these newspapers with him as the managing director. After the war in 1946, he founded another Chinese daily, Sing Siam Yih Pao (星暹日报) in Bangkok and his first English daily, the Hong Kong Tiger Standard. On 3 July 1950, he founded his second English daily, the Singapore Tiger Standard in Singapore. In 1952, he published Qianfeng Ribao (前锋日报) in Sarawak. Aw used these newspapers to advertise and promote his Tiger products. Some of his newspapers made losses and had to be cross-subsidized with his medical earnings. The publishing business continued to remain strong in Hong Kong as the Sing Tao Group under his daughter's leadership after his death.

Apart from medicine and publishing businesses, Aw also went into banking and finance. In 1950, he set up Chung Khiaw Bank with the aim of providing banking services for the ordinary people in Singapore and the bank had been described as the "small men's bank". He also established the Public Insurance Company (大众保险) in Singapore and was involved in mining operations in south-west China.

Aw Boon Haw was also well known for his philanthropic activities in Southeast Asia, Hong Kong, and China. His charities covered generous donations to schools, hospitals, maternity clinics, orphanages, homes for aged, and other charitable institutions. In addition, he built two villas, one in Hong Kong in 1936, and another in Singapore in 1937. The villas were formerly known as the Tiger Balm Garden (虎标万金油花园) and later renamed Haw Par Villa (虎豹别墅). Both villas were opened to the general public and have since become one of the renowned tourist attractions in Singapore and Hong Kong respectively. In public service, he was the president of the Singapore Hakka Association, and also founded with Lim Keng Lian (1893–1968), the Chung Cheng High School in 1939. For his contribution, he was conferred the Order of the British Empire by King George VI of Great Britain in 1938 for his "endeavours in commerce and philanthropy". In 1950 he was awarded the title of the "Associated Knight of the Venerable Order of St John of Jerusalem" by the then governor of Hong Kong.

Aw died in Honolulu on 5 September 1954 at the age of seventy-two on his way back to Singapore after his medical operation in Boston in the United States. He left behind four sons and two daughters.

B

(白垚, 1934–)

Intellectual activist, playwright, poet, Malaysia

Bai Yao's original birth name is Lau Pak Yiu (刘伯尧, Liu Boyao) and he is also known as Lau Kwok Kin (刘国坚, Liu Guojian). He was born in 1934 in Guangdong, but lived in Malaysia from 1957–81.

Bai Yao is Lau's well-known pseudonym, but he also uses Linjian (林间), Liuge (刘戈), and Lingleng (凌冷). He received his pre-college education in both China and Hong Kong before studying history at the National Taiwan University. He went to Singapore in 1957, and shortly afterwards, moved to Kuala Lumpur where he worked until emigrating to the United States in 1981. His significant contribution to the Malaysian Chinese community lay in his roles as intellectual activist and influential creative or rebellious writer, with the latter being more conspicuous, tangible, as well as controversial, for many years.

As an intellectual activist, he confined his brainstorming activities indoors, advocating neither violence nor street demonstrations such as public rallies. He could be regarded as working for an ideological group that operated as a balancing force between two rival titanic regimes — the Communist Party in Mainland China and the Kuomintang (KMT) in Taiwan, but Lau himself was never heard to have uttered a word about politics in his contacts with his literary followers. His personal charm and charisma in socializing, guiding and inspiring contemporary youth, stand out most.

Two main vehicles through which this group propagated its ideological programmes were the Student Weekly (学生周报) and Chao Foon Monthly (蕉风月刊). These were literary magazines that published articles contributed by the public. Innumerable young Chinese Malaysians, especially budding writers, were drawn to write for these magazines in a free and self-styled format, at a time when most writers were overwhelmed with proletariat literature. Of the many renowned and accomplished Chinese writers in the cohort, Lau stood out as the most approachable and inspiring poet.

Under the umbrella of the Weekly, the group ran a string of clubs or associations in many parts of Malaya/Malaysia, including Singapore, Batu Pahat, Muar, Malacca, Seremban, Kuala Lumpur, Ipoh, Kuala Kangsa, Taiping, Penang, Alor Star, and Bentong. These clubs offered attractive regular programmes encompassing a choir, drama, dancing, literature, fine arts, and sports. The majority of the club members were school students, many of whom were alienated by, and disoriented in a sea of fast, vast, and confusing socio-political change. Lau or Liu Ge (刘哥) as he was known by all the members, visited the various clubs in bigger towns almost once a month, besides the nationwide gatherings.

The total number of members was no less than 1,000 in any one year, and these clubs were active for a period of fourteen years from 1956 to 1970. Also during this period, fifty-seven major gatherings were held, of which seventeen learning and retreat camps for selected office bearers from the various branches. Each gathering lasted between one and three weeks. The popular locations for such activities were the Cameron Highlands, Fraser's Hill, Port Dickson, Malacca, and Pangkor Island. The Chao Foon Monthly also organized a number of writers' camps for its contributors.

As a drama enthusiast, Lau proposed the creation of the Festival of Musicals and Dramas (歌乐节, Ge Le Jie) in the Kuala Lumpur area. He was responsible for staging the first eleven of the hitherto forty performances.

Lau, as the chief executive organizer of all those activities, shows himself to be a born social engineer with charisma, confidence, and cordiality.

The clubs had probably functioned as a stabilizing factor in Malaysian society in the politically turbulent times, during which their young members by the hundreds were imbued with the perspective of self-realization through educational attainments. They eventually furthered their studies either locally or abroad, having been inspired by their role models and pioneers, of whom Lau was the most salient model of them all.

Furthermore, the two literary magazines had in one way (space for publishing) or another (occasional gatherings for writers) produced no fewer than twenty editors, a large number of writers, and the formation of literary study groups and associations of poets throughout Malaysia, such as Hai Tian (海天), Huang Yuan (荒原), and Xin Chao (新潮).

Lau himself is also a writer, not only a visible but also a controversial one at that. His literary works are distinctively non-ideological and refreshing where proletariat literature prevailed. As a playwright, he earnestly promoted his stage work, Han Li Po (汉丽宝), a drama featuring a princess and her marital life in the court of the early Malay Kingdom. Lau also has two other major plays to his name, which feature local legends and personalities. His mark on local drama history cannot be easily ignored or overlooked.

In China, after the May Fourth Movement in 1919, the masses in China were urged to learn Chinese writing in the modern form (白话文). Thereafter, a score of famous poets in China started writing less structured Chinese poems. The effect was far-reaching. Some Chinese immigrants in then Malaya followed suit. This literary transformation was not a rebellious leap forward until the late 1950s when Lau boldly introduced and promoted vigorously the new format of poetic writing, loosely known as Modern Poetry (新诗).

Whether Lau should be credited with writing the first Chinese modern poem in Malaysia is still hotly debated, but the poem in question is agreeably of the finest quality. This influential poem entitled, "Breathing the Silence at River Muar" (麻河静立), published in March 1959, is acclaimed to be a classic, not just because of its high standard, but more so because it has opened up a whole horizon of poetic writings. As a poet, Lau was rather prolific during that time, and many of his fine poems and other writings in the past fifty years, have been included in his 2007 anthology titled Away from the Green Green Grass of Home (缕云起于绿草). Without any doubt, this volume will become a milestone in the history of literary development especially in the Malaysian Chinese literary community.

Bangayan, Teofilo Tan

Cardiologist, community leader, Philippines

One of the Philippines' most eminent cardiologists, Dr Teofilo Bangayan, boasts a patient list comprising members from the highest echelons of society down to the poorest of the poor. He initiated and organized the first open heart surgery facilities in the Chinese General Hospital (CGH) and the first Intensive Care Unit in the Philippines — thus opening the operating room doors for Filipinos to get their much needed heart surgeries. Bangayan and his wife, Shirley, used their talents and skills to further the cause of alleviating poverty by instituting long-term, sustainable, community-based programmes with a holistic approach. From building houses to developing the community, this heart doctor shows the country what it truly means to live with an open heart.

Born on 23 July 1930, Bangayan was only one, when his mother, Tan Sok, who was in her early thirties, was widowed. She took over the small sari-sari (variety) store her husband, Isabelo, left behind, and despite the hardships, raised Teofilo and his four brothers to be honest and responsible people. Although Tan Sok could not read nor write, she managed to keep the small store in a remote village in Zamboanga thriving. Fondly nicknamed 'Babu Crisanta' (Aunt Christmas Santa) by their neighbours because of her kindness and her genteel and cheerful nature, she shared stories with customers, and even became an unofficial matchmaker to the town's eligible individuals. She allowed the townsfolk to buy groceries on loan and trusted them to pay her back with 'IOUs' that she could neither read nor account for. Despite her own family's hardship, she was willing to give when asked for help. During the Japanese Occupation, she had to close shop and the family survived by selling kangkong (swamp cabbage) in the streets. Two of her five sons were not able to go to school, but together with their third brother, they later became successful copra traders and businessmen. Bangayan, became a doctor. Babu Crisanta, until her demise at age ninety-six, was a good role model and inspiration to her five boys. Bangayan in particular, must have imbibed his mother's spirit of sharing and giving, having literally taken saving lives to heart, not only as a distinguished cardiologist, but through his advocacy of social development work to alleviate poverty and uplift the lives of the poor by turning depressed areas into sustainable communities.

Bangayan graduated from the University of the Philippines College of Medicine in 1958 and finished his graduate course in internal medicine at the New York University Medical School the following year. He had a one-year residency in Internal Medicine at the New York Medical College, one-year senior residency in Internal Medicine at the Washington Hospital Center, and a two-year residency in Clinical Cardiology at the Philadelphia General Hospital. Immediately after the completion of his postgraduate course in Internal Medicine and his residency in Internal Medicine and Cardiology in the United States in 1963, Bangayan returned home to practise and teach at the University of the Philippines-Philippine General Hospital (UP-PGH). The young and active American-trained Bangayan could have stayed on and practised in the United States, but to him, it was not an option as the challenge in his profession lies in the Philippines.

In 1970, he became chair of the Department of Medicine and concurrently the chief of the Department of Cardiology at the CGH in Sta Cruz, Manila. Heart surgery was not yet popular in the Philippines then and only a few closed-heart operations were being done. Patients who had coronary heart diseases and who needed surgery had to go to the United States for operations if they could afford it. Patients who were poor would have no access to surgery because of the prohibitive costs. Even those who only had rheumatic heart diseases could not afford to buy good quality antibiotics for treatment. In 1972, Bangayan initiated and organized the first open-heart surgery facilities in CGH and the first Intensive Care Unit in the Philippines. He invited Dr James Yao, a noted cardiologist from Toronto, Canada, and a team of American nurses and anesthesiologists to the hospital and together with Dr Manuel Tayao, the eight-member team operated on thirteen open-heart surgery patients, all of which were successful. One of the successful open-heart surgery patients happened to be the daughter of then President Ferdinand Marcos' barber. It was this successful undertaking that triggered the idea of having the Philippine Heart Center for Asia built as one of the former First Lady Imelda Marcos' projects.

Bangayan's patients characterize him as being very straightforward and direct when addressing their health concerns and issues, which they like. Years of his reputable practice as a cardiologist enabled Bangayan to gain not only his patients' trust, but also a significant list of 'important' patients who consulted him regularly. The link with these important patients was providential as they have been instrumental for the success of the fund-raising drives launched by Bangayan and his wife, Shirley, in their foray into social development work later on.

In his personal capacity as a cardiologist and medical practitioner, Bangayan, who had access to medical facilities, doctor colleagues, and charity funds, was able to organize, initiate, and mobilize medical missions to far-flung barangays (the smallest political unit in the local government) and medical relief outreach programmes for calamity and typhoon victims. In 1994, the Bangayans, together with their Couples for Christ prayer group comprising entrepreneurs and professionals, founded the Living for Christ Foundation, Inc. (LFCF), which shares blessings with the less fortunate. With their vision of "building educated and self-reliant communities with values anchored on love of God", the group's first project was to adopt and transform the notorious slums in Bagong Silang, Kalookan, extending financial and organizational support to the barangay, and giving seminars on values formation, livelihood, and skills training. Not long afterwards, the LFCF Center in Bagong Silang was built, complete with training and workshop areas, seminar rooms and a chapel for community use, to integrate their community development programme fully. In 1999, the LFCF incorporated a low-cost shelter programme to their community-based development work on the premise that improving homes or having homes to call their own changed people's perspectives and attitudes towards family and community life, imbibing a sense of responsibility as well. The success of the seminal Bagong Silang project was to become the model for Gawad Kalinga's nationwide programme for low-cost housing for the poor.

From 2005 until 2009, Bangayan was the medical director for the CGH and Medical Center. He is a consultant of cardiology and internal medicine at the Makati Medical Center and the UP-PGH, and has been the cardiology consultant of the Philippine Airlines since 1965. He is also a member of various medical and civic associations such as the Philippine Heart Center Association, Philippine College of Physicians, American College of Cardiology, Filipino Chinese Medical Society, Manila Medical and Philippine Medical Association, and the Rotary Club of San Francisco Del Monte.

In recognition of his community service and social work initiatives, Bangayan has received various awards, namely the Presidential Award for Rescue Services, rendered to victims of the Ruby Tower collapse in the 1968 earthquake; the National Service Award, given by Rotary Club of Makati West for mobilizing and leading medical volunteers to help Central Luzon typhoon victims in 1973; the Dr Jose Rizal Lifetime Achievement Award for Medicine and Community Services in 2005; the Ozanam Award of the Ateneo de Manila University in 2006, for distinctive and continued service to fellowmen in accordance with the principles of justice and charity; the Federation of Filipino Chinese Chamber of Commerce, Inc. Award in 2006, for spearheading the Nayong Tsinoy projects, building unity between Chinese Filipinos and the poor through integral poverty alleviation and social formation; the Distinctive Award for Poverty Alleviation conferred by the U.P. Alumni Association during its centennial year, 2008.

Bangayan's wife, Shirley, graduated magna cum laude from St Theresa's College in 1960. She is a certified public accountant and stockbroker who founded her own stock trading firm. The Bangayans have four children: Lorraine, a Chicago-based cardiologist, is married to Homer Abiad, an infectious disease specialist, and they have a daughter, Alia aged 10; Jason, does web designing; Cindy is married to Jonathan Chan, and they are engaged in the car accessories business, own the "Cuts 4 Tots" kiddie salon chain, and have a son, Ivan, aged fourteen and Nina, aged twelve; Maybelle is married to Raymond Kenneth Ti, and has a daughter, Sophie, aged five and a son, Gavin aged one.

Banharn Silpa-archa

(Be Tek Siang, 马德祥, Ma Dexiang, 1932–)
Politician, Thailand

Banharn Silpa-archa, one of the most well established politicians in Thailand, was born on 20 July 1932 (a date later changed to 19 August 1932) into a Teochew immigrant family in the Mueang District of Suphanburi Province, about 100 kilometres north of Bangkok. His father, Be Saeng Kim (马成根), had emigrated from Guangdong Province to Suphanburi in 1907, when the number of Chinese immigrants to Thailand reached a peak. Banharn's parents sold daily consumables at a small shop-cum-house, Yong Yu Hong (永裕丰), in the market town of Suphanburi's Mueang District. The fourth of six children in the family, Banharn was given the Chinese name Be Tek Siang (马德祥), which he retained until the 1940s. A short distance away from Banharn's house was a jewellery shop-cum-house, Chuan Limthong, where his future wife, Jaemsai Lekwat, grew up. She came from a land-owning upper-class Chinese family, which, in addition to trading in gold, had interests in rice milling. Banharn and Jaemsai often played together when they were small.

The fortunes of Banharn's family rose considerably soon after his birth. His father won a public bid to acquire a then-legal opium plant and an alcohol distillery in Suphanburi. The distillery produced a whisky called Mae Nam Suphan (Suphan River). In 1947 Be Saeng Kim used his enhanced wealth to found the Chinese Association of Suphanburi and became its first president. (His photo still hangs at the entrance of the association.) He also opened what was then the only five-star hotel in Suphanburi — Sai Au — which Banharn's elder sister, Sai Jai, managed. In addition, Be Saeng Kim launched a beverage retail shop named Thai Sombun in Lan Luang Road in Bangkok, an area dominated by immigrant Chinese. Banharn's two elder brothers, Sombun and Udom, ran the shop and in 1951 also became the agents for selling liquor in the bustling Taling Chan District of Thonburi.

Banharn graduated from a local secondary school, Prathip Witthayalai (which no longer exists), in 1946 at the age of fourteen. Because he was particularly good at maths, he was allowed, as one account has it, to jump two grades at school. Wishing to study medicine at Chulalongkorn University, he took the entrance examination for a famous preparatory school in Bangkok, but failed. His early youth was quite uneventful.

In 1949 Banharn migrated to Bangkok to help his elder brothers with their beverage retail business at Thai Sombun — a decision that was to change his life forever. He left Suphanburi by boat — the only mode of transport to Bangkok at the time — on 11 November, with only five baht in his pocket. His daily job in Bangkok was to deliver drinks using a bicycle-drawn cart, for which he earned thirty to forty baht a month. In the course of doing this job, he became acquainted with high-ranking officials at the Department of Public Works, who regularly ordered soft drinks from the nearby Thai Sombun, located less than 200 metres away. Banharn then worked at Thai Yong Phanit (永德兴), a successful Sino-Thai construction company, also located just a stone's throw from Thai Sombun. He learned the ins and outs of the construction industry at the company while deepening his ties with officials in the Department of Public Works. This experience led him to found his own construction company, Saha Srichai, along with executives of Thai Yong Phanit, who probably supplied the start-up capital, in March 1953, just four years after he migrated to Bangkok. He was only twenty-one years old. In 1957, as then Prime Minister Field Marshal Sarit Thanarat initiated a massive rural development effort, Banharn's company won a lucrative ten-year monopoly to install tap-water pipes throughout Thailand for the Department of Public Works.

In the 1960s, Banharn started using part of his new-found wealth to initiate development works — hospital wards, schools, temple restoration — in his home province. One school he founded was officially opened by the royal couple in 1975. He also donated his wealth to local charities for the less fortunate and to the Village Scouts, an anti-communist movement sponsored by the monarchy to stem growing insurgency in rural Thailand. These deeds enhanced his reputation as a generous developer of Suphanburi, culminating in his landslide victory in the parliamentary election of 1976 — the first election he had ever contested.

Banharn ran as a member of the conservative Chat Thai Party, consisting mainly of former military officers. Starting as deputy secretary general, he went on to become secretary general and leader of this party in subsequent years. While many Thai parties came and went, Chat Thai remained strong enough to be in government as a coalition partner for seventeen years between 1979 and 2004. During this period Banharn served in several key cabinet posts, including as minister of agriculture, transport and communications, finance, and interior. In July 1995 he became Thailand's twenty-first prime minister. A superstitious man who believes in astrology, Banharn changed his birth date from 20 July to 19 August on becoming prime minister because Prem Tinsulanond and Anand Panyarachun, two of the most respected former prime ministers of Thailand, both have Leo as their star signs. The change did not do the trick. A year later Banharn was compelled to resign amidst mounting public criticisms of his government's corruption and mishandling of the Thai economy, which contributed to the devastating financial crisis of 1997. Banharn's political career spanning thirty years ended abruptly in December 2008 when Thailand's Constitutional Court barred him (and numerous others) from politics for the next five years and disbanded Chat Thai (along with several other parties) on account of electoral fraud. Banharn adapted to the change by establishing a new party, Chat Thai Phatthana, and by having his younger brother, Chumphon, become its leader as his proxy. Thus, although not a politician anymore, Banharn was able to retain a good deal of political influence.

During his political career, Banharn attended steadfastly to expanding his base of support in Suphanburi. He did so mainly by securing unprecedented sums of state funds to build an impressive array of local infrastructure projects. Particularly conspicuous projects are roads and schools, many of which are reputed to be among the best in the country. In channelling these projects to his native province, however, Banharn allegedly engaged in shady behind-the-scenes deals with "crony" bureaucrats and contractors, earning him an unflattering reputation as a "walking ATM" that indiscriminately dispensed and accepted dirty money. Also, having a weakness for something "big" or "tall" (which tends to be associated with modernity in rural Thailand), Banharn used his own and local — predominantly Chinese — notables' donations to build several seemingly wasteful and ostentatious projects, including the 123-metre-high observatory tower (named after Banharn and his wife) and the world's largest dragon-shaped statue at the Chinese-style City Shrine. Nonetheless, these grandiose projects won Banharn strong support among the bulk of the population of formerly backward Suphanburi, which had traditionally received short shrift from the state before Banharn's arrival as a politician. In each of the elections that he contested between 1976 and 2007, Banharn won resounding victories, capturing 63–94 per cent of the votes cast.

To ensure a smooth transfer of political power to younger members of his Silpa-archa clan, Banharn started making strenuous efforts to groom his eldest daughter, Kanchana (b.1961), and his only son, Worawut (b.1973), as Suphanburi MPs in the mid-1990s. Thanks to his characteristic behind-the-scenes manoeuvring, both attained ministerial posts — Kanchana served as deputy minister of education (1999–2001), and Worawut as deputy minister of transport and communications (September–December 2008). Both were, however, stripped, along with Banharn, of their political rights for five years by the Constitutional Court ruling of December 2008. Neither Banharn's wife nor his other child, a daughter named Parichat, has shown any interest in politics. The succession issue loomed ominously and increasingly large for Banharn, aged eighty in 2012.

Benedicto, Francisco

(周清琦, Zhou Qingqi, 1939–)
Businessman, diplomat, Philippines

Ambassador Francisco Benedicto has served the country for close to twenty-five years. A businessman by profession, he however willingly served the country as ambassador to Singapore and to China, putting to good use his knowledge of the Chinese language, on top of English, Filipino, and the Cebuano dialect. Through his efforts, Benedicto College was established in 2000 to provide affordable, globally-in-demand, best fit, quality elementary, secondary, tertiary, and technical-vocational education.

In an Independence Day message on 12 June 2009, Ambassador Francisco Benedicto summed up his own life's work. "What is asked of us now is a humbler though no less heroic sacrifice. We are called upon to give of our skills and sinews, our might and minds, so that peace, progress and prosperity can take deeper root and cast wider shade in our motherland."

Throughout his life and for all his work, the peace, progress, and prosperity of the Philippines has always been his prime mover.

He has always felt privileged to serve in foreign missions around the world representing his country. To him, the best part of foreign assignments is when he sees Filipinos excelling in their respective fields. Right now, he is ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the People's Republic of China (PRC) and concurrently accredited to the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and Mongolia from February 2010 to the present.

Born on 12 February 1939, Benedicto attended primary and secondary school at the Far Eastern Institute (东方学院 or Tong Hong Institute) in Cebu, Southern Philippines. He took up a Bachelor of Science in Commerce course at the University of San Jose Recoletos, also in Cebu City in 1964, and was awarded a doctorate in humanities, honoris causa in 1987 by his alma mater.

He first worked in his father's industrial hardware and merchandise business and later became board member and executive committee board member of the Federation of Filipino-Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry, and vice-chairman of the board of the Cebu Tong Hong Institute.

After the 1986 People Power Revolution, which catapulted Corazon C. Aquino to be president of the Philippines, Benedicto was appointed ambassador to Singapore. He promoted business and cultural exchanges between the two countries, and set up the Philippine Cultural and Trade Center in Singapore to provide a convenient meeting place for Filipino workers in Singapore. He also set up a female dormitory for domestic workers who fall out with employers or are terminated, so they have affordable lodgings while settling a conflict or are waiting to go home.

There are almost no gaps in his years in the diplomatic corps. Testament to Benedicto's excellent track record, successive presidents assigned him to different posts. His first posting was as ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the Republic of Singapore from 1986–93. He next headed off to the Republic of Korea, then the Federative Republic of Brazil, concurrently accredited to the Republic of Venezuela, Republic of Colombia, and Republic of Suriname from 1996–98, and on to Canada until 2005. Benedicto came home to become undersecretary of the Department of Foreign Affairs until 2008, when he was assigned to the Republic of India, and concurrently accredited to Federal Democratic Republic of Nepal.

It was Benedicto's great grandfather who first came to the Philippines from Yong Chun (永春), Fujian province. His father, Don Bernardo Benedicto (Chiu Ching Hun, 周卿云, 1898–1990), started the family business, the North Negros Sugar Company, in 1929, which was involved in sugar plantation and in shipping. They were also involved in fishing and general merchandise, and later, industrial hardware. Eventually, the family business diversified into an import and export trading company, engaged in industrial and construction materials. Thereafter, they established a manufacturing firm producing steel products, and also a real estate development firm.

The whole Benedicto family is known for its philanthropy as a way of sharing the many blessings they have received. They have led the construction of more than twenty-five public elementary school buildings in various parts of Cebu Province, which were turned over to the government. As well, the family built for public use the Don Bernardo Benedicto Gymnasium in Zapatera Elementary School, Don Bernardo Benedicto Cultural Center in Mabolo Elementary School, both in Cebu City, and the Don Bernardo Benedicto Community Center in Cadiz City, Negros Occidental. Several cultural stages for the use of different elementary schools in Cebu City were also constructed. These are in addition to the family's contributions to various charitable, civic, and religious organizations, as well as to victims of calamities.

In recognition of the family's altruistic activities, Don Bernardo was adopted as a son of Cebu City in 1968. As well, streets in Cebu City were named after the ambassador's parents, Don Bernardo Benedicto in 1990, and Doña Emilia Benedicto in 1978. Another street in Lapu-Lapu City was named Don Bernardo Benedicto in 2000.

Continuing with his parents' philanthropic work, Benedicto became president or chairman of various chambers of commerce and industry, trade organizations, business corporations, civic associations, charitable institutions, and foundations such as the Cebu Chamber of Commerce and Industry and the Rotary Club of Cebu, and the Sacred Heart Church Foundation and the Bernardo Benedicto Foundation.

He founded Benedicto College in 2000 to serve as an affordable alternative for the "less privileged who, armed with braveness of heart and indomitable will, are bent on improving the quality of their life". As a diplomat and an educator, Benedicto believes in building peace through a wealth of knowledge in the art of diplomacy. "As we connect with information, we should also connect with people, after all, what is the use of much knowledge, if people continue to live in a divided world?" From its initial College of Information Technology, Benedicto College has expanded into six more academic colleges, and offers basic education and short-term courses as well.

Like Francisco, an elder brother, Ceferino, is quite well known in the ethnic Chinese community. Known as a steel magnate and diplomat, he is chairman of the Benedicto Steel Group of Companies, executive vice-president of the Philippine Chambers of Commerce, vice-president of the International Chamber of Commerce, and vice-president of China Committee on Foreign Trade. He also stepped on the diplomatic path as consul general for Sri Lanka. Because of his friendship with the Sri Lankan ambassador to the Philippines, Ceferino was sent to a post there during a civil war in 1990. The Sri Lankan ambassador recommended him as consul general to attend to diplomatic needs at the time of diplomatic crisis. His supposed short stint lasted ten years. He then became ambassador of Albania to the Philippines.

Born in 1935, Ceferino was nine years old when the Japanese invaded Mindanao, and the whole family had to hide from trouble. He vividly remembers their escape in the dark of night, with just the moonlight as guide. They rowed a small boat and escaped to an unoccupied small island, hiding there for a year before finally moving to Cebu. These uncertainties and anxieties in his childhood years made him seize opportunities to build a more stable future.

In 1955 he went to Manila to study engineering, and returned to Cebu after graduation to help his parents. From his studies and several years of experience, he established in 1960 the CLB Engineering and Supply, Inc. He met with many obstacles when he started, but slowly moved forward. The Benedicto Steel Group of Companies, established on 6 March 1969, became a leading manufacturer of high carbon wire and rope and also pre-stressed concrete wires and strands used in electrical and phone cables.

He established a factory in Manila in 1975 to expand his business and he now has two other factories outside in Pasig City, south of Manila, and in San Pedro, Laguna, in Southern Luzon. Products include iron, steel, and galvanized iron. The high carbon steel wires became an export product. The company then went into specialized manufacturing of products for construction, ships, and roads, and the factory produced 1,000 tons annually. In the mid-1990s, it was one of the biggest steel manufacturing companies in the country.

Another elder brother, Juanito (周清劭), is a well-known business executive, who is likewise active in the Chinese literary circle. Like his brothers, he also served in the Philippine diplomatic corps as ambassador to Bolivia.

The Benedicto brothers, therefore, have distinguished themselves not just as accomplished businessmen, but for their involvement in the political life of the country. Considering that they came from Cebu in the Visayas region, and not in the stronghold of Metro Manila from which many Chinese-Filipino leaders hail, the Benedicto siblings are among the pioneers who have become fully integrated into mainstream society.

Botan

(Supha Sirisingha, 1945–)
Writer, Thailand

Botan is one of the most celebrated female writers in Thailand, famous for her three novels about Chinese immigrants in Thailand, especially Letters from Thailand. This book won her the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization (SEATO) prize for literature in 1969, making her the youngest writer to be awarded this literary prize at the time. She went on to write many other novels for both adults and children, and won other literary awards. In recognition of her achievements, she was named a national artist in the field of literature in 1999, the highest honour in Thai literary circles.

Botan, whose real name is Supha Sirisingha (née Luesiri), was born on 13 August 1945 in Phasi Charoen District, Thonburi. Botan, meaning "peony" literally, is probably her most well known pen name. She started using this pen name in 1965 while writing for Satrisan, a women's magazine in Thailand, and has published at least sixty novels, including several award-winning novels under this pen name. Her father, whose surname was Li (李), was an immigrant from southern China while her mother was an ethnic Chinese born in Thailand. Her parents owned an orchard in Thonburi, where she spent much of her childhood helping them out. Although she is from a family of ethnic Chinese, Botan's upbringing does not seem to have been more heavily influenced by Chinese culture or the Chinese community in Thailand than a typical Thai girl of her age.

Education did not come easily for Botan because her father was not supportive of her determination to continue her studies. If she had not won her first scholarship when she was nine years old, she may well have stopped going to school after her four years of compulsory education. The rest of her education was made possible by the subsequent scholarships that she won. Botan received her primary and lower secondary education at Sutham Sueksa School and later transferred to Watthana Sueksa School for her upper secondary education. She eventually attained her high school diploma from Triam Udom Sueksa School. On graduating from Triam Udom, she furthered her studies at the Faculty of Arts, Chulalongkorn University, and graduated in 1966, with a bachelor of arts degree and a double major in English and Thai.

After graduation, Botan worked for a brief period as a teacher in a private school. She later took a job at Thai Wattana Panich Press, where she worked on various publications for women and children. Chaiyaphruek and Satrisan were the two most notable among them. Botan married Wiriya Sirisingha, an editor of Chaiyaphruek, in 1975. The two subsequently left Thai Wattana Panich to establish their own publishing company, Chomrom Dek, which specializes in children's books.

Botan had been a serious author long before she started working in the publishing industry. She started her writing career in 1964 when she was still a student at Chulalongkorn University. Her first published work was a short story that, in her opinion, was "an undistinguished romantic tale". She is best known for her works that relate to the lives and culture of the ethnic Chinese in Thailand. Among these works, Letters from Thailand (Chotmai chak mueang Thai) is probably the most well known internationally, having been translated into various languages. Letters from Thailand, whose story line spans some twenty years, is about the life of Tan Suang U and his family in Bangkok. It reflected the lives, experiences, and values of Chinese in urban Thailand in the post-1945 period. Botan obtained inspiration for this novel from her own life experiences. It is said that Tan Suang U is the composite of her father and uncle, and Botan herself admitted that Tan Suang U's youngest daughter is very much like herself, who aspired to excel despite her father's prejudice against daughters.

In 1969, Letters from Thailand was named the "best book of the year", and won Botan the SEATO literary prize. She thus shot to fame as the author of the novel, and the youngest writer to be awarded the SEATO literary prize. Letters from Thailand was controversial and attracted both compliments and criticisms. The book invited complaints from both ethnic Chinese and Thais. Its Chinese critics were displeased that Botan had depicted ethnic Chinese as greedy and predatory beings who do not wish to assimilate into Thai society, while the Thais were unhappy that the Thais in the novel were shallow, vain, and hypocritical. In spite of that, the book became assigned reading for all high school students three years later because many quickly realized that the book did not vilify a particular ethnic group, but rather questioned various prejudices and problems that readers were quick to pick up initially.

This novel also enjoyed international fame through the translation of the book into various languages such as English, Chinese, Japanese, Dutch, and others. Nevertheless, the path towards international readership was not a bed of roses. In the early 1970s, Botan and the translator of the initial English version, Susan F. Kepner, had a hard time finding a publisher for the translated work. Many American publishers and university presses were not interested in publishing Thai literature. When the translation was finally published by Duang Kamol in 1977 in Bangkok, six printings were sold out over the next decade without much publicity effort from the publisher. The book has also enjoyed favourable response from its international readers.

Botan's work is generally recognized as exposing prevalent social problems, in particular with regard to women and children. Many important social issues, such as child abuse, women's rights, and race, were addressed in her writings. For example, she highlighted the problems of people sending their sons to monasteries, and daughters to brothels, in order to solve their financial problems. This was not recognized as a potential social problem initially, though it later proved to be a factor in the spread of AIDS, one of the more serious issues in Thai society. Besides these works, which address social issues, Botan also wished to write a good book for children, which was both entertaining for children, and inspiring for adults. In an interview, she commented, "I have spent more than half of my life publishing children's books but none of these satisfies me. I am content with my work but not 100%."

As an established writer in Thai literary circles, Botan received the highest recognition possible for a Thai writer when she was honoured as a National Artist in 1999.

Budianta, Melani

(Tan Tjiok Sien, 1954–)

Academic, researcher, Indonesia

Melani Budianta is an educator and scholar of Feminist Theory, Cultural Studies, Postcolonial Studies, and Multiculturalism. She is the first Chinese-Indonesian woman to become professor of the School of Humanities at the University of Indonesia.

Following in the footsteps of her parents who were school teachers in Malang, East Java, Budianta began her career as a volunteer teacher while still pursuing her Bachelor's degree in English Literature at the University of Indonesia. Although her degree is in English Literature, she taught street children Indonesian language composition. Upon her graduation, she continued to write articles and conduct workshops on teaching Indonesian literature.

Budianta went on to earn her Master's degree in American Studies from the University of Southern California in Los Angeles, California, the United States, in 1981. She was awarded her doctorate in English Languages and Literatures from Cornell University in Ithaca, New York, the United States, in 1992.

In between the attainment of her Master's and doctoral degrees, Budianta began teaching at the University of Indonesia. She became program secretary for the Women's Studies Program between 1982 and 1985. On her return to Indonesia in 1992, following the attainment of her doctorate, she assumed the position of program secretary for the Literature Department between 1992 and 1995. She was appointed head of the English Department in 2002 and head of the Literature Department in 2003. She achieved her full professorship at the School of Humanities on 28 January 2006.

Apart from teaching, Budianta is active in various research and academic organizations. Her positions at these organizations are: team member, Task Force for International Women, American Studies Association (1996–97), advisory board member for the Association of American Studies in Indonesia (1998–2002), director for the Asian Regional Exchange for New Alternatives (Hong Kong) (2000–03); advisory board member for the Voice of Concerned Mothers (2000-present); coordinator for the Modern Indonesian Literatures, Southeast Asian Community (2001–04); vice-president for the Association of the Indonesian Literature Scholars (2001–03); member of Research and Publication Division of the Association of International Malay Languages (2002–04); director for Asian Scholarship Foundation, Thailand (2002–06); academic senate member for the School of Humanities at the University of Indonesia (2004-present); member of the Selection Committee for the Southeast Asian Studies Regional Exchange Program (2004–05); and the national panelist member for the International Fellowship Program (2005–present).

In addition to her active membership in the above organizations, Budianta is a committed editor and prolific scholar. She has served on various editorial boards such as: the Inter-Asia Cultural Studies Journal, Routledge (2000–present), the American Anthology for Asian Readers (2000–present), the Lontar Association (2002–03), the Malay Journal: International Journal for the Malay World (2004–05), Wacana magazine for the School of Humanities, the University of Indonesia (2005–present), and Manabu magazine (2005–present). She has also published and presented more than 100 articles and conference papers throughout her career on topics such as Feminism, Postcolonial Studies, and Multiculturalism. On top of her editorial and scholarly obligations, she conducts various international workshops and trainings on these topics while critically analysing how ideologies operate through literature and public discourse.

For Budianta, issues of gender and ethnicity are irrelevant to her achievements. Budianta firmly believes in equality and finds that women are capable of realizing their aspirations based on their own abilities. Her sister, Yunita Triwardhani Winarto or Tan Tjiok Swan, has also excelled in academia. Triwardhani was a famous anthropologist at the University of Indonesia for many years before assuming a prestigious position at Universitas Gajah Mada (UGM) as the Indonesian academic professor.

Budianta is careful to point out that for women in academia, their responsibilities as wives and mothers, as well as their financial situations, might hinder the attainment of a doctorate or a professorship. Hence, she deeply appreciates the intricacies and nuances of all women's lives — not just Chinese women — that might hinder them in pursuing those goals. When asked to comment on Chinese-Indonesian women, she refused to make generalizations, pushing instead to explore the "complex and different social and cultural conditions that make each woman unique". These words encapsulate her diverse works on feminism, ranging from the middle-class construction of the housemaid in "Pembantu Rumah Tangga dalam Sastra, Konstruksi Budaya Kelas Menengah" (Srinthil, 8, 2005) to women's activism in post-1998 Indonesia in "The Blessed Tragedy: The Making of Women's Activism during the Reformasi Years (1998–1999) (Heryanto and Mandal, 2003).

More recently, Budianta explored the realm of cultural identity within the framework of cultural studies. Her first scholarly work on this subject matter can be seen in her journal article, "Globalization and the Discourse of Cultural Identity: The Case of Indonesia during the Monetary Crisis 1997–1998". She further examines conflicting and changing Chinese identities in post-1998 Indonesia in one of her most recent articles, "The Dragon Dance: The Shifting Meaning of 'Chineseness' in Indonesia".

Even though she appreciates and encourages a Chinese cultural identity among Indonesians of Chinese descent, Budianta insists the essence of "Chineseness" lies in its "hybridity" — the intermingling of Chinese and local cultures. Hybridity is most evident in a sixth or even seventh generation Chinese individual such as herself.

Born in 1954 and growing up in Malang, Budianta was exposed to more Javanese than Chinese culture. Her family fully embraced traditional Javanese culture and she played the gamelan in a traditional Javanese musical orchestra and performed in countless wayang puppet shows during the early years of her life.

Since Javanese culture formed a substantive part of her everyday life, she felt distanced from Chinese culture. It was only when the era of reform arrived in 1998 — following the fall of Soeharto's regime, and bringing with it the revival of Chinese culture and language — that she began appreciating Chinese culture in terms of its arts and philosophy. This was also when she started exploring the notion of cultural identities in further depth.

Melani Budianta continues to be recognized internationally through her articles, papers, training, editorial work, and seminars. Nevertheless, her love and affinity for Indonesian culture have driven her to become a dedicated Indonesian educator and scholar first and foremost.

Budiman, Arief

(Soe Hok Djin, 史福仁, Shi Furen, 1941–)
Public intellectual, writer, psychologist, sociologist, Indonesia

Arief Budiman is a public intellectual of Indonesia. Born as Soe Hok Djin into a lower middle class family in Jakarta, his father, Soe Lie Piet, was a peranakan writer and a journalist. His mother was a housewife who was "barely literate". Nevertheless, he and his younger brother Soe Hok Gie were later known as writers and social activists.

Hok Djin was born (on 3 January 1941) and brought up in Jakarta and received his formal education in Indonesian schools until he graduated. During his school days he was already interested in writing. When he was at SMA (Senior High School) his essay entitled "Why do I not like Girls" was published in the school magazine. Immediately he became the laughing stock of his classmates who thought he was a gay. He later explained that he read too many philosophy books and was carried away. Nevertheless, his interest in writing essays continued. In 1963 when he was still studying at the Faculty of Psychology at the University of Indonesia, he was awarded the Best Essay Prize for his "Manusia dan Seni" (Man and Art) by Sastra, a well-known Indonesian literary monthly. In the same year he became a signatory to the Manikebu (Manifest of Culture), an anti-communist cultural manifesto, together with a number of indigenous Indonesian intellectuals. In 1964 he attended the College d'Europe in Belgium for a semester. When he returned to Indonesia, he was active in student demonstrations, which contributed to the downfall of Soekarno. He was a regular contributor to a number of Jakarta newspapers: Kompas, Sinar Harapan, and Indonesia Raya. He also served as an editor of Horison (1966–72), a leading literary journal of which Mochtar Lubis was the editor-in-chief.

In 1968 he obtained a Drs degree in Psychology from the University of Indonesia after defending his thesis, "Manusia Dalam Persoalan Eksistensiilnja" (Man and his existential problem), using the prominent Indonesian poet, Chairil Anwar, as a case-study. In 1968 he was appointed as the first deputy chairman of the Arts Council of the City of Jakarta. In the period 1968–71 he served as a member of the Film Censor Board. In 1970 he became the leader of the Anti-Corruption Campaign. When the general elections were about to take place in 1971, he co-founded Golongan Putih (or Golput), the "White Group" consisting of liberals and intellectuals who refused to vote in the general elections. The term Golput has become a common term used in Indonesia today to denote the group who declines to participate in a general election. His political activities eventually led to his detention by the Soeharto regime.

In October 1972 he left Indonesia and worked in the Association for Cultural Freedom in Paris as a staff member for a year. It was during this period that he began to be exposed to Socialism. In September 1973 he won a scholarship and went to Harvard for further studies; he did not take Psychology but Development Sociology. It was at Harvard that he left his liberalism and became a socialist. In 1980 he obtained a Ph.D. in Sociology after successfully defending his dissertation entitled "The Mobilization and State Strategies in the Democratic Transition: The Case of Allende's Chile". This dissertation was later published in Indonesian under the title: Jalan Demokratis Ke Sosialisme: Pengalaman Chili dibawah Allende (Democratic Way to Socialism: Chili under Allende) (Jakarta, 1987).

On his return from Harvard he joined the Universitas Kristen Satya Wacana (UKSW) in Salatiga, Central Java. He was also teaching at the postgraduate programme at the above university and was very involved in social and cultural activities. He became the speaker for the weak and the poor and has been a frequent commentator on socio-political issues in Indonesia.

Although his field is sociology, he did not give up his love for literature. As an advocate of Sastra Kontekstual (Contextual Literature) he was accused of attempting to insert socialist values into Indonesian literature. He admitted that he was a socialist, but denied the accusation. He noted that "Contextual Literature is a kind of literature which rejects the argument that literary values are universal".

Hok Djin is married to Siti Leila Chairani, a psychologist who is an "indigenous Indonesian" woman. He became a Muslim after marrying her in 1968(?). There was time when his sincerity in converting to Islam was questioned by some Muslims who criticized him for not being a "good Muslim". He openly challenged his critics saying that he was probably a better Muslims than his critics who did not do any good deeds. He also argued that only God, not any human beings, would be able to judge whether he was a good Muslim.

As a peranakan Chinese he is well integrated into the indigenous society. When Soeharto introduced the regulation of name changing in 1966, Hok Djin adopted an Indonesian name, like many Chinese Indonesians. When the Soeharto regime changed the terms referring to ethnic Chinese and China from "Tionghoa" and "Tiongkok" to the derogatory term, "Tjina" (Cina), which is similar to "Chink" in the United States of America, he went along with the change and used the term Cina consistently. As a result he was criticized by the Chinese community. Arief defended his position. He said that initially he also felt hurt when people called him "Cina", but after a while he accepted it as it was not possible to change it back. He took the view that it was thus better to accept the derogatory term and made it to become a neutral one. His view was not shared by many Chinese Indonesians, especially those who were Chinese-educated and who came from a Chinese cultural background.

Arief was a popular lecturer on campus and his courses were well liked by the students. His house near the campus became a meeting point for writers and public intellectuals. He was not only a social and political critic outside campus, but also an advocate of democratic values. In November 1994 he protested against the appointment of the vice-chancellor (Rektor) of the UKSW who was not properly elected, and Arief was dismissed by the University in August 1995. He fought back but without much success. He eventually decided to go overseas.

In the mid-1990s he succeeded in applying for a new position at Melbourne University and became the first Indonesian to hold a full professorship at Melbourne. On 9 October 1997 he delivered an inaugural lecture entitled "The Lonely Road of the Intellectual: Scholars in Indonesia", as Foundation Professor of Indonesian, and Head of the Indonesian Programme, Melbourne Institute of Asian Languages and Societies. He stayed at this university until he retired in 2007. In his inaugural lecture, he cited the poem by Robert Frost, "The Road Not Taken", noting that "the road taken by the intellectual is the 'one less traveled… '. It is the road full of dangerous risks. It is a road that sometimes even your close friends and immediate family may fail to appreciate, in the present world in which pragmatism rules."

His publications include Chairil Anwar: Sebuah Pertemuan [Chairil Anwar: an encounter] (Jakarta, 1976), which was based on his Drs thesis; Pembagian Kerja Secara Seksual [Division of work by sex] (Jakarta, 1981); Sistem Perekonomian Pancasila dan Ilmu Sosial di Indonesia [Pancasila economy and social science in Indonesia] (Jakarta, 1990); Indonesia: the uncertain transition (2001, co-editor with Damien Kingsbury).

(Ui Bun Bo, 黄闻波, Huang Wenbo, 1922–2007)

Leading businessman, politician, Thailand

Bunchu Rotchanasathian is ranked among Thailand's post-1945 most important businessmen, political figures, and social and political visionaries. Born on 20 January 1922 in Chonburi Province on Thailand's eastern seaboard, Bunchu was the son of Hainanese carpenter Ui Yu Chun, who used the Thai first name San and who had immigrated to Siam and quickly established himself as a prominent contractor. Bunchu's Chonburi-born mother was named Lamai.

Bunchu attended Bangkok's Kuomintang-affiliated Xin Min School, completed his secondary education at Wat Sam Phraya Thewaratchakunchon Commercial School, and at age eighteen enrolled as an accountancy student at Thammasat University. During his three years at Thammasat, he was renowned for his academic achievements and wide reading, worked as a book-keeper at a sawmill in which his father was a partner, and took his first course in banking from a young Oxford-educated aristocrat and man of letters named Khuekrit Pramot.

Even before graduating from Thammasat in 1943, Bunchu began work in the National Banking Bureau, Thailand's proto-central bank. This work exposed him to the managerial and financial practices of Allied nations' commercial banks that had come under Thai government control during the Pacific War. After less than a year, Bunchu left government service to found an accounting firm of his own named Banchikit, and a law and accounting office in partnership with the former Chinese school principal, rice miller, and Thammasat-educated lawyer Prasit Kanchanawat (Khou Tong Mong). A former schoolmate of Bunchu's at Xin Min School, Prasit did legal work for Chin Sophonphanit (Tan Piak Chin) and his Asia Trust Company. On Prasit's recommendation, Chin engaged Bunchu as that firm's auditor.

In 1952, with the eight-year-old Bangkok Bank at risk of collapse, its directors named Chin, the bank's second general comprador, as managing director. Chin then turned to Prasit and Bunchu to assist him in rescuing and restructuring the bank. Starting as internal auditor and soon taking responsibility for internal administration, Bunchu worked to make the Bangkok Bank Thailand's most progressive and dynamic financial institution. He joined its board and became assistant managing director in 1954, second only to Chin himself in the bank's hierarchy. He gave the bank the organizational capacity to operate on a large scale, recruited talented staff, and in 1962 launched a pioneering research and planning unit whose publications — in Thai, English, and Chinese — became authoritative sources of data on and analysis of the Thai economy.

After 1958, with Chin in exile, Bunchu effected the bank's accommodation of the government of Field Marshal Sarit Thanarat, patron of Thai developmentalism, and his successors, Field Marshals Thanom Kittikhachon and Praphat Charusathian. Bunchu recognized opportunities for the Bangkok Bank in Thailand's push towards "development". In light of the stress on the rural sector in Thailand's First National Economic Development Plan, covering 1961–66, Bunchu established an agricultural credit unit at the bank in 1962. That unit introduced a shared-liability model of farm lending centred on borrowers' groups. Its example led other Thai banks to enter rural financial markets. From 1973, the Bangkok Bank also began to channel credit to farmers through the state's Bank for Agriculture and Agricultural Cooperatives (BAAC).

The years of Bunchu's rise to prominence as one of Thailand's most powerful business figures also saw his involvement with a series of progressive writers and journals. He and Prasit were partners in the Rungnakhon Printing House, which, during the 1950s, printed an official Communist Party of Thailand periodical. Bunchu also played an active role at Prasit's weekly Kanmueang, which offered sympathetic coverage of and information about the communist world to Thai readers and published the work of a group of largely Thammasat-affiliated moderate leftist followers of the exiled Pridi Phanomyong. For many years Bunchu extended financial support to the close Pridi associate, offspring of Thai aristocrats, and Marxist journalist Supha Sirimanon. Rungnakhon printed Supha's ideologically independent, "radical socialist", foreign-affairs-oriented monthly Aksonsan from 1950 to 1952, and Bunchu financed the publication of Supha's 1951 study of capitalism, the first in Thai. Not least, these activities and commitments reflected Bunchu's and Prasit's exposure to left-wing Kuomintang influences as students at Xin Min.

The Thanom-Praphat dictatorship collapsed in October 1973. Bunchu was appointed to the national assembly charged with drafting a new constitution. As elections under that constitution approached, Bunchu established a political party. The socialist orientation of Singapore's People's Action Party, what Bunchu knew of its branch structure, and its commitment to nation building impressed him. He decided to call his party the "Social Action Party". His Thammasat lecturer Khuekrit Pramot agreed to serve as party leader, while Bunchu became founding secretary general.

Spending lavishly to win a parliamentary seat for his native Chonburi in the January 1975 polls, Bunchu became finance minister in a twelve-party coalition government formed in mid-March. Khuekrit served as prime minister. The participation of so prominent an ethnic Chinese businessman as Bunchu in electoral politics reinforced the trend, dating from the Thai elections of 1969, in which business figures began to eclipse soldiers and former bureaucrats as leading actors in Thai politics. This pattern has defined Thai parliamentary politics ever since.

Bunchu had concerns beyond the narrowly political on his mind. Worried about the social and political consequences of Thailand's urban-rural divide, he was determined to link the fortunes of rural Thailand and of commercial Bangkok. He spoke frequently in the Thai parliament during 1975–76 about poverty and inequality. With Khuekrit, he undertook measures relating to agricultural price supports, land reform, and irrigation. But the measure for which the 1975–76 Khuekrit-Bunchu government remains best remembered, subdistrict development funds or "ngoen phan", made money directly available to subdistrict councils for small infrastructure projects to support seasonally unemployed residents of rural Thailand, prevent downward pressure on urban wages resulting from seasonal migration, and nurture grass roots democracy through devolution of decision-making power.

Less well remembered but more important in the long run was Bunchu's policy of channelling commercial bank lending to the Thai rural sector in unprecedented volumes. Banks could extend farm credit either directly or through the BAAC. This policy revolutionized farm lending in Thailand. The BAAC, relying largely on loan disbursement through borrowers' groups, would for some two decades thereafter play a leading role in promoting the prosperity of rural Thailand.

Forced to call elections in January 1976, Khuekrit failed to win re-election in April. Bunchu's tenure as minister of finance was over. But thirteen months, from March 1975 to April 1976, he had earned his place among Thailand's most important and successful post-1945 social and political visionaries.

Following the bloody coup of October 1976, hundreds of Thai students and others fled to the maquis to join the forces of the Communist Party of Thailand. Assuming the presidency of the Bangkok Bank during 1977–80, Bunchu extended its provincial branch system, modernized its operations, and consolidated its position as Thailand's dominant bank. In the late 1970s and early 1980s, as students began to return to Bangkok from the jungle, Bunchu found work for many of them in one or another of the firms in which he had interests while they reintegrated themselves into society.

In March 1980, Bunchu became deputy prime minister and "economic tsar" in the first cabinet of General Prem Tinasulanon. While his service in that position proved short, his articulate espousal of the idea of "Thailand Inc." — a fast-growing, industrializing Thai economy — caught the imagination of the business sector and of many in government. His thinking anticipated the trajectory of rapid growth on which Thailand would embark in the mid-1980s.

After briefly heading the Siam City Bank, Bunchu returned to politics in 1986 as the founding leader of the Democratic Action Party. He subsequently held important posts in the Solidarity, Phalang Dhamma, and Democrat Parties. The undiminished flair that he brought to Thai politics notwithstanding, his best years in that arena, were long past.

On the eve of the Thai elections of March 1992, Bunchu famously said on national television that the outgoing unelected technocratic government of Prime Minister Anan Panyarachun deserved top marks for its compliant service to the military junta that had installed it. In September of the same year, and in his brief political swan song, Bunchu joined Prime Minister Chuan Likphai's first government as a deputy prime minister. Including three other former chief executives of Thai commercial banks — Amnuay Wirawan, Suphachai Phanitchaphak, and Tharin Nimmanhaemin — that cabinet marked the high-water mark of Thai bankers' participation in government, participation pioneered by Bunchu himself in the mid-1970s. Already, the rapid economic growth that began in the mid-1980s was diminishing the national banking sector's previous dominance of the Thai economy. The Asian Financial Crisis of 1997 and the large stakes that foreigners subsequently took in Thai banks would make this development obvious.

The crisis took a toll on Bunchu's finances. In its aftermath, he left politics and devoted himself principally to the Chiva-Som spa and health resort in Hua Hin. Typically ahead of his time, he had founded Chiva-Som in 1991 out of an interest in wellness. Likewise, the policies that he pioneered in the 1970s were widely credited with inspiring the "populist" measures through which Thaksin Shinawatra transformed Thai politics after becoming prime minister in 2001.

Bunchu died of leukaemia in Bangkok on 19 March 2007. He and his wife Renu, a Songkhla native whose maiden name was Praphatsathon and whom he married in 1947, had one son and one daughter.

C

(1934–)

Businessman, diplomat, Philippines

Antonio Cabangon Chua (蔡) is a magnate whose business empire includes insurance, health care, banking, property management, car dealership, newspapers and magazines, radio stations, a hotel chain, pre-need plans and memorial services, memorial parks, and other business ventures.

Today his passion for organizing new ventures, beyond the profit motive, is a way of doing good, of creating more job opportunities for Filipinos.

Cabangon Chua's life is a modern success story, a testament to a man's will and determination to overcome obstacles in life. "Whether you're rich or poor, everyone has 24 hours in a day," he loves to remind everyone. "It's what you do with your 24 hours that counts."

The central force of Chua's life is his mother, Dominga Cabangon Lim of Catanauan, Tayabas (now Quezon), born on 12 May 1910. When she was twenty years old, she eloped and lived with Tomas Chua, a lumber dealer, without any formal marriage ceremony. Cabangon Chua would always mention that he was "born out of wedlock".

Lim and her son lived a comfortable middle-class life in a house in Malate, Manila, where Tomas Chua had set them up. In 1944, Tomas Chua went missing and was believed to have been killed by the Japanese.

The burning and destruction of Manila during World War II marked the beginning of a rags-to-riches story for Cabangon Chua and Dominga Lim: a mother and son's struggle to survive the daily demands of putting a little food on the table and paying for a rented room every month, without losing their sense of honour and self-worth.

Sheer hard work kept both of them alive. Lim made and sold bucayo — grated coconut meat caramelized in muscovado sugar. She worked as a laundrywoman, washing the heavy uniforms of American soldiers in newly liberated Manila.

Manila's liberation in 1945 saw Cabangon Chua, eleven years old at the time, queuing for canned sardines and relief goods. "I hated myself for being too small to work and too big to just stay at home." A scavenging trip to an American military camp for leftover food gave him the idea of shining shoes for the hundreds of American soldiers around. A neighbour made him a wooden shoeshine box that he has treasured to this day. Chua vows that he will never throw it away. It reminds him "not to be proud" and "not to look down on people who do what I used to do".

As he puts it, "I had a burning desire to succeed in life because of the way my mother was treated by our rich relatives when I was very young. It pushed me. It motivated me."

His frugal mother saved and borrowed enough money to open a mom-and-pop variety store that eventually expanded into a large grocery in Barrio Vergara, Mandaluyong, by the Pasig River. This gave them the much needed sense of financial security, however modest.

The young Chua tended the store after school, bought grocery supplies, and hauled the heavy load of merchandise to their store. He eventually bought a jeep to carry store supplies and he even drove it as a passenger jeep, and leased it out to others — thereby showing early on his entrepreneurial flair to generate more money.

As a young boy, Chua already knew that he could support himself and earn an honest living. Never afraid of hard work, he fished and set traps in the pristine Pasig River. In the mornings, he hawked fish and clams, and gathered driftwood and sold them as firewood. In the afternoons, he roamed Luneta Park and sold popsicles.

It was at this time that his mother was hospitalized for six long months. Through grit and tenacity, he made every centavo count. He was thus able to pay the monthly rent of their room to relieve his sick mother of worrying too much. Every day for six months, Chua cooked and brought his mother's favourite food to the hospital. Such was his unwavering love and devotion to his mother. Years later, he would name the buildings he owned after her.

Lim, who had very little formal education, taught her son his ABCs. He also read Liwayway and Silahis magazines, before selling them in the streets of Manila.

Chua spent primary school in Namayan Elementary School (now Isaac Lopez Elementary School) in Mandaluyong, and Sta. Ana Elementary School in Manila. He was good in arithmetic. After all he was always selling something in the streets. He walked barefoot to school, the only one to do so in class. He had dreamed of becoming a doctor, but knew well enough that his mother could not afford to let him go to medical school.

After high school at the University of the East (UE) in 1953, he settled for a course that could be finished in the shortest time possible. In 1956, the young and ambitious Chua, at the age of twenty-two, finished his business administration degree from the University of the East in three years instead of the standard four years. In 1960, he passed his CPA (Certified Public Accountant) examination.

As a new graduate in 1956, he got a job at an accounting firm, J.S. Zulueta, Inc., where he stayed for only two years to learn the accountant's trade: how to audit, read balance sheets, and to prepare financial statements — skills that would be very useful for all his business ventures in the years to come. It would be the only time that he would work as a salaried employee.

Chua then opened Filipinas Pawnshop, Inc., in 1958. He was "the manager, clerk, cashier, and janitor". Filipinas Pawnshop is still around. Chua considers it "the cornerstone of my fortune". This little pawnshop marked his very first business success and established his reputation as a man whose word can be trusted.

A young man in a hurry, he had set a target for himself: to be rich and successful, and a millionaire, by age forty. He did make it to the millionaire list a few years before he turned forty.

When he hit this age in 1974, Chua did three things: first, he set up a flagship company, ALC Commercial and Industrial Corporation; second, he built a mausoleum for his mother in Mandaluyong Catholic cemetery; and third, he built a plush home for his large family in Wack Wack Village, Mandaluyong.

Chua was always hungry to acquire more skills and knowledge. While a student of commerce at UE, he also enrolled in an engineering course at a nearby university, the Far East Asian Technological Institute (FEATI). Later he had to drop engineering and take on a vocational course: automotive mechanic in FEATI, and diesel mechanics at the Guzman Institute of Technology. He also took typing and stenography courses. Later, he enrolled in law at the Adamson University for two years, but had to give it up when his pawnshop business demanded all his time and attention. He was always open to learning something new. He tried yoga in the late 1960s; and courses on creative thinking and problem solving; and even hypnotism in the early 1970s. On the more pragmatic side, he enrolled in a Dale Carnegie course in 1960; attended seminars on real estate, problems in business management, and effective business communication.

All his life he has learned to value the power of education to improve lives. In 1978, he established the Dominga L. Cabangon Memorial Foundation in honour of his mother. It provides educational assistance to children of his employees. It gives full scholarship to honour students of his elementary schools. It also supports the Catholic Church by helping priests further their education. His ambassadorial stint in Laos (January 2003 – August 2004) led to full scholarships for six Lao students with leadership potential to study in the Philippines. To date the foundation has supported more than 200 scholars.

Recently Chua set up the Quijano de Manila Foundation in honour of Nick Joaquin, National Artist for Literature, and his late friend and biographer. This foundation aims to continue Joaquin's dream of helping young writers, especially children of veteran journalists, who have chosen writing as a career.

Every Saturday afternoon since his mother's death in 1962, Chua visits her grave site, offering flowers and praying for her soul. Every Friday afternoon he goes to Quiapo Church, recognizing that everything he has accomplished is ultimately due to God's grace.

Cao Hồng Lãnh

(Phan Thêm, 高红嶺, Gao Hongling, 1905–2008)

Revolutionary, diplomat, Vietnam

A renowned revolutionary, intelligence agent, and diplomat of Vietnam, Cao Hồng Lãnh succeeded in organizing the youth of Quảng Nam in the struggle for both national and class liberations. He was one of the strategists behind the numerous uprisings against the French colonialists which finally led to the military victory of the Vietnam Communist Party. A disciple of Ho Chi Minh, he was among the key leaders who planned the unification of the country.

Cao Hồng Lãnh was the older cousin of La Doãn Chánh (Luo Yunzheng 罗允正; pseudonym: La Hối 罗开, musician and martyr of Hoi'an). His mother was La Thị Am (罗氏龕; name in the La geneology: La Ngọc Am 罗玉龕), the second child of La Cầm Hoa and his fourth wife, Phan Thị (潘氏), popularly called Bà Thiên. Lãnh was born on 2 May 1905 in Hoi'an. His official name at birth was Phan Hải Thâm (潘海深); however, he was more popularly called Phan Thêm. "Thêm" which means "the extra" in Vietnamese, says he was unplanned, as his parents wanted to stop at their fourth child, Phan Thị Lạc. Phan Thêm's father, Phạm Ngọc Cư, came from a family which moved in the post-Lê era (1740–86) to Hoi'an.

Phan Thêm was a protégé of Ho Chi Minh, the late President of Vietnam and founder of the Vietnam Communist Party. Ho named him Cao Hồng Lãnh (高鸿嶺) because of his fond memories of the mountainous region of his hometown in Hà Tĩnh province (Central Vietnam) called Hồng Lĩnh (pronounced as "Hồng Lãnh" in Central Vietnamese vernacular). The range is renowned for its ninety-nine summits. The name is also a light-hearted allusion to Phan Thêm's towering physique of 1.75 metres. Cao Hồng Lãnh later changed his written name in the Chinese script to "高红嶺," the middle character "红" meaning red and signifying communism. Lãnh's immediate family has also adopted the family name of Lãnh instead of Phan.

Lãnh had as many names as the multiple roles he played in the politics of Vietnam. He was born in Xã Minh Hương (the Minh Huong village 明乡社), Phượng Minh An (formerly called Phượng Minh Hương) in Hoi'an.

It is not easy to talk about Lãnh's past without broaching the political changes that occurred in Hoi'an, where he was born. The seed of patriotism and revolution seemed to have been sown among the residents of Hoi'an and across the country since the late nineteenth century after the French colonial beginnings in 1858. In the nation's twentieth-century nationalism, Phan Bội Châu and other patriots from the central region of Vietnam sought a way to liberate the country from the French. Huỳnh Thúc Kháng and Trần Quy Cáp were two of the familiar faces at Lãnh's family abode, as they were among the hot-blooded intellectuals of Hoi'an who were fans of the books sold by Lãnh's family.

Lãnh's parents ran a bookshop called Đức An (德安) from their classical, Chinese-style house located at 129 Tran Phu Street in Hoi'an (formerly no. 83 Rue du Pont Japonais [Japanese Bridge Street]). Although the place was a medical hall selling Chinese medicinal herbs, Đức An sold "New Books" (in Vietnamese, Tân Thư 新书), advocating new ideas such as democracy and modernization that originated in the West.

It is said that following the news of the execution of Trần Quy Cáp by the French, Đức An burned its stock of "new books". Lãnh was then about two years old. He learned Chinese characters until he was more than ten and later learned French, a language taught in the French school he attended in Hue. Like the intellectuals of his era, he became attracted to the writings of French political philosophers such as Rousseau and Montesquieu. The ideals of nationalism thus came to Hoi'an, thanks to French and Vietnamese language books and such magazines as Chuông Rè, Đông Pháp Thời Báo, and Việt Nam Hồn, of which Lãnh was an avid reader. The ardour of earlier patriot-revolutionaries such as Phan Bội Châu and Phan Chu Trinh, and the spirit of revolution endorsed by Sun Yat-sen continued to intensify in Hoi'an in the 1920s.

Since his school days, Lãnh had observed the social and political inequities between children from the ruling and wealthy local families and those from ordinary homes. At the age of twenty, he began to spread revolutionary ideas via different channels. He formed a youth football team which he named Aurore (Bình Minh), and directed theatrical plays with revolutionary contents. In 1927, he went to Quảng Trị, the province in the north central part of Vietnam where the previous royal capital of Vietnam, Hue, was sited. There, he made connections with the Vietnam Association of Revolutionary Youth and returned to Hoi'an in October that year to set up his new bookstore, Vạn Sanh (万生), meaning "forever living" at No. 76, Le Loi Street, where he published and disseminated revolutionary information. From his family home, he also organized the Hoi'an chapter of the Vietnam Association of Revolutionary Youth, served as its secretary, and recruited members who initially numbered only three, including himself. His home, commonly called nhà Đức An (德安家) by denizens, was designated a heritage site in 2005 and has been a place of interest for tourists since February 2010.

In 1928, during a conference of the Vietnam Association of Revolutionary Youth held in Danang, plans were drawn for the expansion of the youth organization at the provincial level, led by Đỗ Quang. Lãnh became a committee member of the association of the south-central province of Quảng Nam. This position motivated him to play an even greater role in promoting the revolutionary movement. His role grew in significance after Ho Chi Minh merged the various communist organizations in Kowloon, Hong Kong, in February 1930 to establish the Vietnam Communist Party (VCP).

In 1935, Lãnh accepted an invitation to join the Indochinese Communist Party (Đảng Cộng sản Đông Dương) in Nanking. Together with the pioneering members of the VCP, he participated in the strategic planning of the party, and studied politics. However, his study was terminated when he was asked to return to Kunming in China. In Kunming, between 1939–41, he established the guerilla zones in Northern Vietnam and the secret border routes for his comrades. In 1941 he escorted his peers, Phạm Văn Đồng and Võ Nguyên Giáp, to Tĩnh Tây (靖西县), Guangxi, to meet Ho Chi Minh. Phạm Văn Đồng later served as prime minister from 1955 to 1987. Lãnh was one of the three officials who accompanied Ho Chi Minh to Pắc Bó (north-eastern province of Cao Bằng), where he strategized numerous uprisings which culminated in the August Revolution (Cách mạng tháng Tám). In Cao Bằng, he nurtured the guerilla fronts, including instilling the organizational culture in the Viet Minh cadres and reinforcing their skills. Then in 1942, together with Phạm Văn Đồng, in Tân Trào (Tuyên Quang province), he established a nascent committee that would work towards the unification of the country. Tân Trào was the temporary revolutionary site where decisions on uprisings were made. Lãnh's co-workers were General Võ Nguyên Giáp, Vũ Anh, and Chu Văn Tấn, who became the first defence minister of the Democratic People's Republic of Vietnam. Lãnh further undertook the crucial but risky responsibility of unifying the various groups of ethnic Chinese Communists in Chợ Lớn, which was heavily guarded by the French at the time.

From 1948–50, while commuting between Bangkok and China for his project, Lãnh established the sea passage to transport ammunitions between Hong Kong and Bangkok, reviving in the process the committee of military logistics for the southern part of Vietnam. When the French withdrew from Vietnam, Lãnh was selected to sit on the Resistance Committee for the South (Ủy ban Kháng chiến Nam Bộ) to spearhead the next stage of political development. In 1957–58, he became consul general at the consulate of Vietnam in Kunming. Owing to his experience in cross-border travels and negotiations, in addition to his multilingual skills, Lãnh was instrumental in negotiating with the Chinese and the Soviet Union for their continued assistance and support from the 1950s until 1964. He served as deputy chief of the Commission for Foreign Relations of the Central Committee of the VCP from 1959–77, when he continued to nurture junior diplomatic staff. He retired in Hanoi in 1977.

Lãnh passed away in Hanoi on 20 July 2008, leaving behind his wife, Đặng Thị Giang (born in 1924 in Udon Thani, Thailand), and five children — two sons and three daughters. He was given a state funeral.

Cao Triều Phát

(高朝发, Gao Chaofa, 1889–1956)

Religious, military and political leader, Vietnam

Cao Triều Phát was the manager of the most partisan of the dozens of Caodaist branches of the communist cause. Caodaism was legalized in 1997 and is now Vietnam's third largest religion after Buddhism and Catholicism. Phát was also a promoter of the Scout movement, connecting this with his religion as a military strategy in his struggle against the French. He also bridged the old Sino-Vietnamese and Western secret societies, several denominations of the new Cao Đài religion, and those of the nationalist and communist factions.

Phát was born into a wealthy land-owning family in a remote area in Bạc Liêu province, in the Mekong Delta of the southern region of Vietnam. His grandfather, Cao Cần Thiệt, was a migrant from Chaozhou who arrived in Cochinchina at the age of eighteen and married a Vietnamese woman. Their son, Cao Minh Thạnh (1860–1919), the father of Cao Triều Phát, was chief of Bạc Liêu province and married a Sino-Vietnamese woman, Tào Thị Xúc (1858–1901). Phát was born on 17 April 1889 in Vĩnh Hinh hamlet in the Vĩnh Lợi village of Bạc Liêu province and was the fifth of eight siblings.

He graduated from Chasseloup-Laubat College in Saigon in 1910. As one of the few privileged young Vietnamese, he attended this French-speaking school in which the Indochinese elite was educated to meet the administrative needs of the colonial system. After a training course in law at the Court of Saigon, he accepted a job as secretary-translator at the court of Bạc Liêu. He then decided to marry Lê Thị Lựu (1894–1953) and the union bore one son, Cao Triều Liêm, born in 1912. His wife soon revealed a fragile health and the marriage ended. Phát married again in the 1930s. With his new wife, a young Sino-Vietnamese girl named Châu Thị Tùng (1912–2005), he had two daughters and a son.

In 1914, during the First World War, he volunteered to leave Vietnam for France as a sergeant and translator, to take charge of Vietnamese soldiers enlisted into the French Army. In 1917, during his eight-year residence in France, he was initiated in 1917 into the freemason lodge, "Les Francs chevaliers d'Écosse et la solidarité réunis" ("The Franc-Scottish Knights and the joined solidarity") in Bordeaux. The lodge aimed to promote intellectualism and preserve the Scottish rite. It also required members to make large financial contributions.

Returning to Cochinchina in 1922, Phát began his political career and founded the Indochinese Labour Party (Đông Dương Lao động Đảng) on 12 November 1926, which existed until 1931. He also worked as a political editorialist for two newspapers of the time, L'Ère nouvelle ("The New Era") and Nhựt Tân Báo (the "First Modern Newspaper"), which were both prohibited by the French in 1929. In 1930 he was nominated to the Administrative Board of Cochinchinese (Hội đồng Quản hạt Nam Kỳ).

Caodaism emerged between 1925 and 1926 in the Mekong Delta when the supreme divinity, Cao Đài Master, revealed himself through a flying phoenix (phò loan 扶鸾) or spirit-writing séances, to Vietnamese civil servants. "Cao Đài" — the supreme platform — is the abbreviation for 'Cao-Đài Tiên-Ông Đại-Bồ-Tát Ma-Ha-Tát' (高台天皇大菩萨摩诃萨), which means the "Supreme Platform for the Highest Immortal and Great Bodhisattva Mahasattva", with an implicit and millenarian reference to the heavenly jade emperor of the Chinese. Caodaists directly controlled a large part of southern Vietnam, establishing their own army during the Japanese Occupation and the ensuing war of independence.

Phát did not become a Caodaist until the demise of his political party, the Indochinese Labour Party. He converted from Buddhism to Caodaism on 30 April 1932 in Thái Dương Minh temple of Bạc Liêu and joined the Tiên Thiên (先天) denomination in 1932. A series of lost political battles against the French colonizers undoubtedly led him to recalibrate his rhetoric into a religious one, as he considered Caodaism to be a new, but very powerful force of mobilization. Evidence indicates deliberate attempts on the part of Caodaist leaders to catch the attention of Phát. For example, in 1926, his younger sister, Cao Thị Khiết (1895–1920), who died from disease four years after her wedding, was elevated to the Caodaist pantheon as the incarnation of the ninth immortal, cửu nương (九娘), surrounding the Golden Mother of the Jasper Pond — Diêu Trì Kim Mẫu (瑶池金母). The planned incarnation of his sister was the factor that motivated his religious conversion. He was given the religious appellation, 'Thuận Đạt' (顺达) — which means to "reach a spirit of harmony", and took the pseudonym Sơn Kỳ Giang, meaning "the strange river of the mountain" — a metaphor pertaining to his patriotism.

He was simultaneously attracted by the communist proposal to join forces in order to dispose of the colonial yoke. Aware of the economic crisis that had struck Indo-China since 1930 and weakened the resources of the Tây Ninh denomination — the denomination that was most numerically substantial — Phát established in Bạc Liêu a new denomination called Minh Chơn Lý (明真理) or Minh Chơn Đạo (明真道) — the "Way of the enlightened truth" — with the support of Trần Đạo Quang (1870–1946), a Taoist leader of the Minh Sư (明师) secret society. He was nominated cardinal (chưởng pháp 掌法) in this Caodaist denomination, the only remaining denomination with ties to the communists. He used his paternalistic influence as the plantation owner of a pool of labourers to found this Caodaist denomination; it is estimated that he had 5,000 hectares of plantations. The League for the Independence of Vietnam (Việt Nam Độc lập Đồng minh Hội or Việt Minh) found in the "family network" of Phát a powerful ally.

In 1941, Phát became a member of the provincial committee of the Communist Party (originally a clandestine operation formed in 1939) in Bạc Liêu, and subscribed to the Việt Minh cause for independence. He was soon afterwards named vice-president of the Committee of National Liberation — Ủy ban Giải phóng Dân tộc — for Bạc Liêu. Coming from a local wealthy and powerful family, he naturally became president of the committee in 1945. Around this time he started a Caodaist Scout movement which attempted to bridge the various Caodaist denominations.

It was in Saigon and within the Minh Tân temple (明新) — the last of the new-born Minh secret societies — that he organized the "Federation of the Virtuous Youth" (Thanh niên Đạo đức Đoàn) in 1945, opening a scout section with the participation of three other Caodaists: the journalist, Phan Trường Mạnh (1895–1967), Doctor Trương Kế An (1899–1983), and the politician, Phan Khắc Sửu (1905–70), who would later become president of the Republic of South Vietnam from 1964–65. The Scout movement was conceived like a semi-military structure in which recruits were being instilled with the values of the rituals and ideas of national liberation.

At the beginning of 1946, in the struggle against the French Army, Phát withdrew to his "Holy See" of Bạc Liêu — that means the main church of his denomination in a Caodaist vision — and founded a base of resistance there. On 14 October 1947, he coordinated a clandestine conference at Đồng Tháp Mười village, with the objective of creating a "unified association of the twelve Caodaist denominations for patriotic salvation" (Hội Cao Đài Cứu Quốc 12 phái Hợp Nhứt). Its main objective was to organize Caodaists into a patriotic front against the colonial invaders for the Communist cause, following the example of other religions such as Catholicism and Buddhism. As president of the management committee of the aforesaid association, he was assisted by two Communist vice-presidents: Nguyễn Ngọc Nhựt, son of the Caodaist Pope of Bến Tre province, and Nguyễn Văn Khảm, from the Tiên Thiên denomination. However, Phát and the Việt Minh failed in their political objective, primarily because of the weak military support and institutional legitimacy given by France to another Caodaist denomination, the Holy See of Tây Ninh.

During the Geneva Conference on 21 July 1954, Phát concluded that all pro-Việt Minh Caodaist dignitaries had to move to Cà Mau, a marshy area in the extreme south of Vietnam which French soldiers would find difficult to access. Weakened and old, he decided to travel to North Vietnam by air on 17 September 1954 to meet President Ho Chi Minh. On the Lunar New Year's Day of 24 January 1955, he organized a religious ceremony at 48 Hòa Mã Street in Hanoi, which was to become the first Caodaist temple in the Communist North. The temple is still active today. On 9 September 1956, Phát died at the B.303 Hospital in Hanoi. The government of President Ho Chi Minh organized a solemn funeral in remembrance.

Cham Tao Soon

(詹道存, Zhan Daocun, 1939–)
Academic, engineer, Singapore

Often credited with building up Nanyang Technological University (NTU) into a tertiary institution of high repute, Cham Tao Soon has had a long career in academia. Due to his long service as a university lecturer and researcher, Cham has contributed a great deal to the field of engineering in Singapore. Born in 1939, Cham completed his education at Raffles Institution. He followed this by reading engineering in the University of Malaya, from which he graduated with an honours degree in civil engineering in 1964. Upon graduation, he worked briefly as a consulting engineer. However, the lure of learning and sharing that which he had learnt soon led to him returning to the educational fold. Thus, he applied for a lecturing position at Singapore Polytechnic. He was successful in his application and he remained at Singapore Polytechnic until he went for further studies. His experience at Singapore Polytechnic stood him in good stead, for he secured a place at the University of London two years later. At the University of London, he worked hard and came away with a Bachelor of Science degree in Mathematics, with honours. After completing his education at the University of London, Cham went to Cambridge University in the United Kingdom on a Commonwealth Scholarship. It was from Cambridge University that he obtained his Doctor of Philosophy in Fluid Mechanics.

Eager to contribute to the area of theoretical engineering and desirous of developing young minds in the different fields of engineering, Cham took up the position of lecturer with the University of Singapore in 1969. His dedication to his field and his students ensured his steady rise within the faculty, culminating in his promotion to the position of dean of the Engineering Faculty in 1978. He remained in this position until 1983. Owing to his excellent work as both lecturer and dean of the Engineering Faculty at the University of Singapore, he was appointed President of the newly re-incepted NTU (known at the time as Nanyang Technological Institute or NTI) in 1981. As the former incarnation of that institution, Nanyang University, had been 'absorbed' into the University of Singapore to form the National University of Singapore in 1980, the newly re-incepted NTI was in need of strong and innovative leadership. Cham provided just that and was duly appointed professor of NTI in 1983. He must have been very assiduous in his duties, for NTI was accorded university status in 1991 and changed its name to Nanyang Technological University. Thus, it could be said that Cham had likely played a significant role in NTU becoming the second English-medium University in Singapore. He remained in his position as President and professor at NTU until 2003, whereupon he was appointed Distinguished University Professor. During his long tenure at NTU, Cham oversaw the transformation of the institution from NTI to NTU. At the same time, he was also responsible for building up NTU into a tertiary institution comparable to its sister, the National University of Singapore. Indeed, he is still known as the man who helmed NTU from 1981 to 2002, and is still acknowledged as the founding President of NTU.

Contrary to the common misconception of engineers and academicians being disinterested in anything outside their research fields, Cham is also a patron of the arts. This patronage undoubtedly sprang from his earnest desire to foster the intellectual and creative growth of young Singaporeans. Thus, he served as Chairman of the Nanyang Academy of Fine Arts (2002 to the present), Singapore Symphonia Company (1999 to the present), NatSteel Ltd (1988 to the present), and Wearnes Technology Pte Ltd (1986–99). In the spirit of nurturing engineering talent in various fields within the discipline, he had also served as the director of Keppel Corporation (1982–2002), Adroit Innovations, the Land Transport Authority, TPA Strategic Holdings, and Robinson & Company. Additionally, he has been the deputy chairman of Singapore Press Holdings since 2004. He is also presently serving on the Singapore Institute of Management (SIM) University Board of Trustees and has been in that position since 1997. Cham is still very highly regarded in academia for he is acknowledged as Professor Emeritus of Nanyang Technology as well as the Chairman and Chancellor of SIM University. As a testament to his wide range of interest in engineering, culture and the arts, he also holds the post of director of WBL Corporation, Soup Restaurant Group and Singapore International Foundation.

In these various capacities, Cham has been instrumental in encouraging the development of various fields of engineering in his students. To date, he is a fellow of the Institution of Engineers in Singapore, the Institution of Mechanical Engineers in the United Kingdom and the Royal Academy of Engineering in the United Kingdom. For his contributions to academia and his efforts, achievements and research in engineering, Cham was made a Chevalier dans l'Ordre des Palmes Académiques in 1979, admitted into the Distinguished Service Order in 2003, and awarded with the Royal Academy of Engineering Inaugural International Medal in 2006.

Although his tenure as Chairman of Wearnes Technology lapsed in 1999, Cham's contributions and insights into the field of engineering technology are still very much valued. This may be gleaned from the fact that he is still an independent and non-executive director at Wearnes Technology, a post to which he was re-elected in 2008.

Already well known for his contributions to academia and the field of engineering, Cham's innovative spirit and unflagging spirit continues to serve the public in his many non-academic capacities. He was appointed to the United Overseas Bank (UOB) board of trustees on 4 January 2001 and was so upright and effective in his position that he was re-elected as the director of the board on 30 April 2008. In his capacity as an independent and non-executive director, he sits on the Chair of the UOB audit committee and is a member of the bank's executive, nominating and remuneration committees. Additionally, he also serves as the director of UOB's subsidiaries, such as Far Eastern Bank and the United Overseas Bank in China. Concurrent to his post as UOB non-executive director, Cham is also Chairman of MFS Technology and the Singapore-China Foundation. Currently, he is a member of the Council of Presidential Advisers.

For his public spiritedness and contributions to the academic scene in Singapore, he was awarded with the Public Administration Medal (PPA) and the Distinguished Service Order (DUBC). Likewise, his academic contributions to the various fields of engineering have resulted in the University of Strathclyde, the University of Surrey, Loughborough University and Soka University conferring honorary degrees upon him.

Chamlong Srimuang

(Lu Kimhor, 卢金河, Lu Jinhe, 1935–)
Army officer, politician, protest leader, Thailand

Chamlong Srimuang, an ethnic Teochew with the childhood nickname of Kim Hor, was born on 5 July 1935, in Thonburi, across the river from Bangkok. His father, Lu Hasiew, a trader who had emigrated from China, fathered two sons with his Thai-born wife Boonruean, a street hawker who was also of Chinese descent. The elder son was sent to China to be raised by his grandmother but died during the Second World War. Chamlong, the younger son, was barely three years old when his father died. At the age of 12, Chamlong took the surname "Srimuang", when his mother married a postman by the name of Chot Srimuang.

As a poor boy seeking social advancement, Chamlong applied to the Army and Navy cadet schools, was accepted by both, and opted for the Army. He graduated from Class 7 of the Chulachomklao Royal Military Academy, where in his final year he served as chief cadet. However, his graduation was marred by a conflict with the senior officers of the Academy, whom he had accused of corruption. He ended up being punished for raising funds by organizing showings of outdoor movies, which were then banned under martial law regulations. For this offence he was stripped of his position of chief cadet and saw his graduation delayed, only receiving his graduation sword long after his classmates.

Chamlong was subsequently assigned to the Signals Corps rather than the more prestigious infantry or cavalry, but he remained an important player in Class 7, which emerged as one of the leading cliques in the Thai Army during the 1970s and 1980s. As a signals officer at the height of the Cold War, he was sent on two training assignments to the United States, totalling eighteen months, in the early 1960s. In 1964, Chamlong married Army Major Sirilak (Nonglak) Khiawla-o, a "star" Chulalongkorn University pharmacy graduate.

Chamlong saw combat during a special mission to Laos in 1968. Ironically, he later claimed that he had only been sent to Laos by mistake. He also served a tour of duty in South Vietnam, and spent two years at the Naval Postgraduate School in Monterey, California, where he gained a master's degree in 1974. He returned to Thailand to become an intelligence officer at the headquarters of the Supreme Command during the heady mid-1970s. His role in the events of 6 October 1976 later became the subject of controversy; he has admitted involvement in a rightist demonstration at the Royal Plaza on that day, but has always vigorously denied that he was involved in the massacre of students at Thammasat University.

Chamlong's political debut came in 1980, when he was appointed secretary-general to Prime Minister General Prem Tinsulanonda. Prem had been installed in office through the backing of a group of Class 7 officers popularly known as the Young Turks, whose leaders included Colonel Manun Rupkhachon. Although he was supposed to be the Young Turks' point man in the Prem administration, Chamlong sided with Prem during the group's failed April 1981 coup attempt. This meant that his position was no longer tenable, and he resigned soon afterwards, ostensibly because of his strong opposition to abortion.

During the late 1970s Chamlong had become a devout member of the Santi Asok Buddhist sect, becoming a vegetarian, giving away his possessions and taking a vow of celibacy. For several years after his 1981 resignation, he travelled around Thailand, living frugally and preaching the dharma while continuing to draw an army officer's salary.

Chamlong was promoted to major-general in October 1985 but served as a general for only two days, before resigning from the Army and standing as an independent candidate for election as governor of Bangkok. Under the banner of the Ruam Phalang (United Force) Group, he won the election after gaining 480,233 votes, almost twice the vote of the Democrat Party candidate Chana Rungsaeng, who had originally been seen as the front runner. After initial resistance to entering party politics, he established the Phalang Dhamma (Moral Force) Party in 1988. For the next four years Chamlong grew increasingly popular, his name closely associated with several themes: the withdrawal of the military from political meddling, the rejection of corruption and money politics, the quest for cleaner and more competent political parties, and calls for greater decentralization of power.

Chamlong went on to win a second term as Bangkok governor in 1990 with a landslide 703,671 votes. But, in the wake of the February 1991 military coup, he decided to resign the governorship to run for parliament. In the 22 March 1992 general election, his Phalang Dharma Party won 32 out of 35 parliamentary seats in the capital.

Chamlong soon became involved in extra-parliamentary rally politics when former army commander and coup leader Suchinda Kraprayun was appointed prime minister, an appointment widely criticized as illegitimate. After first proclaiming a hunger strike, Chamlong assumed the leading role in massive anti-Suchinda street protests in central Bangkok during May 1992, which culminated in a violent military crackdown involving 52 confirmed deaths. On 18 May, Chamlong was arrested; on 20 May, he and Suchinda appeared on television kneeling on the floor before King Bhumibol Adulyadej and listening to a royal rebuke. Suchinda resigned as prime minister shortly afterwards, while Chamlong's own political ambitions never recovered from this dark and controversial episode. To his supporters, he had helped defeat dictatorship and restore Thailand to democracy; to his detractors, he had acted recklessly and "led people to die".

Palang Dharma lost Bangkok seats to the more conservative Democrat Party in Thailand's September 1992 general elections, and, while Chamlong later assumed the position of deputy prime minister in a Democrat-led administration, he was never comfortable in this subordinate role. In May 1995, he pulled Palang Dharma out of the coalition government, so removing Prime Minister Chuan Likphai from power and triggering fresh elections. At this point he handed over the leadership of the party to then political neophyte Thaksin Shinawatra, a billionaire telecommunications tycoon. For the next decade Chamlong served as a somewhat improbable mentor to a man whose materialism, worldiness and incredible affluence seemed the polar opposite of Chamlong's own values and image. Thaksin was unable to handle the contentious factional politics of Phalang Dharma, however, and he soon launched a political party of his own, Thai Rak Thai.

In 1996 the ever-restless Chamlong made an unsuccessful bid to regain the Bangkok governorship, losing ignominiously: his political star had now badly faded. With his wife Sirilak, he turned his energies to a range of charitable activities, including a leadership school in Kanchanaburi, a vast dogs' home near Don Mueang, and a project to provide free dialysis for poor kidney patients. These activities helped him maintain his image in the media, which always formed an important element in his political calculations.

In 2006 Chamlong returned to the headlines by leading a public protest against efforts by prominent businessman Charoen Siriwatthanaphakdi to list Thai Beverage Plc, the producer of Chang Beer, on the Securities Exchange of Thailand. Chamlong argued that such a move would further promote and boost alcohol sales.

The Chang Beer campaign was just a warm-up, however, for Chamlong's full-blown return to rally politics. Early in 2006 he broke publicly with his long-time protégé Thaksin Shinawatra, who had by then served as prime minister for five years. Accusing Thaksin of abusing his power and profiting financially from political office, Chamlong became one of the five core leaders of the anti-Thaksin People's Alliance for Democracy (PAD). In effect, the main leader of the movement was media tycoon Sondhi Limthongkun, and Chamlong served as his de facto number two, responsible primarily for the logistics of the protests, which began on 19 February 2006. Through a series of mass rallies, the PAD — wearing trademark yellow shirts that symbolized their professed loyalty to the monarchy — helped destabilize the Thaksin government and so created the conditions for the 19 September 2006 military coup which ousted him.

When Thaksin's People's Power Party (PPP) won the first post-coup election in December 2007, Chamlong's longtime arch-rival Samak Suntharawet assumed the post of prime minister. The PAD then re-emerged, seizing Government House from August to November 2008 and holding nightly mass rallies there before moving on to take control of Bangkok's airports. In December 2008, the PPP was dissolved by the courts, and a new Democrat-led coalition assumed office.

Chamlong was among those involved in the creation of the New Politics Party, the ill-fated political wing of the PAD, in 2009. However, he campaigned for a "no vote" (in other words, he urged people not to vote for any party) in the July 2011 elections.

Chamlong Srimuang played a crucial role in the unmaking of five Thai prime ministers: Suchinda Kraprayun (1992), Chuan Likphai (1995), Thaksin Shinawatra (2006), Samak Suntharawet (2008) and his successor Somchai Wongsawat (2008). His maverick career, spanning the military, electoral politics, social activism and rally leadership, makes him one of the most extraordinary figures in modern Thai political history. The first decade of his political career from 1985 to 1995 saw some remarkable achievements, but in later years he seemed to lose his way, swinging from ill-judged uncritical support for Thaksin, to a relentless and ultimately self-defeating anti-Thaksin fixation.

Despite his flaws — the main one being a complete lack of reflexivity — Chamlong Srimuang's life has been characterized by tremendous energy and determination, and a remarkable, if not always sustained, ability to grasp the prevailing mood of the Bangkok public.

Chan Ah Kow

(陈亚九, Chen Yajiu, 1912–96)

Athlete, national coach, sport administrator, Singapore

Dr Chan Ah Kow was a driving force behind attempts to raise competitive sporting standards in Singapore after 1965. From a foundation as a highly talented sportsman, notably during his undergraduate days in the 1930s, he became highly influential both as a coach and an administrator during the 1960s and 1970s. He was the coach of the national swimming team at six consecutive South East Asian Peninsular (SEAP) and South East Asian (SEA) Games between 1965 and 1975.

Chan was born in Taiping in 1912. His father, Chan Tai, had migrated from China and established a small, but profitable iron foundry. The young Chan attended King Edward VII School where he became a sports champion. He dominated many athletic events, notably hurdles, becoming school champion three years in a row (1930–32). He was also head boy of the school in 1931 and 1932.

His most dramatic year was 1933 — the same year he moved to Singapore to begin his medical studies. Within the space of a month he played Malaya Cup football for Perak and then won the Keith Cup at the first annual athletics meeting of the King Edward VII College of Medicine in Singapore. The crowning moments of the year, however, came in December, when he was the champion athlete at the 2nd Singapore Chinese athletics sports meet at Jalan Besar stadium. On the basis of his performances he was selected to represent Singapore at the All-Malayan Chinese Olympiad held in Kuala Lumpur, where he set a new Far Eastern Olympic record of 15.2 seconds in the 110-m hurdles event.

In rugby, football, and athletics he attracted attention and developed a reputation as an entertainer. His speed and bravery served him well in most sporting contests. Lee Kip Lee wrote that he was "a most colourful character" who "never failed to capture the attention of the spectators, especially the girls".

"… what attracted the attention of everyone was the garb which adorned his muscular frame. He had a cloth cap on his head, a long-sleeve jersey with a turtleneck, and leather gloves. That, and the many spectacular saves he made, earned him thunderous applause."

The final years of Chan's medical training coincided with the early war years in Europe. He qualified as a doctor in 1940. Just one month before the Japanese Occupation began, he married Elizabeth Giam in January 1942. In difficult and harrowing times the couple had three children, two daughters — Mei Ling and Vicky, and one son, Bernard.

During the immediate post-war years, Dr Chan initially turned his sporting attention to tennis. It was common for him to go to clubs and private residences to play with friends and associates. In 1948, he appeared in the first post-war Singapore Lawn Tennis Association tournament played indoors at the Happy World amusement park. The Chan residence in Mountbatten Road, known as Chansville, became a focal point for tennis practice and competitions.

In December 1948 Singapore entered a golden age of sporting success when the Malayan badminton team won the inaugural Thomas Cup competition in England. Chan was the medical adviser who attended to the team. This was the first of many major international visits that stimulated his desire for national success. As well as opening his eyes to the sporting practices adopted in other countries, the tournament may also have prompted him to become a generous sponsor of local and international competitions. In 1949 he donated a challenge cup for the new inter-university sporting contests between Hong Kong universities and the combined colleges in Singapore.

Chan recognized the need for athletes to capitalize on their experiences abroad. In 1950 the most prestigious competition after the Olympic Games were the British Empire Games. Chan highlighted an important message to younger sportsmen when he advised the seven-man team travelling to Auckland to show the world that Malaya was not only known for tin, rubber, and badminton players, but was also a country of good all-round sportsmen. In 1952 he accompanied the Olympic team to Helsinki, where he filmed events for later analysis.

It was at this time that the Chan family itself went through a period of dramatic change. Chan and Elizabeth Giam separated. Lucy became Chan's second wife, and together they had four children. Second son Alex was followed by Pat, Roy, and later Mark. All the children grew up with tennis matches as a regular feature of home life and swimming as a competitive challenge, rivalled only by the pursuit of academic excellence.

Throughout the 1960s Chan maintained a close affiliation with the Singapore Lawn Tennis Association (SLTA). In 1960, as vice-president of SLTA, he was leading the attempts to obtain the affiliation of Singapore as a Davis Cup nation. In 1963, at the time of merger with Malaya, he was elected the new president of SLTA and became dedicated to the task of seeking equal representation for Singapore on the proposed Malaysian Olympic Council.

It was Chan who introduced innovatory training systems to stretch the potential of his children and other swimmers under his charge at the Chinese Swimming Club. The British Empire and Commonwealth Games in 1966 had proved to be an eye-opener for Chan and a catalyst for change for sports in Singapore. The games represented the first major international event for Singapore after gaining independence. Chan was established as vice-president of the Singapore Olympic and Sports Council (SOSC) and was manager of the swimming team travelling to Kingston, Jamaica. The small Singapore team discovered their sportsmen and women were lagging far behind the larger countries. Chan then became more critical of sporting standards in Singapore and commented that Singaporean athletes at the games were "like secondary school children taking a wide-eyed look at other well-trained far advanced university students". The strongest message from him was that Singaporeans should only compete in sports in which they stood a chance. Intelligent foresight, combined with sound planning and identification of appropriate sports, could produce success.

During the early years of Singapore's independence, the Chan clan, as it was also known, recorded many national and international successes. From 1965–73, Pat, Bernard, Alex, Roy, and Mark together accumulated forty-seven individual gold medals in the SEAP Games. In 1967 Chan became president of the Singapore Amateur Swimming Association and was identified by Othman Wok, president of the SOSC, as "the best example of a dedicated coach". This dedication was rewarded in 1970, when the new award — Coach of the Year — was introduced. He was to achieve this accolade three times in all.

In 1972, Chan published a plan designed to boost Singapore's chances of success in regional competitions. He focused on selective specialization or the channelling schoolchildren to the sports best suited for their physical and mental make-up. He saw a strong need for incentives such as sports scholarships at all levels of education, and the introduction of a point system in the extra-curricular activities.

At the Munich Olympic Games of 1972, Chan was again an accompanying official. He came away with the realization that Singapore would always be chasing the stronger nations. Swimmers in Singapore tended to retire at an earlier age than their rivals from Japan for example. A major consequence of the experience in Munich was the introduction of plans to bring foreign coaches into Singapore and to send potential winners on training stints abroad.

In 1973 Chan stepped down as SLTA president, but continued to work for greater participation and better results in swimming. In 1976, he was awarded the Public Service Medal and, in 1985, made an honorary life member of the Singapore Amateur Swimming Association. One decade later he received a long service award from the Chinese Swimming Club. He passed away in March 1996.

Chan, Carlos

(施恭旗, Shi Gongqi, 1942–)
Entrepreneur, philanthropist, Philippines

Among the Chinese-Filipino businessmen who ventured into China, Carlos Chan is the most successful. The phenomenal success of Oishi snack food in China is now a model that most business schools would want to teach. Chan's success in China has redounded to the Philippines. It enables him to help his country more — by promoting the Philippines to Chinese investors, helping the marginalized, and showing to China and the Chinese that the Philippines is a country of great potential. Chan's brainchild, the Liwayway Group of Companies, is a wholly Filipino company that has penetrated many markets throughout China and across Asia. Today, it operates in China, Vietnam, Myanmar, Thailand, and Indonesia, and continues to expand its presence.

Chan was born in Manila on 26 December 1942. Right after the war, his parents, Chan Lib (施阁头) and See Ying (李梅芬) put up a small family business repacking flour and coffee products. Liwayway Marketing eventually became the country's leading supplier of what then became the flagship product of the business, Liwayway Gawgaw (laundry starch).

In 1966, the Liwayway Marketing Corporation (LMC) was established, and the business expanded to include the distribution of pomade, starch, coffee, confectioneries, candles, candies, sauces, and other basic commodities.

The Chan brothers, Carlos and Manuel, actively participated in the growing business. Ten years later, under the management of Manuel Chan, LMC diversified into the manufacturing of snack food products, beginning with "Oishi Prawn Crackers" and "Kirei Yummy Flakes". The snack food business proved to be encouraging, and the company eventually concentrated on this enterprise. Over the decades, Oishi has been the food companion of generations of Filipinos.

Upon the death of his father, Carlos Chan bought the family-owned Liwayway Marketing Corporation when his siblings decided to venture into their own businesses. A few years before Chan bought Liwayway, he had set up Chan C. Brothers (CCB) in 1963, a company that manufactured plastic signboards. CCB later ventured into the trading of construction materials, and eventually went into manufacturing commercial and decorative lighting fixtures, outdoor lighting fixtures, and acrylic sheets. Through the years, CCB became quite well known in the country as a provider of high quality fixtures, and so could supply and is still supplying its products to many prominent establishments all over the Philippines.

Chan's equally famous brother, Ben Chan, creator of fashion line Bench, attributed Carlos Chan's success to his personality. As a young university student, Chan played football — a sport that needed endurance and patience. His artistic inclination, inherited from his mother, gives him incredible people skills and a great public relations persona. He is also a man of vision. Ben Chan recounted: "He dreamt long ago that he would set up business in China even before China opened its doors to the world."

In the 1980s, when China was slowly opening up to the world, Chan was cautiously studying its market. At the time, business conditions were quite restrictive, transportation was difficult, and investments parameters were not profitable. With courage and vision, Chan went back and forth to China for five years and finally decided to export Oishi products there first while setting up production facilities for the first cooperative joint venture companies in Shanghai.

In 1993, Liwayway started its China operations with two rented factories in Shanghai and 400 employees. In its first year, Liwayway China lost RMB2.9 million as it took time to stabilize operations and establish a more performance-based or profit-oriented management style. Many of Chan's own managers urged him to give up. Instead, Chan steeled himself to run the factory personally in the face of difficulties. He listened to his employees, valued their ideas, and despite his lack of capital, gave two salary increases, boosting the morale of his workforce. Under his leadership, the entire workforce worked together to manufacture and promote the brand "Oishi 上好佳", which fortunately, turned the tide for the company. Before the cooperative joint venture, the China partner produced prawn chips. After this bitter-sweet experience, Chan relied on strict and professional management. He was generous to his employees, giving them pay raises and even installing heating in the workers' canteen, thus getting everyone's loyalty. He often invited foreign and local experts and technicians to give advice on modernized production methods.

Today Liwayway (China) Company Limited (LCCL) has twelve factories, including two fruit juice factories and more than 6,000 employees. LCCL's Oishi food snack is now among the biggest snack food manufacturers in China, with over US$250 million in annual sales. The China operations of Liwayway China Company Limited include twelve companies, and the products received the Shanghai Famous Brands Award in 2001. The 2004 Report from the China Trade Statistics Bureau named Oishi as the leading snack food brand in China. Manufacturing facilities have since also been set up in Ho Chi Minh City, Vietnam (1997), Hanoi, Vietnam (2005), Yangon, Myanmar (1999), Indonesia (2006), and Thailand (2006). Oishi is now also the leading snack food brand in Vietnam and Myanmar, and is continuing to expand in Asia.

In the nearly two decades since Chan set up "Oishi 上好佳" in Shanghai, the company has won the trust of customers, including government officials. Chan promoted and supported many trade exhibitions held in Shanghai and helped promote Shanghai's ideal business climate. He was given the Magnolia Gold Award (1998), one of the highest honours given to expatriates by the City of Shanghai.

Chan's ardent love for the Philippines is well-known and unequalled. Wherever a Liwayway factory is located around Asia, a Philippine flag is hoisted, as it is one of the ways that Liwayway manifests its pride in being rooted in the Philippines. The packaging of Oishi products feature the "Wow, Philippines" mark to promote the country as one of the best tourist spots in the world. As part of the effort to promote the Philippines to the world, Chan was one of the major sponsors of the Philippine Pavilion at the Shanghai Expo 2010. For Chinese visitors, it was probably a surprise for them to learn that their favourite Oishi 上好佳 is actually Filipino. Also at the expo, Chan was awarded the Order of Sikatuna conferred by President Gloria Macapagal-Arroyo during the Philippine Independence Day rites (12 June 2012) conducted at the Philippine Pavilion. The award is for Chan's pioneering success as an entrepreneur who produces quality food, both in the Philippines and China, and for his strengthening relations between the two countries, as exemplified by the philanthropic and cultural projects he envisioned.

As with many business tycoons, Chan is not satisfied with just making money. His love for the Philippines encouraged him, and other like-minded friends, to put up the Philippine Soong Ching Ling Foundation (PSCLF, 菲律宾宋庆龄基金会). Chan was the founding chairman at the foundation's inception in 2004. The PSCLF aims to carry forward the spirit of Soong Ching Ling and her unfinished cause — helping poor women and children in the Philippines — and to strengthen cultural and educational exchanges between children from China and the Philippines. Through the foundation, Chan brought the Loboc Children's Choir to perform at the Shanghai Expo, and has since supported the choir and brought them to perform in many cities in China. Through the PSCLF and Kaisa Para sa Kaunlaran (Unity for Progress), he has also put up low-cost housing projects in partnership with the Gawad Kalinga organization. Oishi Villages are now in Cavite, Baseco, Manila, and Maralit, Paranaque.

Chan's love for the Philippines is quite evident as he enthused to visitors to the Shanghai Philippine Pavillon about the Loboc Children's Choir of Bohol. To help promote the choir and the province of Bohol, the choir hummed the Oishi jingle in television advertisements, and printed ads for Oishi in China featuring Bohol's scenic spots prominently. Going deeper than just promoting its tourist attractions, Chan helps in the development of Bohol through projects such as the installation of lighting in the province. For this, province officials have made Chan a "Son of Bohol". Beyond promoting the tourism potential of the Philippines, Chan makes sure that Chinese businessmen get to invest in the country. He markets the Philippines' investment potential even as he strives for newer places to promote the company's expanding product base. Chan personally escorted Expo visitors and talked to them about how the Philippines can emulate the immense growth that has happened in Shanghai. He would point to the frenetic pace of infrastructure build-up and dwell on his wish that the Philippines can play catch-up.

Chan is described as a thoughtful and sharing brother. He has brought all his siblings to their father's Xiamen hometown to see their parents' original home. Today he teaches his children, Carlson, Archie, Rinby, Larry, Oszen, and Shera the same work ethic that he and his siblings learned from their parents. He reminds them to remember always that it is the Philippines that gave them the opportunity for growth.

Chan Choy Siong

Civil servant, politician, Singapore

At a time when men dominated the public sphere and political life, Chan Choy Siong rose to break down the gender barrier and became the first woman in Singapore politics. Indeed, Chan was instrumental in shaping the women's rights movement in Singapore in her roles as first elected female Member of Parliament and head of the People's Action Party (PAP) Women's League. Her interest in assisting the elements of society that experienced less representation in socio-economic affairs — namely women, children and the elderly — helped secure the place of women as valued contributors to society. Her efforts in going against the then existent prejudices in society where women were generally considered inferior to men, empowered women to contribute to the world at large. Her interests in improving the lot of women in a male-dominated world may be attributed to her personal history.

Born to a poor family, she would help out at her father's chee cheong fun food stall while still in school. At a time where polygamy was widely practised, and most girls were not educated, her father was fairly progressive and allowed her to study at Nanyang Girls High School. Growing up in the 1940s and 1950s, she saw for herself that education for girls was skimmed over at best. Most girls were not educated, or, at best, primary school educated, and very few had secondary education. Likewise, there were not many jobs for women and they were paid much less than men. She also knew that female participation in the public sphere was frowned upon and female participation in politics was ridiculed. Yet she was determined to overcome these obstacles. As a first step in her determination to change these mindsets, she joined the PAP at the age of twenty, five months after the Party was formally inaugurated in October 1954.

This was very bold of Chan on two counts. Politics was not seen to be a fit occupation for a woman, as a woman's place was thought to be at home. If a woman had any interest in politics, she was ridiculed. Participating in active political campaigning was frowned upon because of prevailing societal prejudices against women. Moreover, dabbling in politics in the 1950s was deemed to be a folly, especially if one was allied to a party (such as the PAP) that called for self-rule and independence. It was feared that political parties such as the PAP could potentially clash with the British colonial authority.

Nevertheless, Chan was determined to overcome these obstacles. She braced herself against opposition from the Chinese-speaking population and ridicule from the more conservative members of the PAP. Demonstrating her fluency in Mandarin and various Chinese dialects, her strong conviction that women were every bit as capable as men, and her determination to ensure that women were treated fairly by men in both the public and private spheres, Chan soon gained the respect of her PAP colleagues. Once her colleagues saw her capabilities and realized that she shared their passion for radically changing Singapore for the better, the PAP fielded her as a candidate for election when women were granted the vote in 1955. Consequently, Chan managed to win the important votes of women and was elected as a city councillor in 1957. She was subsequently elected to the Legislative Assembly in the 1959 elections and became a Member of Parliament for Delta.

Her interest in women's affairs and ensuring the institutionalization of some form of equality for women was most clearly seen during the time she served on the PAP's Central Executive Committee from 1957 to 1963, where she spearheaded the formation of the Party's subcommittees for women. Moreover, she led the PAP Women's League, a forerunner to the present PAP's Women's Wing. She campaigned for the Women's Charter, which called for marriages to be registered with the government, and also demanded the institution of monogamous marriages. Despite much male opposition to the Women's Charter and the monogamy proposal, the then minister of law, Kenny Bryne, allowed the charter to be passed in 1961. This may be considered one of the greatest achievements not only for Chan, but for all Singapore women. Through the passage of the Women's Charter, women and their properties would be protected by the law and the state. If they were in any way ill treated, harassed, or abused at home or at the workplace, women could now seek redress from the law. Throughout Chan's political career, she organized many programmes for women to improve both their lives and their place in society. Following the schism within the PAP in 1961 when members of the party left to form the Barisan Sosialis, the PAP realized the importance of wooing the female vote. Accordingly, Chan led and successfully formed a Women's Affairs Bureau within the PAP to improve the status of women in society.

On her retirement from politics in 1970, Chan, who was married to former Minister Ong Pang Boon, continued to campaign for equal work and equal pay for women. However, following her retirement, no other woman managed to be elected into parliament until 1984. This did not prevent several failed bids by several women from opposition parties to enter parliament between 1970 and 1984.

By 1984, the trend had changed. It was acknowledged that women in politics could make an important contribution to society just as Chan Choy Siong had done. However, Chan did not live long enough to witness this change as she died tragically in a car accident in 1984. Three PAP female candidates were successfully elected into parliament later that year. In light of all her achievements and the fact that women politicians and community leaders still recall and admire her pioneering work, it may be said that Chan Choy Siong left an indelible mark on the landscape of both the women's movement and the political sphere in Singapore.

Chan Heng Chee

(陈庆珠, Chen Qingzhu, 1942–)
Academician, diplomat, Singapore

Known to many as Singapore's ambassador to the United States of America from 1996 to 2012, Professor Chan Heng Chee is an empowering figure to Singaporean women. Throughout her career she has demonstrated that Asian women are just as intelligent as Asian men.

Chan was born in 1942, when the Asia Pacific was still in the midst of the Second World War. When she was of school-going age, she attended Katong Convent. It is possible that Chan gained her passion for public service and interest in political affairs upon witnessing the ensuing rebuilding efforts following the end of Second World War and the country's struggle for independence. Suffice it to say, her interest in political affairs led to her pursuing political science as a field of study in the University of Singapore. As Chan's interests revolved around socio-political issues, it was not surprising that her area of studies at the University of Singapore was political science. Whilst at the University of Singapore, she graduated with first class honours in political science. After years of hard work, she graduated with a Master of Arts in Political Science in 1966, and a Master of Arts from Cornell University in the United States a year later. Upon achieving her master's degree, she pursued journalism as a career. But the desire to learn more about the workings of different governmental systems, the wish to facilitate political discussion, educate others of the value of socio-political knowledge, and encourage political awareness in the young people of Singapore, led Chan to return to the academe. Thus, she joined the Department of political science at the University of Singapore as an assistant lecturer in 1967.

Her keen interest in political issues, especially those shaping the country's physical landscape and the mindset of the people, spurred her to continue her education with the University of Singapore. This occurred concurrently with her time as a lecturer with the department of political science at the University of Singapore. Chan was very hardworking and proved herself adept at handling the exigencies of lecturing on top of her own pursuit of further studies. Not only did this demonstrate her tremendous interest in political science as a field of study; it also indicates that Chan was a dedicated researcher and teacher. This was so much so that she proved herself by writing a doctoral dissertation on the one-party state in Singapore and its impact on the country's socio-political landscape. She finally graduated with a Doctor of Philosophy in 1974. Her dissertation, entitled The Dynamics of One-Party Dominance: A Study of Five Singapore Constituencies brought her to the notice of several think-tanks in the country.

By 1984, Chan, who was still lecturing with the department of political science at the university, became a full professor. In that same year, she was appointed head of the political science department. She remained in this position until 1987. Till this day, she is still regarded as professor of political science on secondment at the National University of Singapore.

Despite the additional academic and administrative duties of her new post as a professor, she still found time to pursue research in areas of Singapore politics. Her research culminated in a book entitled, A Sensation of Independence: A Political Biography of David Marshall, published in 1986. This insightful and informative book was much lauded, and won Chan the National Book Award in the non-fiction category.

Her keen grasp of the political issues and her method of humanising the political situation meant that she was the ideal candidate for the post of founding director of the Institute of Policy Studies. In addition to her career as an academician, she also served as the executive director of the Singapore International Foundation, a Singapore version of the United States Peace Corps, and the director of the Institute of Southeast Asian Studies.

Her fair-handed manner of addressing all issues, be they political or sociological, brought her to the attention of the People's Action Party (PAP) government and the international community when they called on her to serve society on a global level. She rose to the occasion and served as Singapore's Permanent Representative to the United Nations from 1989 to 1991. During that time, she also served as the Singapore High Commissioner to Canada and Ambassador to Mexico. She was a member of the International Advisory Board of the New York-based Council on Foreign Relations and on the Council at the International Institute for Strategic Studies (IISS) in London as well as the International Council of the Asia Society in New York. Later, in July 1996, she was appointed Singapore's Ambassador to the United States, a position she held until 2012.

It has been remarked that she used her role as ambassador to the United States to improve bilateral relations between Singapore and America. She was so successful in the negotiations that Singapore and the United States signed the U.S.-Singapore Free Trade Agreement in May 2003 — the first Free Trade Agreement that America had entered into with an East Asian country. This, in turn led to the great enhancement of both countries' ties in defence and security.

She has received a number of awards, including Honorary Degrees of Doctor of Letters from the University of Newcastle in Australia and the University of Buckingham.

It should be noted her appointment as Singapore's ambassador to the United States in 1996 caused a bit of a stir in East Asia because Chan was the first woman ambassador from an East Asian country to be assigned to the United States. This proved to be very empowering for women in East Asian countries who traditionally are paid less than men. Her appointment also caused a stir in Singapore because she was a mildly vocal critic of the PAP government. Indeed, Chan herself expressed astonishment at her appointment. She is quoted to have said, "I'm anti-establishment and was a bit of a dissident before I was appointed ambassador. It came as something of a shock to me when I was offered the ambassadorship because I was highly critical of government in a society that is not used to being critiqued."

However, Asian women took very well to her appointment. This was so much so that the Organization of Chinese American Women (OCAW) bestowed upon her the Inaugural International Woman of the Year Award in 1998. Her contributions and success in politics also led to her being the first to be awarded Singapore's "Woman of the Year" award in 1991. To honour her invaluable negotiations and insights that led to the improvement of Singapore-U.S. bilateral ties, she received Singapore's Meritorious Service Medal, the highest National Day Award, in August 2005.

Chan, Jose Mari

(曾焕福, Zeng Huanfu, 1945–)
Singer, song writer, Philippines

Jose Mari Chan is one of the most successful and treasured Filipino singer/songwriters and his name has become synonymous with a well loved Filipino Christmas classic. His songs have not only captured the Filipino listeners' market, but also that of Asia, and the rest of the world, and have been translated into, adapted, and sung in other languages, securing for the Philippines the reputation of being the booming capital of music in this part of the world.

Once the Christmas season comes along in the Philippines, its streets are strewn with beautifully lit lanterns, and reverberating in the air are the sounds of distant children's carols, alongside the jangles of improvized tambourines made of strung flattened bottle caps and empty cans-turned-musical-drums.

A quintessential Christmas song, Christmas in Our Hearts, along with other well remembered holiday cheers, fill the air in malls, churches, houses, taxi cabs, jeepneys, and even elevators. These songs are on the lips of virtually every Filipino, and have become part and parcel of the Pinoy identity, representation, and celebration.

For the love and sheer experience of this cultural gift of music, we have Jose Mari Chan to thank. Iloilo-born Chan (11 March 1945), the eldest son of sugar industry tycoon Antonio Chan and Florence Lim, is the only Filipino recording artist who has achieved the feat of a Double Diamond Record Award, for the biggest selling Christmas album in the entire history of the Philippine music industry, with his well loved albums, Constant Change and Christmas in Our Hearts, and his more recent releases, Thank You, Love, and Souvenirs, which also bagged the multiplatinum reception of the Filipino market, as well as that of Asia, and the rest of the world.

With the combination of Filipino sensibilities and traditions, such as hospitality, joyfulness, charity, and the well enshrined value of family, the desire and accompanying flair of bringing to the world the Filipino culture, and the truly inspirational gift of singing and song-writing, he has successfully transcended the dividing strata of race, economic status, and other subcultures prevailing in the country, and contributed greatly to uniting the people through the love for music.

Among fans he is known as the "Filipino Jimmy Webb" harking back to the intricate English-language lyrics which set his songs apart from others, and make them all the more easily adaptable to other cultures. His first single, Afterglow, was released in 1967 and became popular in the Philippines even though foreign acts such as The Beatles and The Beach Boys were more popular, which proved that given beautiful music, the market would respond accordingly, and even rally behind a local artiste both in admiration as well as to offer nationalistic support. He was able to release his first long playing album in 1969. Between 1970 and 1974, he composed more than twenty theme songs for movies, some of which earned for him several nominations at the Filipino Academy of Movie Arts and Sciences Award. Some of his hits have been revived by equally illustrious artists of different generations, from Gary Valenciano to Lea Salonga and Kyla, proving both the timeliness and the timelessness of his craftsmanship.

Since Afterglow, he has written hundreds of songs, most of which are memorized with either vague or stark familiarity by Filipinos across a broad socio-economic spectrum. When he returned to the spotlight, Universal Records (formerly WEA) produced a highly successful anthology, Jose Mari Chan: A Golden Collection, which included Counterpoint to Lennon and Paul McCartney's Here, There and Everywhere, Tell Me Your Name, Beautiful Girl, Can We Just Stop and Talk Awhile, among others.

Constant Change (1989) and A Heart's Journey (2003), won Album of the Year in the Awit Awards, the local equivalent of the American Grammy Awards. He has sold an unprecedented total of thirty-eight Platinum records. His songs — both from his holiday albums as well as romantic ballads — were brought to Filipinos either through record sales or radio broadcasts and are sincere, honest, and delivered with such comfortably familiar melodies that one can easily sing along with them. They are considered the giants of the Philippine music scene because of their malleability and are so relatable and real in their content that they are embraced by Filipinos from all walks of life.

Constant Change became a great hit not only in the Philippines, but in other Asian countries as well. Its carrier single, Beautiful Girl, was covered by Asian stars such as Aaron Kwok of Hong Kong. Other artistes in the region who recorded his songs include Paula Tsui (Hong Kong) Sally Yee (Hong Kong), Tomomi Akimoto (Japan), Sandy Lam (Hong Kong), Kamahl (Australia), and Yasuo T. (Japan).

Chan's popularity among the people was so great that he has been commissioned by various companies and institutions to create their theme songs. He created Love at Thirty Thousand Feet for Philippine Airlines, the country's flag carrier. In 2005 he was commissioned to write We're All Just One, the theme song of the 2005 Southeast Asian Games.

He has been well decorated with a host of recognition, including his 1974 TOYM (Ten Outstanding Young Men) award for the Arts, the "Lifetime Achievement Awards" from The Philippine Association of the Record Industry's Awit Awards, the Composer's Group, Katha Awards and Aliw Awards, the "Dangal ng Musikang Pilipino Award" from the Philippine Association of the Recording Industry, the "PERLAS Award" for his outstanding contribution to Philippine contemporary music, the "Antonio C. Barreiro Lifetime Achievement Award" from the Metro Pop Foundation, and for his exemplary contribution to the Arts by the Jose Rizal Awards for Excellence in 2006.

As an 1967 AB economics graduate of the Ateneo de Manila University, the multitalented Chan has also seen his success in the music profession paralleled by his success in the business sector. He is currently at the helm of his family's sugar and hotel business, as chairman and president of Binalbagan Isabela Sugar Company, which he has been managing since 1985. He also runs the A. Chan Sugar Group of companies and the Hyatt Regency Hotel Manila. His proficiency in merging both business and the arts became evident as early as his grade school years, when he worked as a radio deejay on weekends, and sang with a band during concerts at university. Today, he is admirably able both to harness musicality, as well as bridge it to the market which he seeks to touch through his songs.

During his university years, Chan emceed concerts at various universities until ABS-CBN invited him to emcee "9 Teeners", the 1960s television variety show aimed at teenagers, with Ces Onrubia, Roman Azanza, Tito Osias, and Johnny Salientes as alternates. He squeezed in time to sing his compositions on television until an independent recording company approached him to record a 45-RPM of Afterglow. Its success brought him to the attention of Dyna Records [see entry on James Dy] which offered him the chance to do a long-playing record with twelve original songs.

His passion for the arts, as well as his magnanimity, are likewise reflected in his facility to give something back from his successes — as founder of the Character Building Foundation of Heidi Sison, based in Samar, and as a member of the board of trustees of the Ateneo Scholarship Foundation, the Philippine Ballet Theatre, and the San Lorenzo Ruiz Foundation. Having realized his ardour for composition and song early on in secondary school at St Clement's in Iloilo — where Irish priests exposed students to John Keats, Percy Shelley, Lord Byron, Edgar Allan Poe — he has dedicated efforts to ensure that this environment of opportunities to excel in the arts is made available to today's generation, through his various scholarship programmes.

Behind this legendary musician is his loved and loving family: his wife Mary Ann, and their children, Elizabeth Ann, Jose Antonio, Michael Philip Ciprian, Francisco Rafael and Marie Angelica. In an interview where he recollected with fondness those days when he and his wife were a missionary couple at the Assumption School in Osaka, Japan, he said of his wife: "Mine is reflected glory. She's the sun. I'm the moon." Regarding their eleven-year stay in the United States where he and his wife's family grew, he reminisced: "Those were some of the best years of my life… In a foreign country we went through various stages of discovery, doing things as a family. We became closely knit. The stay broadened my musical influences. I discovered the opera, theater, museums, fine food, the joys of travel."

Chan Li-Yin, Patricia

(陈丽燕, Chen Liyan, 1954–) and the Chan Clan

Sports personalities, Singapore

One of the most illustrious sporting dynasties in Singapore is associated with the Chan family. Chan Ah Kow created a swimming empire during the 1960s that has had no rivals. Mei Ling and Vicky, the eldest sisters, found success in the pool before pursuing academic and professional ventures. The most famous of the seven siblings is Patricia (Pat). Together with her brothers, Bernard, Alex, Roy, and Mark, she provided Singapore with sporting highlights that helped to define the nation's independent status after 1965. Bernard, Pat, and Roy all became Olympians. The Chan Clan members were not just successful in the pool as youngsters, but they all also achieved great prominence in their chosen careers.

Chan Mei Ling (born 1943) was not a competitive swimmer in the same category as her younger siblings, but she was exposed to recreational sporting activities and claimed that swimming was beneficial in establishing her modelling career. At the age of twenty-one, she was the principal of the Hong Kong Modelling Academy. She was probably one of the first Asian models to make an impact in Europe. Mei Ling appeared in films, but is most firmly associated with dress designing and the hotel management business.

Vicky Chan Li Hua (born 1945), followed in her father's professional footsteps, but not before registering a range of victories at the Chinese Swimming Club against European rivals from the Singapore Swimming Club. During the final years of colonial rule in Singapore, the main international challenges for competitive swimmers were the annual quadrangular matches involving teams from Ipoh, Penang, and Kuala Lumpur. Vicky bettered a number of club records in freestyle, backstroke, and breaststroke. As there were no swimming events for women at the first South East Asian Peninsular Games (SEAP Games) in Bangkok in 1959 and Singapore did not send a women's team to the 1961 Games in Rangoon, Vicky had to wait until 1962 to represent her country. In August she broke the "native" 100-m butterfly record and earned herself a trip to Jakarta for the 4th Asian Games. In 1963, she gained a scholarship to Smith College, Boston, happily branching out and developing what was to be astounding success in her professional career. Vicky graduated summa cum laude from Harvard Medical School in 1975 and pursued a research career in neurobiology. She married Professor Sanford Palay and in 1979 became a fellow of the White House during the time of Jimmy Carter's presidency.

Bernard Chan Cheng Wah (born 8 October 1946) was the first to make his mark on the international scene. He was more fortunate than Vicky, as by the age of fifteen, he had represented Singapore in the 2nd SEAP games. He won silver medals at the Games in December 1961, setting both "native" and "all-comers" records in the 100-m butterfly event during the build-up. He was selected for the 1962 Asian Games in Jakarta, where he managed a creditable sixth place in a time of 1:06.9 minutes. By the age of seventeen, he was the holder of national records in the 100-m and 200-m butterfly event, the 400-m individual medley, and the 100-m backstroke competition. He achieved Olympian status in Tokyo in 1964. His most memorable moment occurred during the SEAP Games in 1965 and his gold medal performance there, setting a new record by 5.1 seconds, was the crowning glory of his swimming career. Two years later Bernard also joined the national water polo team. In his professional life, he became well established in the advertising industry.

Alex Chan Meng Wah (born 21 January 1953) was seven years old when he first entered a competition. As a nine-year-old, Alex became the star performer at the finals of the Singapore Amateur Swimming Association's first open age group championships. He was to become a multiple medal winner of backstroke events at the SEAP Games, often in tandem with his sister, Pat. In the 1965 Singapore Amateur Swimming Association (SASA) championships, brother and sister each won the same four 50-metre event in their respective categories — freestyle, breaststroke, backstroke, and butterfly. For the next eight years, from 1965 to 1973, his versatility garnered him many SEAP championship titles. At the age of fourteen, Alex, took first place in the 100-m backstroke, 200-m backstroke, and 4×100-m individual medley, and 200-m butterfly events. Two years later he successfully defended his titles in the first three of those events, and swapped the butterfly gold for a 1500-m freestyle victory. Alex also won bronze medals at the 1966 and the 1970 Asian Games. He attained a first degree in 1975, and followed that with an MBA in business administration at UCLA in the United States. Alex is best known in sporting circles as the chairman of the Singapore Sports Council from 2002 to 2010.

Pat Chan Li-Yin (born on 12 April 1954 in Singapore) completed her early education in Raffles Girls School, Methodist Girls School, and Anglo-Chinese Schools. She learned to swim competitively in 1960 and dominated the SEAP scene between 1965 and 1973. The "Golden Girl" of swimming also challenged Japanese domination of the Asian Games, winning three bronze medals in 1966, and three silver medals and two bronze medals in 1970. Pat became a five-time "Sportswoman of the Year" award winner (1967–71) and was one of the pioneers of Chan Ah Kow's revolutionary training methods, acting as a guinea pig for his experimental trials in the water and on dry land. Five visits to the SEAP Games produced thirty-nine gold medals in all for Pat. Her most consistent winning streak was associated with the 100-metre freestyle event. Each final provided not only a gold medal, but also a new SEAP Games record! In 1972 she became an Olympian at the Munich Games. Pat withdrew briefly from competition afterwards, but in 1973 returned to lead the national challenge at the SEAP Games, which were being held in Singapore for the first time. This was to prove her toughest year. There were the psychological demands made by competition and the continuing physical demands of training. Pat was not fully confident, but she edged out Elaine Sng, who was the rising star of the freestyle events, in the finals of the 100-metre event, and claimed individual gold medals in the backstroke events and the 4×50 medley. Today, Pat Chan is a business executive who pursues many challenges and is prepared to take the risks associated with creativity. She has become a successful media and communications specialist who conceptualizes marketing strategies for companies and individuals. She has also branched out into a successful career as a jazz singer and continues to serve as a reference point and model for aspiring swimmers in Singapore.

Roy Chan Kum Wah (born 28 November 1955) joined his older brothers and sisters in the pool as a seven year old. Just like Alex, his name appeared in invitation races designed for under tens. One year later he was setting age-group records. Roy capitalized on his father's rigorous training systems. Specific international events were targeted after Singapore achieved national independence in 1965. Together Alex and Roy proved to be a major force in the men's competitive arena in the region, often forming the backbone of the nation's relay teams. Roy picked up four SEAP Games silver medals in 1969 and followed those up with an Asian Games bronze medal in 1970. His speciality was the butterfly and medley events, but he also won medals in backstroke and freestyle events. Like his sister, Pat, he became an Olympian in 1972. He trained under Forbes Carlile in Australia after the 1972 Games together with his younger brother Mark. In 1974 he was named one of eight President scholars and shortly afterwards qualified for the Asian Games. He studied medicine at the University of Singapore and later went to London. He became a fellow of the Royal College of Physicians of London and a fellow of the Academy of Medicine Singapore. He is currently chief consultant in dermatology at the National Skin Centre in Singapore.

Mark Chan (born 6 October 1958) continued the Chan tradition of swimming success at the age of seven. He struck gold twice in freestyle events at the 1973 SEAP Games in Singapore, and four years later was involved in a famous first-place tie with Indonesian swimmer Lukman Niode. Mark was selected for both the 1974 and 1978 Asian Games. His swimming career coincided with a general rise in Asian standards and the emergence of China as an international sporting rival. He was unwittingly embroiled in a controversial confrontation between FINA (Fédération Internationale de Natation), the international body that governs swimming, and SASA. In 1975, China had yet to be recognized by FINA, so a friendly visit by a Singapore swimming team resulted in a two-year ban for eighteen young Singaporeans. Although later lifted, this ban effectively ended any aspirations that Mark might have had to become the family's fourth Olympian. Music and the arts became the focal point for Mark. His career as a successful composer, singer, instrumentalist, poet, and painter has now spanned almost twenty years.

The collective successes of Chan Ah Kow's children prompted observers to coin the phrase the "Golden Club".

Chan Sarun

(Ngor Hong Srun, 吴和顺, Wu Heshun, 1951–)
Politician, Cambodia

There are a few ministers in Hun Sen's cabinet who are Cambodians of Chinese descent. Chan Sarun is one of them.

Chan Sarun was born on 13 August 1951 in Trapeang Siap Commune, Bati District, Takeo. He was appointed minister of agriculture, forestry and fisheries on 24 August 2001. A member of the Cambodian People's Party, Chan was elected to represent Takeo Province in the National Assembly of Cambodia in 2003. His elder brother, Haing S. Ngor, was a Cambodian-American actor who made his name in Hollywood when he won the Academy Award for Best Supporting Actor in the movie, The Killing Fields, in 1985.

Chan was born to an ethnic Chinese father, Ngor Kin Chan, and a Khmer mother, Kan Lay. He obtained his high school diploma (BACC II) in 1969, diploma in physics, chemistry and natural sciences in 1970, and diploma in agronomic engineering in 1973. The following year, he passed a qualifying examination and was appointed inspector of water and forests on 19 February 1974. He was a student activist between 1972 and 1974, and was made president of the Student Association of the Forestry Faculty, University of Agricultural Science, Phnom Penh. Between January 1974 and April 1975, he held the post of botanical researcher at the Forest Research Institute, Department of Water, Forest and Wildlife, Phnom Penh.

It is interesting to note that during the Khmer Rouge days, the Cambodian regime was hostile towards Cambodians of Chinese descent. Many Chinese Cambodians changed their Chinese names to Cambodian names. Chan was among these and gave up his Chinese name, Ngor Hong Srun. He later joined Hun Sen's Cambodian People's Party and began serving in the Hun Sen administration. In October 1979, he became first deputy director of the Department of Forestry and Wildlife, Ministry of Agriculture, Forestry and Fisheries, and was dispatched to Ho Chi Minh City in early June 1980 to receive six months of training in political science before entering the civil service.

On 5 May 1987, Chan became director of the Department of Forestry and Wildlife, Ministry of Agriculture, Forestry and Fisheries. While he was busy in his work at the ministry, he took up a correspondence course for a master of science (Economics) degree at the Russian Academy of Economics between 1985 and 1991. After serving in the ministry for about ten years he was appointed rector at the Royal University of Agriculture of Cambodia on 5 September 1997, and was elected Member of Parliament of the National Assembly of the Kingdom of Cambodia between 22 December 1998 and 10 February 2000. His good performance led to his appointment as undersecretary of state for the Ministry of Agriculture, Forestry, and Fisheries between 10 February 2000 and 24 August 2001. Chan has shouldered the heavy responsibilities as minister of agriculture, forestry and fisheries since August 2001. On 6 August 2004, he was awarded a doctor of philosophy in Business Administration (honoris causa) by the South California University for Professional Studies. On 27 September 2005 he was awarded a doctor of philosophy degree in agricultural science by Chamroeun University of Poly-Technology, Cambodia.

Chan has also served in the following professional capacities on boards and committees: he was a board member of SEAMEO Regional Centres for Graduate Study and Research in Agriculture between 1 June 1998 and 31 May 2001; he assumed the chairmanship of the PRASAC Steering Committee, a microfinance institution in Cambodia between 11 September 2001 and 31 December 2003; since 2001, he has also served as a member of the board of governors of the International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD). He was adviser to Hun Sen, prime minister of the Royal Government of Cambodia, between 25 July 1995 and 30 November 1998; since 2001, he has held the chair of the Committee of Cambodian People's Party at the Ministry of Agriculture, Forestry and Fisheries.

Chan has received numerous awards for his outstanding performance through the years at the Ministry of Agriculture, Forestry and Fisheries. On 3 September 1996, King Norodom Sihanouk conferred on him the prestigious title, "Neak Oknha", an acknowledgement by the state of his efforts to help rebuild the country. On 25 March 2002, he was awarded the Decoration of National Construction, Gold, for the construction of public schools in Svay Rieng Province. The same year, on 11 April and 26 May, he was awarded the Royal Order of Cambodia, Officer (SENA) and Royal Order of Cambodia, Commander (THIPDINT). He has also received recognition on many other occasions: he was awarded the Royal Order of Cambodia, Grand Officer (MOHASENA) on 4 February 2003; the Royal Order of Monisaraphon, Commander (THIPDINT) for his contributions made in the educational, social, and Buddhism sectors in Takeo Province on 17 June 2003; and the Royal Order of Monisaraphon, Grand Officer (MOHASENA) on 30 June 2006.

Chan has written many scholastic papers related to forestry and wildlife issues. His BSc thesis, written in French, was on the "Issue of log supply in Phnom Penh City" in 1973 (fifty-one pages), and his Ph.D. thesis, written in Khmer, was on "Strategies for Increasing Sustainable Rice Productivities" in 2005 (151 pages). He has published many papers on Cambodian forestry and wildlife, mainly in Khmer.

In the official biography of Chan Sarun, he is described as a person who has been concerned with the welfare and the living conditions of the families of his retired staff. He has regularly invited his retired staff to join in special national and traditional events, and has gathered ideas so that he could improve his ministry. He has also paid attention to poor farmers and provided them with tools so that they can improve their lives.

Chan also likes reading poetry. His official biography states that he is fluent in many languages, including French, English, Chinese, and Vietnamese.

He is married to Sok Keo and they have one son and three daughters.

Chan Sui Kiat

(曾瑞吉, Zeng Ruiji, 1943–)
Entrepreneur, philanthropist, Brunei

As a sportsman in his early days, Dr Chan Sui Kiat might not have foreseen himself as a successful entrepreneur in his later years. He eventually emerged as a leader in the Chinese community and one of his many appointments was as president of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce, Bandar Seri Begawan (BSB), which was one of the biggest associations in Brunei Darussalam. He made good use of his resources and influence in philanthropy as well.

Chan Sui Kiat, alias Chan Hiang Heng, was born in Bandar Seri Begawan, Brunei, on 31 October 1943. His father, Chan Zhao Xian, originated from Chao An (潮安) in Guangdong Province. His mother, Lin Qian Zhi, gave birth to six sons and three daughters, with him being the eldest. He pursued his elementary and middle-school education at Chung Hwa Middle School (汶莱中华中学). As a student, he was very active in sports, especially basketball and sailing. He was once captain of the Brunei National Basketball Team and often participated in overseas tournaments. He was later a qualified basketball referee, widely respected within and outside Brunei for being fair and just. After graduating from high school, Chan worked as a secretary in the Sugar and Rice Association, Brunei (汶莱糖米商公会), being responsible for both internal and external matters, especially those regarding imports from China, such as sugar and rice.

In 1964 Chan established a partnership factory that manufactured bricks. He was responsible for the management of the business and also acted as an agent for its building materials, namely sand and stones. He was a talented and hard-working man, and business under him flourished continuously so his many years of hard work paid off for him favourably. In 1980 he took over Maju Motors Sdn. Bhd., which is now renowned for selling European cars, one of which being Volkswagen from Germany, one of the best-selling European cars in Brunei. Besides that, the company also sells cars such as Renault from France, Alfa Romeo from Italy, etc. Chan is also chairman of Chong Radio Sdn. Bhd. and LTK Sdn. Bhd. He has also been vice-president of Brunei's Windsurfing Club and Association since 1988. In 1998 he became the managing director of International Times Newspaper (Miri, Sarawak) Sdn. Bhd. In November 2006, he was given a doctorate of commercial management by the University of Newcastle, and also won the 6th Asia Pacific International Entrepreneur Eyebellema Award 2007, affirming his outstanding performance in the commercial field.

Chan is married to Mo Li Qing (莫丽卿), who bore him one son and three daughters. At the age of sixty, he left his business to his children and focused on contributing to society. He participated actively in national events and activities in order to bring the government and Brunei's Chinese society closer together, and also played a role in the development of Chinese education.

With regard to national events, he is chairman of Brunei's Chinese Tug of War Competition, an event held during the sultan's birthday every year. In the Chinese community, in 1996 he was elected chairman of the Chung Hwa Middle School Alumni and then he was honourable chairman of the Chung Hwa Middle School Alumni. Furthermore, he is also adviser to all the Chinese schools in Brunei except for those in Temburong District, and adviser to several associations as well, including the Miri Teo Chiew Association (美里潮州会馆), Kwang Hui Association, Brunei (广惠互助社), Electrical Association, Brunei, Tai Chi Association, Brunei (太极学会), Basketball Association, Brunei, Chess Association, Brunei and Brunei's first and only informative website, "E-Huawang.com" (易华网). In 2009 and 2012 Chan was elected president of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce, BSB. As the new man in charge of one of the biggest associations in Brunei, he had high hopes and expectations of taking the association to its peak. During the inauguration ceremony, he revealed in his welcoming remarks ambitious objectives he would try to achieve during his three-year term, namely, to increase ties between the chamber and business associations overseas, and through the established ties, attract more investments into Brunei; to be involved in more investment opportunities within the country; and to increase the chamber's involvement in the government's activities. Witnessing the auspicious occasion were prominent figures in the Chinese community, such as Pehin Kapitan Cina Kurnia Diraja Dato Paduka Lau Ah Kok, Pehin Kapitan Lela Diraja Dato Paduka Awg Goh King Chin, and Pehin Bendahari China Dato Paduka Onn Siew Siong. Chan is also an honorary committee member of the Chinese Temple in Brunei, invigilating, supervising, and inspecting the temple's activities. Apart from being involved in the chamber's management, Chan supported organizations financially as well — he donated $200,000 to Chung Hwa Middle School Alumni for the establishment of new buildings whereby the auditorium was named after him; $120,000 to the Taichi Association, Brunei for the establishment of new buildings whereby their auditorium also bears his name, $150,000 to Chung Hwa Middle School, Kuala Belait, a new multi-purpose building also bears his name, to name a few examples.

He is well known for being a devoted philanthropist, and is praised by the government for his endeavours in fund-raising in Brunei for the earthquake victims in Pakistan. This earned him a good relationship with the government. In 2012, the Sultan of Brunei Darussalam has appointed him registrar of Chinese Marriage for District of Brunei Muara and Temburong.

Chan Sze Jin

Lawyer, politician, Singapore

Chan Sze Jin was born on 6 September 1886 in Sarawak. He was the third son of Chan Fook Nyan, for many years the Chief Clerk of the Kuala Lumpur Sanitary Board, and later of the Chinese Secretariat there. His two older brothers were Chan Sze Kiong (who became a chief clerk) and Chan Sze Pong (a Queen's scholar and medical doctor); and his younger brother was Sze Onn (a well-known businessman and chartered accountant). Chan Fook Nyan left China for Sarawak before settling in Kuala Lumpur sometime after Chan Sze Jin was born.

Chan Sze Jin was educated at Victoria Institution (VI) where he excelled in his studies and in sports. He won the Teacher Scholarship in 1898 when he was twelve years old and followed that feat up by winning the Rodger Medal five times in succession. Interestingly, his godfather, Sir JP Rodger, was the same person who instituted the Rodger Medal at Victoria Institution back in 1895. At school, he was a member of the St Mary's Boys' Brigade, and when it was transformed into the VI Cadet Corps, Chan was appointed one of its first two sergeants.

As Victoria Institution did not have a special Queen's Scholarship class, Chan left Kuala Lumpur for Penang in 1901 where he enrolled in the famous Penang Free School. In 1903, following in elder brother Sze Pong's footsteps, he won the Queen's Scholarship for 1903 and was named Federated Malay States (FMS) scholar. His scholarship enabled him to take up a law degree at Downing College, Cambridge, in 1904. His brother, Sze Pong, was then also at Cambridge reading medicine.

Younger brother Sze Onn did not win the Queen's Scholarship, but was an outstanding student as well, who taught briefly at VI before joining his brother in Singapore. He then started an accounting firm, Chan Sze Onn & Co, with a few other persons, including Kwa Siew Tee, who later became general manager of the Oversea Chinese Banking Corporation (OCBC), and father-in-law to Singapore's first prime minister, Lee Kuan Yew.

Chan Sze Jin passed his BA and LLB examinations in 1907, and his Law Tripos and History Tripos Part II in 1908, after which he was admitted to Grays Inns in London to read for the Bar examinations. He topped his Bar finals, obtaining a first class, and winning a 100-guinea studentship. He was called to the Bar at Grays Inn in 1910. Instead of returning to Kuala Lumpur, he sailed for Singapore and had himself called to the Bar in Singapore on 20 March 1911. In 1912, he set up the firm of Chan and Swee Teow, with Wee Swee Teow. Chan did not like going to court and did mostly solicitors' work. A newspaper report from 1935 noted: "Mr Chan is rarely in the courts — his practice is mainly in his office, where his table is usually piled high with papers — so that one sees but little of him in active litigation."

His practice flourished and he soon became a well-known local leader and personality. In 1920, the partnership with Wee Swee Teow was dissolved and he established Chan and Eber with an old Cambridge mate, Reynold Lionel Eber, who had previously been practising at the firm of Braddell Brothers.

Chan's first public appointment was in December 1926 when he was appointed a member of the British Malaya Opium Advisory Committee. On 29 October 1927 he was nominated a member of the Straits Settlements Legislative Council, in place of Song Ong Siang. When his three-year term expired in 1930, he stepped down and was replaced by his old partner, Wee Swee Teow. Chan obtained his Certificate of Naturalization in July 1928, making him a British subject. In 1935, Chan and WA Fell were appointed temporary unofficial members of the Executive Council in place of Tan Cheng Lock and Sir Arnold Robinson. When Chan's term expired in 1938, he was reappointed for a further three-year term, but he resigned in 1940 on account of his ill health. Chan also held positions in the Singapore Board of Education, the Finance Committee of the Legislative Council, and the Council of the College of Medicine, Singapore. He was also active in social affairs and, in 1932, became the first president of the multiracial Island Club. John Laycock, another lawyer, was the club's first captain.

In 1941, in recognition of his public service, Chan was conferred the Companion of the Most Distinguished Order of St Michael and St George (CMG). The governor of the Straits Settlements, Sir Shenton Thomas, personally went to his home in Emerald Hill Road to confer the honour on him, a rare honour indeed. Chan was, in fact, the first lawyer in private practice to receive the decoration. The only other lawyer to have been conferred the CMG had been Sir Thomas Braddell, first attorney-general of Singapore. Up to this time, the only other Chinese to have been conferred the CMG were Whampoa Hoo Ah Kay, Tan Jiak Kim, and Loke Yew. On presenting Chan the CMG, Governor Shenton Thomas paid him the following tribute: "Mr Chan has shown himself to be one of the ablest and most distinguished of the Straits Chinese, whose counsels at all times have been invaluable to the Colonial Government. He has done great service to his community quietly and unobtrusively especially in matters relating to education and social welfare work."

Chan died on 26 September 1948 after a two-month illness. He was only sixty-two years old.

Chan Wai Chang, Rose

Entertainer but more popularly remembered as "Queen of Striptease in Malaysia"

Malaysia's best known stripteaser, Rose Chan, was said to have titillated a generation of men up and down the Malay Peninsula and Singapore in the 1950s and 60s. At a time when women feminists had yet to appear on the scene and when women still had to break through to the higher reaches of the professions, Rose Chan was testing the limits of social taboo and discrimination. Women groups were offended by her shows and behaviour. Yet in many ways, her life story is seen as reflecting the struggle of the underclass as she faced odds against the authorities, society, and the economic system that disadvantaged women. Her life story was recently retold in a musical play entitled, Rose, Rose I Love You.

Much of what is known of her early life comes from her own accounts and she had probably glossed over some unpleasant and unhappy parts. According to Chan she was born in 1925 in Suzhou, China, to parents who performed in acrobatic shows. At the age of six her foster mother brought her over to Kuala Lumpur. She had a few months of schooling and at the age of twelve, by her account, worked in a button-making shop and later in a better paying job making mosquito nets. In 1941 she married an elderly Chinese harbour contractor from Singapore, and later moved to Singapore as her marriage was breaking down. She remained there after her husband left her and as she had to support herself, Rose became a cabaret dancer at the Happy World, an amusement park said to be frequented by her husband.

Rose made little reference to the war years and it would be assumed that she continued working at the Happy World through most of the Second World War. In 1951, Rose opened her own cabaret show. This proved popular and she then took her show to all the major towns in Malaya. Earlier, according to her own account, she was runner-up in the All-Women's Ballroom Dancing Championship in Singapore in 1949, and the Miss Singapore beauty contest in 1950.

Rose recounted how her cabaret performance turned into a striptease act quite by accident. While performing in a cabaret show at the Majestic Theatre in Ipoh, her brassiere snapped and the enthusiastic response from the audience convinced Rose that this was the kind of show that would be popular and rewarding. She worked out a cabaret routine with striptease as the highlight of the show. Almost overnight, Rose Chan became the Queen of Striptease. She took her striptease act all over the country and gained a following. Over the years she introduced new features into her show, such as wrestling with a python, carrying a man on her shoulders, and having motorcyclists ride on planks placed across her body.

In July 1957 Rose married Mohamed Nazier Kahar, an Indonesian, and, in embracing Islam, took the name of Rosminah binti Abdullah. The marriage lasted three years. She had altogether four marriages and all failed. She had a son each from the last two marriages.

By this time, Rose Chan was a well known name in Malaya and associated with risque shows. Notoriety was further gained when reports appeared regularly in the press of police raids to stop her shows because they were deemed indecent. Most of her performances were at the Bukit Bintang Park in Kuala Lumpur and advertised in Chinese newspapers. Rose also performed overseas. At home in Malaysia, she arranged for proceeds of some of her shows to go to charities such as those in aid of education, children, and old folk's home, and institutions for the blind.

In 1967 Chan was banned from performing in Kuala Lumpur following another police raid. That marked the start of the decline of Rose Chan and her shows. Age was also catching up. In 1970 she took her show to Perth, Australia, and there she was arrested for indecent performance. Later she was charged for immoral activities at a massage parlour.

She tried to resume her career in Malaysia and continued putting on shows until 1976 even though in 1973 the government revoked her performing licence. Rose tried several business ventures, including opening a restaurant. But all were unsuccessful. Efforts to publish her memoirs with an American publisher fell through over royalties dispute.

In 1980 she was diagnosed with cancer and she spent her last days in Penang. Charity shows were organized including a five-night event at the Golden Maid lounge in Penang to raise money for her medical expenses. There was a lot of public sympathy for her plight. She passed away on 26 May 1987.

Rose Chan continues to evoke mixed reaction and assessment. Many women, especially Chinese women in Malaysia, consider her striptease shows indecent, and her reputation, an embarrassment to them. They see her as exploiting the baser instincts of men for financial gain. On the other hand, there are those, particularly men, who see her as someone from the underclass boldly seeking to make a living in an entertainment field that had yet to gain an acceptable place in society. To them she symbolized the enterprising spirit of immigrant Chinese who went overseas, although what she attempted to do was alien to the norms of the community at the time.

Chao Tzee Cheng

(赵自成, Zhao Zicheng, 1934–2000)
Forensic pathologist, Singapore

Alternatively nicknamed Singapore's "Father of Forensic Pathology" and the "Justice of Murder", Professor Chao Tzee Cheng was internationally recognized for his skills in forensic pathology and locally respected for solving notorious crimes. In his lifetime, he was lauded for his humour and humility, and for raising Singapore's professionalism in the field of forensic pathology.

It was a twist of fate that made him turn to pathology. He originally hoped to pursue a career in surgery. However, a weakened right arm sustained in a car accident in West Malaysia dampened that wish. Instead of bemoaning his fate, Chao drew on his resolve to be a surgeon and turned it into one focused on pathology.

From his educational history, it is clear that Chao felt a strong calling for the medical profession. Born on 22 September 1934 in Hong Kong to a professor in cultural studies and a school principal who migrated to Singapore in the late 1930s, Chao studied at Catholic High School and then Victoria Continuation School. His excellent academic performance brought him to the attention of scholarship bodies who offered him a chance to study engineering in the United States. Possibly due to his fervent wish to become a medical practitioner, he turned down this offer and proceeded instead to the University of Hong Kong to study medicine, where he obtained his MBBS in 1961. This single-minded dedication towards what he wanted became more marked as he continued with his education and established himself as a pathologist. In his career as a forensic pathologist, he was similarly dedicated to uncovering the truth within the bodies he examined.

Following his graduation in Hong Kong, Chao returned to Singapore and served as a medical officer. In the aftermath of his car accident whereupon he turned to pathology, he sought to improve his knowledge of his craft by pursuing a Diploma of Clinical Pathology, a Diploma of Pathology, and a Diploma of Medical Jurisprudence in 1967 and 1968 respectively. By 1968, he had qualified as a pathologist from the Royal London Hospital, Medical College (a college currently under Queen Mary, University of London). On returning from London, the Singapore Ministry of Health appointed him forensic pathologist in the Department of Pathology.

Shortly after this appointment, Chao was called upon to take his first case — the now infamous murder of Koh Liang Chuen in 1969. He was invited to be an expert witness in this case where he presented the fact that the victim had been strangled before being dumped in the well by her fiancé for refusing his sexual advances. This overturned the accused's story that Koh had died when she toppled into the well during an amorous encounter. The notoriety of this case brought Professor Chao's skills in forensic pathology to the forefront and secured his status as Southeast Asia's forensic expert.

As an upshot, he was invited to apply his forensic expertise to cases beyond Singapore, such as in Malaysia, Hong Kong, and some states in West Africa. Despite the political sensitivities of several of his cases, Chao remained the consummate professional and objectively presented the facts he discovered. A notable example of his dedication to truth and justice was his testimony as an expert witness for the defence at the Kuala Lumpur High Court trial of Hugh Ashley Johnston for the murder of his wife in 1975. In this case, his testimony had influenced the jury six-to-one that Johnston had no intention to kill his wife. Among his cases were all the coroner's cases in Singapore where he aided in the investigation process of several notorious murders such as the Adrian Lim cult murders, the Scripps body parts murder, the Bulgarian murder, and the Flor Contemplacion case. Indeed, he was so respected and professional in his field that his forensic prowess was called upon several times in the investigation of mass disasters such as the Spyros blast of 1978, the Cable Car tragedy of 1983, the Hotel New World collapse of 1986, and the MI 185 Silkair tragedy of 1997.

He was also so renowned in the field of forensic pathology that he co-authored a book with Audrey Perera entitled, Murder Is My Business, which offered fascinating insights into his thought processes and the analytical methods he utilized in his cases.

Besides uncovering the truth behind crimes through pathology, Chao also served as master of the Academy of Medicine (1992–95), president of the Singapore Society of Pathology (1987–90), and conducted a Forensic Medicine Course at the National University of Singapore where he was known as an outstanding and large-than-life clinical professor. Greatly respected on the academic front, Chao published 140 papers in various international medical journals. He also founded the Institute of Scientific and Forensic Medicine and served as a special forensic adviser to the institute when he retired.

Similarly, he founded the Medico-Legal Society so as to unite the medical and legal professions and served as its president from 1985 until his unexpected death in 2000.

In acknowledgement of his contributions to the field of forensic pathology and his service to the nation, Chao was awarded the Public Administration Silver Medal in 1975, Gold Medal in 1979, and the Meritorious Medal in 1995. At the time of his death in February 2000, he was still one of Singapore's top forensic pathologist holding the positions of senior forensic pathologist in the Ministry of Health, clinical professor with the National University of Singapore, and special forensic adviser to the Institute of Science and Forensic Medicine.

He passed away on 21 February 2000 in his sleep while visiting his sister in New York, thereby leaving the medico-legal community bereft of his skills and insightful methods. In his lifetime, Chao had left an indelible mark not just in the field of forensic pathology in Singapore, but in the criminal justice system here as well, so much so that his colleagues dubbed him, "Justice of Murder", for uncovering the truth behind unsolved murders. Given that he had performed over 25,000 autopsies and was the authoritative expert witness in many unsolved murder cases worldwide, this is not surprising. Even after his untimely death, he was posthumously honoured for his contributions to his field when the Singapore General Hospital named him its emeritus consultant.

Charoen Siriwatthanaphakdi

(苏旭明, Su Xuming, 1944–)

Businessman, Thailand

Charoen Siriwatthanaphakdi is one of the wealthiest businessmen in Thailand. He is the chairperson of Thai Charoen Corp (TCC) Group, which includes the Thai Beverage Public Company Limited, a leading beer and spirits producer in Thailand. The company, which brews the famous Chang Beer, has a strong market share of about 50 per cent and 70 per cent in Thailand's beer and spirit markets, respectively. During the 1997 Asian Financial Crisis, when many big business families suffered tremendous setbacks, Charoen managed to rise rapidly and expand his business greatly.

Charoen, also known as Su Xuming in Chinese, was born on 2 May 1944 in Song Wat Road, Bangkok. His father, a Teochew Chinese immigrant, was a vendor of fried mussel pancakes on the streets of Bangkok. He received his primary education in Puey Eng School in Bangkok, but was forced to leave after finishing fourth grade because of his family's financial difficulties. To help ease the financial burden of his parents, he started working as a street vendor in the Chinatown area from the age of eleven. His initial business then included selling prize-draw games for children and renting out books.

In 1961, Charoen got a job as a clerk at Pan-Inter, which was among the major distributors of Maekhong whiskey. Later Charoen became directly involved in the liquor business when he started working with the Surathip Group, which was the only remaining competitor of Uthen Taechaphaibun's Suramaharatsadon Group in the Thai liquor market. Charoen eventually took over Surathip in 1982. He also became the first person to break Taechaphaibun dominance in the liquor market and eventually managed to take over Suramaharatsadon in 1987. Charoen subsequently expanded into the beer market where he broke the monopoly of Boonrawd Brewery's Singha Beer with the introduction of Chang Beer in 1995.

With his success in the alcoholic beverages business, Charoen expanded into the hotel industry. In 1994, he bought the Imperial Group, a major force in the Thai hotel industry from Akon Huntrakun. The group has since expanded significantly and invested successfully overseas. Besides the businesses mentioned, Charoen also ventured into other industries such as real estate, commercial import and export, and agricultural produce. The five main businesses under the TCC Group are Thai Beverage, Berli Jucker, TCC Land, TCC Capital, and Plantheon.

Charoen also went into a joint venture with the Danish Brewery Carlsberg to set up Carlsberg Brewery (Thailand) Company Limited. However, Carlsberg terminated this joint venture in 2003 with the claim that Chang Beer did not invest the agreed assets into the joint venture. The two companies took another two years to reach a settlement, with Carlsberg paying US$40 million and selling its shares in the joint venture to Chang Beer as part of the settlement.

In 2004 Thai Beverage tried to list on Bangkok's stock exchange. However, it faced objections from monks and anti-alcohol activists, who claimed that this move would promote alcohol consumption in Thailand. In view of the objections, Thai Beverage did not proceed with its plan to list in Bangkok. The company was instead listed in Singapore in May 2006. Thereafter, there were attempts to list the company in Bangkok, but they were unsuccessful. In 2010, Thai Beverage said that it was no longer interested in being listed in Bangkok.

Chaoren was most celebrated for his success during the 1997 financial crisis. While many critics attributed the cause of the crisis to the traditional style of management in Chinese family businesses, one commented that he succeeded because his business was very old-fashioned. Most of his business then had been based on cash, which enabled him to have enough cash flow during the crisis to expand his business. He was also not significantly affected by the appreciation of the U.S. dollar against the baht because foreign lenders had been wary of his non-transparent management. In addition, as his main business was selling cheap beer, sales did not plunge greatly as people turned to the low-priced Chang Beer in times of depression. While many businessmen were quick to sell off their spare assets because of failing business, he was able to buy many properties at a bargain during the crisis. In Chiang Mai alone, he purchased the Kalae Shopping Centre, Chiang Inn Plaza, Anusan Market, Suriwong Hotel, and a prime plot of land by a river, which belonged to the Chutima family.

Besides being a successful businessman, Charoen is also a noted and active philanthropist. He has mainly donated to the health care, education, and cultural sectors. He also contributed funds to restore murals in Bangkok's oldest temple, Wat Pho and donated more than $500,000 in equipment and medical supplies to hospitals around Thailand from 2004–09. In 2009 he was one of the forty-eight philanthropists listed on Forbes' list of philanthropists in twelve countries.

Charoen is married to Wanna Siriwatthanaphakdi, daughter of Jiew Yoong Seng, formerly chairman of Maha Thanakit Finance and Securities Co., and vice-chairman of the First Bangkok City Bank. The couple has five children, who also hold key positions in Charoen's business empire. Charoen has received several Thai royal decorations, which include the Knight Grand Cordon (Special Class) of the Most Exalted Order of the White Elephant, the Knight Grand Cordon (First Class) of the Most Noble Order of the Crown of Thailand, the Knight Commander (Second Class Lower Grade) of the Most Illustrious Order of Chulachomklao, and the Knight Grand Cross (First Class) of the Most Admirable Order of the Direkkhunaphon. He also holds a doctoral degree in management from Huachiaw Chalermphrakiat University, a doctoral degree in business administration from Eastern Asia University, a doctorate of philosophy degree in business administration from Mae Fa Luang University, an honorary doctoral degree in agricultural business administration, from Maejo University, and an honorary doctoral degree in industrial technology from Chankasem Rajabhat University.

Châu Trần Tạo

Community and business leader, promoter of education, philanthropist, Vietnam

The migration history of Châu Trần Tạo and his business and social contributions both in China and Vietnam were exceptional. His education background stood out among the bulk of uneducated migrants then, and within a short span of settling in Vietnam, he attained substantial economic and social success. He first helmed a construction company, but thanks to his sharp business acumen, gradually established niches in an impressive array of business arenas that ranged from services to heavy industries. He left a legacy in the education field both in his birthplace Tong An (同安), in China, and in Saigon, with his generous support. Whether he was in Vietnam, Taiwan, or the United States, he always preserved his ties with Tong An county (China) through continuous support for the school, Cuiying Primary School (萃英小学) that he had established. He left his mark in the Chinese communities where he resided by playing key community roles. In Saigon, for instance, he assumed multiple key leadership roles such as being chairman of Phúc Thiện Hospital (越南福善医院董事长), the Fujianese congregation (福建中华理事会), and the Chinese Chamber of Commerce of the Republic of Vietnam. He was concerned about the wholesome development of the descendants of the Chinese in Saigon and thus chaired both Phúc Kiến School (福建中小学校) — a school with over a century of history — and the Lệ Chí Sports Council (越南励志体育会).

Tạo was born in September 1913 in a village called Tong Zi, located in Ma Xiang town of Tong An county in Fujian province, China (同安县马巷镇桐梓村). He studied at a primary school in his village called Qizhi Primary School (启智小学) before transferring to Jiyou Primary School (集友小学) in the same county. After graduation, he studied at Jimei Commercial School (集美商业学校), a private school in Fujian Province, then furthered his education at the business institute of Hujiang University in Shanghai (上海沪江大学商学院). He returned to his village to establish Cuiying Primary School and became its first principal in 1934. Two years later, at the age of twenty-seven, he left home for Saigon, at the request of his elder brother, to assist him in his construction business. From Saigon, he remitted funds to support Cuiying Primary School — an act which he was to continue until he left Saigon in 1974.

After having a grasp of the business environment in Saigon, he ventured into the business of building and repairing ships. At Hiệp Phát Ship Factory (协发船厂), which he owned, he strived to establish a sound reputation by offering reliable and skilful services. He also promptly formed and led the Shipbuilding Guild (造船公会) in Saigon to complement his business and consolidate his networks. Soon after the end of World War II, he identified the opportunity to exploit and develop the undeveloped river transportation in the vast Mekong Delta, criss-crossed by distributaries and canals. He invested in dozens of lighter boats to facilitate the logistics of transporting goods from ships which arrived at the coastal ports to towns inland, and quickly became the market leader — a pioneer position which inspired him to found the Guild of Lighter Boat (驳船公会) and thus affirmed his credibility. There were ninety-five trade guilds established by the Chinese community of Saigon in 1958.

Before the official visit of President Ngô Đình Diệm to the Republic of China in 1960, a delegation of businessmen from the Republic of Vietnam was scheduled to arrive before the Vietnamese president for trade and investment talks with the business community in the Republic of China. Tạo, then serving as chairman of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce of Saigon, was invited to join the delegation. On his return from the trip, he responded to bilateral trade opportunities that he found by establishing Công ty Trung Hưng (Zhong Xing Enterprise 中兴行), an agent distributing imports from the Republic of China. With strategic management, he sold more than two hundred tonnes of cement imported from the Chinese Republic, achieving a breakthrough in the market which had been hitherto dominated by the Japanese. By the 1960s, besides being managing director of Tân Hiệp Phát Construction Company (新合发建筑公司), he was simultaneously chief executive officer of Zhong Xing Enterprise, Da Ya Enterprise (大亚行), and Vietnam Textile Company (越南纺织公司).

In 1954, as the elected headman of the Fujian Congregation in Saigon, he directed the social and welfare programmes for the congregation. In 1955–58, when he helmed the management board of Phúc Thiện Hospital (越南福善医院), which was managed by the Fujian Congregation, he charted its expansion course as well as executed new ideas. For example, he channelled the earnings from his development of real estates along Nguyễn Trãi Street (formerly, Rue Quang Trung and Harteman) and Thành Thái Street to finance the expansion of the obstetrics and gynaecology department of the hospital. Providing poor and needy pregnant women with free medical services thus became possible with the additional source of income for the hospital.

His long-lived interest in the education of his community and his belief in the proper grooming of the young kept him actively engaged in the educational affairs of the Fujianese, which landed him the post of chairman for three terms at Fujian School. The primary and secondary school was established in 1923 in Saigon. As chairman of Lệ Chí Sports Council, he not only promoted sports programmes, but also hosted eastern and western musical and theatrical performances in the council's premises. His enthusiastic support for education was, however, not confined to the Chinese community. In the late 1960s when domestic immigration into Saigon strained urban facilities, including schools, Trung Tiểu học Hùng Vương (雄王中小学) was one of the new schools designed to accommodate the increasing population of school-going children. Tạo responded positively to the solicitation of funds by the school by organizing the five Chinese congregations to pledge a donation. The three-storey school materialized in 1972, and still stands in District 5 of Ho Chi Minh City today.

His philanthropy and social spiritedness were recognized by the Government of the Republic of Vietnam which bestowed on him the Star of Order (First- and Second-Class) for his contributions to education, in addition to the Star of Order of the First-Class and of the Second-Class for his achievements in internal affairs and health respectively.

Before the unification of North and South Vietnam in 1975, he left in 1974 for the Republic of China via the Philippines and subsequently settled down in the United States of America, where he became honorary adviser of the Fujian Native-Place Association in Southern California. During his sojourn in Taiwan, he helmed the Taipei Tong An County Native-Plan Association and later became its honorary adviser. He initiated the establishment of scholarships for students at the association and privately funded publications which give information on his place of origin, namely the Tong An County Gazette (同安县志) and Ma Xiang Ting Gazette (马巷厅志). He was also the first director of Taipei City's Federation of Returned Overseas Chinese of Vietnam.

In his visit to Tong An county in 1989, he presented HK$100,000 as the seed fund for the establishment of scholarships at Cuiying Primary School. He separately contributed HK$30,000 for the repair of the fence of the school, and further took care of the repair of the tombstones of his ancestors. To this day Cuiying Primary School has been offering scholarships named after its founder.

Tạo's adopted son, Zhu Liren (朱立人), has grown up acquiring the philanthropic spirit of his father. In 1996, 1998, 1999, and 2002, Liren contributed a total of about 3.5 million yuan to Cuiying Primary School and to the social development projects of Tong Zi village. This sum has been used for the renovation of classrooms in the primary school, the construction of a memorial tower, a public park, and a building in Tong Zi village.

Tạo is remembered for his ingenious venture into logistics and his prominence in innovative business and social endeavours. This visionary leader of wide-ranging interests is acclaimed for his magnanimous spirit in realizing social projects. His passion in reaching out to and nurturing the youth in his community in Vietnam and China is most remarkable.

Châu Văn Xương

Business leader, promoter of education, Vietnam

Châu Văn Xương is managing director of Công Ty Nghệ Xương (艺昌紫檀红木古艺家具公司) which currently produces and exports wood sculptures and classical furniture. He is an example of how successfully a business can be built out of a passion for art, with the collaboration of highly skilled Vietnamese craftsmen. His company's products are often used as gifts to foreign dignitaries as they not only have aesthetic and cultural values, but also reflect the success of Vietnam's economic reform policies. Xương is the highest honorary adviser of the Việt Tú Chinese Language Centre (越秀华文中心) and honorary president of the Calligraphy Art Association, both in Ho Chi Minh City. He regularly supports the twenty-four-year old Lotus Blossom Classical Music and Dance Troupe, the only Chinese dance group in Ho Chi Minh City, and holds the chairmanship of the Ho Chi Minh City Chapter of the Vietnam-Chinese Friendship Association. He is also honorary chairman of the Overseas Chinese Union of Hengli town (横沥镇侨联) in Dongguan City, Guangdong province, China, and used to sit on the board of directors for the Mạch Kiếm Hùng Chinese Language Centre (1992–2000) in Ho Chi Minh City.

Châu Văn Xương's middle name should be pronounced Ứng in Vietnamese, but he has changed it to Văn (文) while retaining his original Chinese name. He was born in 1946 in Siem Reap, Cambodia, and was the third child among five sons in his family. During the turmoil of the late Qing dynasty, his grandfather and father left Banxian Shan village in Hengli town, Dongguan City (东莞

In 1975, he managed to escape from Cambodia and arrived safely in Vietnam, where he began earning his first penny as a watch repairer in the street. He recalls living in a shed built from plank wood and palm leaves from 1975 to 1978 in Tây Ninh province — a province in the south-eastern part of Vietnam bordering Cambodia. Life was miserable at the time, but when Sino-Vietnamese tensions heightened in the mid-1970s and culminated in a border war in 1979, Xương's destiny took a turn. He saw many wealthy business households discarding their classical furniture when they fled Vietnam; that spelled opportunity for him rather than disaster. Xương cleaned and repaired the furniture, then exported them to other parts of Asia. After the ratification in 1986 of what is known as the "economic innovation" (Đổi Mới) of Vietnam, somewhat equivalent to the Perestroika of the Soviet Union, more opportunities came up to better his life. The policies that were formed during this period allowed the creation of private enterprises and the setting of prices by market forces. It was then that Xương started his serious venture in the crafting of furniture. He has since produced an impressive array of ornaments and handcrafted furniture: antique-styled chairs and tables with mother-of-pearl inlay, French classical-style furniture, Buddhist sculptures, human and animal sculptures, decorative art, and murals. Xương has exported his products to China, Japan, Southeast Asian nations, Taiwan, and North America. Today the entrepreneur, a citizen of Vietnam, gives credit to the sound economic reforms that enabled his business to flourish, with a special mention of Nguyễn Văn Linh, his close friend, as well as general secretary of the Vietnam Communist Party from 1986 to 1991. Linh was a strong advocate of the "economic innovation" who also recognized the contributions of the Hoa (ethnic Chinese) in the independence and development of Vietnam. Xương was once commended for the part that he played in facilitating medical supplies to the communist army during the Vietnam War.

When Xương was queried about his personal efforts in achieving success, he attributed it to perseverance, thriftiness, and his ability to focus on doing small things first and doing them very well. His proficiency in Mandarin allows him to wax philosophical about the vicissitudes of life and career from the wealth of Chinese and Vietnamese proverbs he knows. His favourite Chinese proverb is "to decide promptly and opportunely" (当机立断), which, he said, poignantly explains his decisiveness when he ventured into his art and craft business. When he identified the artistic proclivity of the Vietnamese, he immediately decided to make use of it. His souvenirs to the foreign officials who have visited his home-cum-workshop were sculptures and art pieces crafted by Vietnamese artists. He currently has about 120 Vietnamese and Hoa subcontractors and craftsmen working with him. Some of them work in his home-and-workshop, which consists of three buildings standing on a land area of about 10,000 square metres.

Xương sees the importance of preserving his Chinese-language speaking ability and calligraphy. He is artistically inclined and finds it easy to pick up Chinese calligraphy on his own, using books which he bought in China. He practises calligraphy and polishes his Mandarin comprehension and conversational skills by watching at least two hours of television programmes daily on China's Phoenix cable channel. Business and leisure apart, he supports Chinese-language education through his role as honorary adviser of Việt Tú School (越秀华文中心), one of the Chinese-language centres in the city. The centre retains the original name by which it was known when it was a Chinese-medium school before the country's unification in 1975–76. It continues to be supported and operated by the Cantonese clan in Ho Chi Minh City. Xương has also been a long-time patron of the Chinese cultural dance and musical troupe, Lotus (莲花歌舞古乐团), which teaches and promotes Chinese songs and dances.

He professes to be a Buddhist who follows a vegetarian diet, believes in taking care of his health for his family's happiness, and makes it a point to play table tennis with his grandson and daughter-in-law, whom he said has won many table tennis awards. His granddaughter is studying English in Singapore. His son, Châu Quốc Hùng, now manages the family business although Xương is still its managing director. His daughter, Châu Tiểu Mai, manages her Chinese medical hall called Đồng Tế Đường (同济堂) near his home. His family also rents out a few properties.

Xương hopes that his descendants will continue to live in Vietnam, which he refers to as his "base of life". He is confident that his descendants can do better than him, as he has done better than his father in life. He hopes that the future generation will learn to cultivate the spirit of Buddhism, lead a harmonious life, and seek better education.

Private interview with Châu Văn Xương in October 2010, Ho Chi Minh City, Vietnam.

Cheah Fook Ling, Jeffrey

(谢富年, Xie Funian, 1946–)

Prominent businessman, philanthropist, Malaysia

Cheah, a self-made entrepreneur, is the founder and chairman of the Sunway Group of Companies in Malaysia, a well diversified Malaysian conglomerate with ventures in India, Trinidad, the United Arab Emirates, Vietnam, Indonesia, Thailand, Cambodia, China, and Australia. Its core businesses include construction, property development and investment, manufacturing, trading, tourism, hotel, health care, and tertiary education. Cheah is known as a visionary as this is evident from his achievements in transforming pieces of wasteland into vibrant townships, and his awareness of the importance of building civic institutions, especially tertiary education ones, for the human capital development of Malaysia's young generation.

Cheah was born in 1946 in Pusing, a small town outside of Ipoh, Perak, to a Hakka family of six children. He received his primary and secondary education in Batu Gajah before leaving to pursue his tertiary education at the prestigious Footscray Institute of Technology, now the Victoria University of Technology, in Melbourne, Australia. He began his career as an accountant in a motor assembly plant in Malaysia. Hailing from a wealthy tin mining family, he not only ran the family business, but took it to much greater heights. He started a tin mining company, the Sungei Way Enterprise, with a paid-up capital of RM100,000 in 1974. Ten years later he listed the company, Sungei Way Holdings Berhad, which was then engaged in quarrying and asphalt manufacturing, leasing and hire purchase financing, and road construction and earthworks projects. He developed the company into what it is today, the Sunway Group of Companies. His most well known and prestigious development project is the incredible rehabilitation and transformation of an abandoned piece of tin mining land into the now thriving 350-hectare Bandar Sunway, a fully-integrated resort township, distinctly one of Southeast Asia'a best known tourist destinations. Located in the Klang Valley, 20 minutes outside Malaysian capital Kuala Lumpur, Bandar Sunway has won many international awards, including being regarded as the world's best leisure project by FIABCI (International Real Estate Federation, Paris) in 2002. And most recently, the Sunway Pyramid, an icon in Southeast Asia located in Bandar Sunway was named the winner of FIABCI Prix d'Excellence 2011.

One of the personal hallmarks of Cheah is his immense contribution to society, especially in tertiary education. Cheah established the Sunway University College in 1986 with the sole mission of providing greater and better education opportunities to Malaysian aspiring youths. It was not an easy mission, especially when the college made loses in its early years of operation. However, his determination and dedication turned the college around. After the college had become a very viable and profitable business, Cheah decided in 1997 to transfer all his personal shares and ownership of the college into the newly established Sunway Education Trust Fund, which fully owned the Sunway University College. All profits derived from the college, and its portion of profits from its partnership with Monash University Malaysia, are ploughed back into the Trust Fund to upgrade facilities and human resources. The Trust Fund is another institution Cheah had established in accordance with his vision to ensure these educational institutions meet world-class standards and are accessible to all. Cheah's vision, modelled after that of the Harvard University, is partly anchored on the hope that the Sunway Education Trust will also be able to draw support from the public, and develop into a premier tertiary education institution in the future. The Trust also awards deserving students with scholarships worth more than RM1 million annually. To date, more than RM23 million worth of scholarships have been given out. In recognition of his remarkable contribution, the Sunway Campus of Monash University's School of Medicine was named after him on 3 September 2007.

Cheah's passion for civic institution development also involved primary schools. His compassion went out to the troubled students back in his hometown of Pusing, and since 1987, he has personally donated more than RM3 million for the construction and upgrading of the facilities at SRJK (C) Pusing, Perak. In the early 1990s, Cheah and his company volunteered to complete an abandoned government school project in Bandar Sunway at its own cost (RM2.5 million). SRK Bandar Sunway is today proudly serving the primary education needs of the community in the township. His burning passion to provide education opportunities to the poor persists, as reflected in his contribution to the school development fund of SJK(C) Chee Wen (子文国小), in Selangor in 2007. His donation of RM3 million is believed to be the highest to a Chinese primary school in the country from an individual entrepreneur.

In recognition of his outstanding contribution to education, Cheah has been conferred eight honorary doctorates by leading universities worldwide: Two honorary doctorates of the University from Victoria University (1993), and Flinders University (1994); doctorates of Law from Monash University (1995), and Leicester University (1996); doctorates of Education from University of Western Australia (1994), West Michigan University (1994), and Oxford Brooks University (1998); and doctorate of Business Administration from Greenwich University (2001).

His leadership, vision, enormous achievements in the corporate sector, and contributions to society are recognized by both the government and non-governmental organizations, as clearly reflected in his distinguished appointments. In 1990, the Minister of Trade appointed him the director of the National Productivity Centre. In 1995, the prime minister honoured him as a member of the Malaysian Business Council and offered him the chairmanship of the Malaysian Industry-Government High Technology for Construction and Housing (MIGHT). In 1996 he was appointed by the minister of Education to the Higher Education Council of Malaysia, a body responsible for formulating higher education policies in Malaysia. This important appointment is one such example of his commitment to improving civic institutions. In the same year he was appointed an EXCO member of the Malaysian Tourism Action Council by the minister of Tourism Malaysia. The following year, the minister of Finance appointed him a council member of the Financial Reporting Foundation. In July 2008 he was appointed honorary officer of the Order of Australia (AO), the highest honour conferred on non-citizens by the prime minister of Australia, in recognition of his meritorious contribution to furthering the excellence of higher education in Malaysia.

Due to his immense contribution to society and the country, Cheah is conferred with a few royal conferments. In 1995 he was made Justice of the Peace (JP) by the Sultan of Terengganu. In 1996 he was conferred two royal titles: the Dato' Seri Paduka Mahkota Perak (SPMP, carrying the title, "Dato' Seri") by DYMM Sultan Perak Darul Ridzuan; and the Panglima Setia Mahkota (PSM, carrying the title "Tan Sri") by the king of Malaysia. In 1988 he received the Darjah Kebesaran Dato' Paduka Mahkota Selangor (DPMS, carrying the title, "Dato") from the Sultan of Selangor.

In addition to his outstanding success in business and his tight schedule, Cheah stretches himself further and gets involved in non-governmental organizations to serve the society. Among other roles, he is the chairman and co-founder of Asian Strategy and Leadership Institute (ASLI). He was appointed the honorary chairman of the Sin Chew Foundation in 2000; the vice-president of the National Kidney Foundation of Malaysia in 2002; the founding trustee of Malaysian Liver Foundation since 1999; president of the Malaysian Hakka Association 1997–2004; and the first non-Malay honorary member of the Kuala Lumpur Malay Chamber of Commerce since 2002.

Other honours bestowed on him are the Paul Harris Fellow Award, Property Man of the Year (Malaysia) in 1993, CEO of the Year (Malaysia) in 1996, and Asia's Most Innovative Chinese Entrepreneur Award 2005, Fellow Australian Society of Certificate Practising Accountants, Fellow of Institute of Directors award.

Chee Soon Juan

(徐顺全, Xu Shunquan, 1962–)
Politician, social activist, Singapore

Chee Soon Juan is best known as the secretary general of the Singapore Democratic Party (SDP) and founder of the Open Singapore Centre. Though he has failed to win a seat in Parliament, he is one of Singapore's most prominent opposition figures, and his efforts to transform the political environment in Singapore through passive resistance and civil disobedience constantly make headlines.

Chee was born in Singapore in 1962 and educated at the Anglo-Chinese School, the National University of Singapore, and then the University of Georgia where he obtained a PhD in neuropsychology in 1990. He returned to Singapore that year and began lecturing in the Department of Social Work at the National University of Singapore that June. In December 1992, Chee made news by joining the opposition SDP to contest the by-election in the Marine Parade Group Representation Constituency (GRC). The SDP team, comprising Low Yong Nguan, Ashleigh Seow, Mohd Shariff and Chee, secured just 24.5 per cent of the votes cast.

In 1993, Chee was elected assistant secretary general of the SDP. In March that year, Chee was dismissed from the university for misuse of S$226 in research funds, which he allegedly used to courier a copy of his wife's dissertation to her supervisor in the United States. Chee claimed that his dismissal was politically motivated and staged a ten-day hunger strike in protest. He later backed down and called off the hunger strike when it was revealed that he was drinking glucose water while ostensibly fasting. His former head of department and PAP Member of Parliament S. Vasoo also successfully sued him for defamation for intimating that Vasoo had fabricated evidence relating to his sacking. Vasoo was awarded S$315,000 in damages. Chee's hunger strike caused dissension within the SDP when its then secretary general, Chiam See Tong, censured Chee for his action. When none of the other Central Executive Committee (CEC) members in the SDP supported Chiam's motion of censure, Chiam resigned as secretary general and Chee took over as acting secretary general. Subsequently, when Chiam made a speech criticizing his own party's leadership, the CEC voted to expel Chiam from the party. Later, Chiam sued the CEC for wrongful expulsion and won. Chee was elected to replace Chiam as SDP's secretary general in January 1995, and in 1997, Chiam left to join the Singapore People's Party which his supporters had established for him.

Chee was primarily responsible for the SDP's 1994 manifesto, "Dare to Change: An Alternative Vision for Singapore" which the Party hoped would energize and reinvigorate its members and provide a platform for the next general elections held in 1997. Chee stood as a single-member candidate in the MacPherson constituency and obtained 34.8 per cent of the votes against the People's Action Party's Matthias Yao. In the 2001 general elections, Chee helmed an SDP team to contest Jurong GRC. The team secured just 20.2 per cent of the votes. Shortly after these elections, Prime Minister Goh Chok Tong and Senior Minister Lee Kuan Yew both sued Chee for defamation, alleging that in the course of electioneering, Chee alleged that they had misled Parliament over an alleged S$17 million loan to Indonesia during the Asian Financial Crisis. Chee was ordered to pay S$200,000 and S$300,000 in damages to Lee and Goh respectively. In 2006, he was declared a bankrupt when he failed to pay the damages. He was disqualified from contesting in both the 2006 and 2011 general elections in which the SDP garnered less than 5 per cent of the votes cast in both elections.

Since 2001, Chee has advocated civil disobedience as a form of protest to effect a change in government policies and as a form of political action. In 2002, he was fined for speaking at the Speakers' Corner without a permit and for attempting to hold a rally in front of the Istana without a licence. These convictions were followed by a number of other high-profile instances of civil disobedience, such as speeches in public places without a permit; and rallies and marches during the 61st annual meeting of the Boards of Governors of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank held in Singapore in 2006. In February 2006, Chee was convicted for contempt of court and jailed for a day and fined $6,000. He served an additional seven days in jail when he failed to pay the fine. In April that year, he was stopped at the airport and charged with attempting to leave Singapore without the approval of the official assignee, which was required of all bankrupts. In November 2006, Chee was jailed for five weeks for failing to pay the $5,000 fine imposed on him for speaking in public without a licence. He became ill in prison and alleged that his food had been spiked and that he suffered sleep deprivation while being incarcerated.

Chee is married to Dr Huang Chih Mei and is a father of three children. He has authored several books: Dare to Change: An Alternative Vision for Singapore (1994) which he updated and published as Your Future, My Faith, Our Freedom: A Democratic Blueprint for Singapore (2001); Singapore My Home Too (1996); To Be Free: Stories from Asia's Struggle Against Opposition (1999); The Power of Courage: Effecting Political Change in Singapore Through Nonviolence (2005). He was awarded the Defender of Democracy Award 2003 by the Washington-based Parliamentarians for Global Action. In 2004, local film maker Martyn See directed and produced a documentary on Chee entitled, Singapore Rebel, which was slated to be screened at the Singapore International Film Festival, but was forced to be withdrawn and subsequently banned as a "party political film" under the Films Act.

Chee Swee Lee

(徐瑞莉, Xu Ruili, 1955–)
Sportswoman, Singapore

Chee Swee Lee shone as the brightest star during the golden period of Singapore's track successes in the 1970s. She was the first Singaporean woman to win a gold medal on the athletics track at the Asian Games. Chee ran in the 400-metre and the 800-metre events and was renowned not only for her self-belief, determination, commitment, and humility during competition, but also for her loyalty and devotion to her family. Her successes led to her representing Singapore at the Olympic Games in 1976.

Chee was born on 10 January 1955, the third child in a family of eight children. She started her athletics career as a ten-year-old at Telok Kurau West Primary School, where she trained diligently six days a week. In 1966 she became the school's athletics champion. Subsequently, she became a member of the Flash Athletics Club, working under the watchful gaze of her coach, Patrick Zehnder.

In May 1969, as a relatively unknown secondary two student, she was a surprise winner over Maimoon Bakar, then the national 400-m champion. She gradually brought her personal best time for the 400-m to close to 60 seconds and, with it, achieved a qualifying time for the Southeast Asian Peninsular (SEAP) Games. As a fourteen-year-old she represented the national team in Rangoon (Burma/Myanmar), winning a silver medal in the 400-metre event. In 1970, she became Singapore's "golden girl" of athletics at a time when the nation was just striving to forge a strong sporting identity.

Still only fifteen years of age, Chee beat the existing combined schools' record and set her sights on the national record held at the time by Maimoon Bakar. Her performances were heralded by Tan Eng Yoon, the national coach who successfully predicted that she would break 60 seconds before the end of the year. Initially Chee was selected as a reserve for the 400-m relay team representing Singapore at the 1970 Asian Games to be held in Bangkok. However she also gained her first taste of Asian glory by recording a time of 59.8 in the final of the 400-m event. The following year, she won a bronze medal in the 400-m at the SEAP Games held in Kuala Lumpur. She also collected a silver medal in the 4×400m relay.

The sporting fraternity had great expectations of Chee when Singapore hosted the SEAP Games in 1973. Having recorded 58.0 seconds in the South Korean championships, she was expected to clinch a gold medal, but had to settle for silver behind Than Than, the Burmese runner in a battling time of 56.0 seconds. In the 800-metre event, she again took silver, this time behind Mar Mar Min, also from Burma (Myanmar).

In 1974 Chee won a gold medal in the 400-m competition at the Philippines Track and Field Championships. This was to be the prelude to her finest achievement. At nineteen she recorded her greatest triumph at the 7th Asian Games in Tehran, becoming the first woman from Singapore to win a gold medal at this level in any sport. She set a new Asian Games record and a Singapore national record with 55.08 seconds on 15 September 1974. She also won two other medals in the 4×100-m (bronze — 47.1 seconds) and the 4×400-m (silver — 3:43.9 minutes). At the Commonwealth Games later in the year she recorded times of 55.1 seconds in the 400-m and 2.08.1 in the 800-m events, thus consolidating a career year.

Chee was crowned Sportswoman of the Year (1974) in recognition of these feats and later entered the Hall of Fame. She said she owed it all to her coach, Patrick Zehnder — "I would not be where I am today had it not been for him — his patience, his guidance and his coaching." Despite her heavy training schedule, she was able to find time to help her mother make cakes for Chinese New Year.

Her two main assignments in 1975 were the Asian Track and Field Championships in Seoul and the SEAP Games. Also considered was a tour of Japan, but the plans for this fell through when it was discovered that Zehnder was unable to accompany her. The withdrawal, which made front page news, brought threats of disciplinary action from the Athletics Association. Zehnder was committed to coaching other athletes for the Asian Track and Field Championships and felt that they were his priority. Chee stated that she did not desire preferential treatment. In Seoul, she was just pipped by South Korean Kim Kyung Sook. Two months later in Singapore, she would exact some revenge on Kim at the Amateur Open Championships at the National Stadium.

In late 1975, Chee continued her Southeast Asian dominance by taking both gold medals at the SEAP Games in Bangkok. Her 56.5 seconds in the 400-m and 2:02.27 minutes in the 800-m events were some consolation for the defeat in Seoul.

The following year Chee took up a track scholarship at the University of Redlands in California, training with the renowned coach, Vince Reel. He was the husband and coach of the famous Taiwanese athlete, Chi Cheng. This signalled a temporary suspension of an eleven-year partnership with Patrick Zehnder. Her aim was to train and then attempt the qualifying time for her Olympic events, with the added incentive of higher-class rivalry in the United States. It appeared that an earlier invitation from Reel, eighteen months before, had proved irresistible. The new environment clearly suited Chee. She focused on the 800-m race and achieved the Olympic qualifying time with 2:07.4 minutes — still the national record today. However, there was bad news for home support in July, just a couple of weeks before the Olympic Games were due to start. An injury to the Achilles tendon of Chee's right leg occurred during the National Amateur Athletic Union meet and the injury was to prove heartbreaking for Chee and Singapore in the Olympic Games.

In her 800-m heat in Montreal, Chee broke down less than half way round the first lap. She was forced to pull out because the injury had not fully healed. Sadly, Swee Lee was never to regain her full form, but she did continue to compete. Pain in the Achilles tendon, even after short training periods, hampered her process of recovery. Chee sought relief from a number of different treatments, and ultimately surgery was required. Unwilling to retire and showing the utmost determination, Chee Swee Lee fought to make a comeback. She reappeared after two years. A spell in West Germany raised hopes of a full recovery, and the courageous runner vowed to race within the region for Singapore. She ran in the SEA Games in Manila in 1981, but unfortunately without success.

Surprising many, she returned to competitive running and continued her career for a further fourteen years. By 1985 she was posting times for 400-m and 800-m events that were comparable with those of her American rivals — even though she had reached the age of thirty. She set a Mount San Antonio College record in the 800-m race and came second in the conference championship with a time of 2:11.0 minutes.

Her successes at Mount San Antonio led to an extension of an athletic scholarship to California State University, Pomona. Chee continued to run competitively against younger NCAA Division II rivals, until she graduated with a degree in business administration in 1989. She was a member of the Southern California Cheetahs, a local track club, and continued to compete well into 1990. Chee Swee Lee, the resilient "golden girl" finally retired from the track at the age of thirty-five.

She now has a successful career as a marketing manager and lives with her husband, Bob Cedillos, in Diamond Bar, California, in a suburb of Los Angeles County.

In May 2011 she was awarded a medallion to commemorate her appearance at the Montreal Olympic Games. As one of Singapore's 167 acknowledged Olympians since 1936, she has been assigned the number 97 in the chronology created by the association known as Olympians Singapore.

Chen Chong Swee

Artist, Singapore

Chen Chong Swee was an artist, teacher, and writer who made a significant impact on the development of the visual arts in Singapore. This renowned specialist in watercolour painting was a member of the pioneer generation of artists who developed the "Nanyang School of Painting" style that synthesized distinctive aesthetic traditions of the east and west. This style was unique to Singapore at the turn of the twentieth century.

He was also one of the first artists in Singapore to use Chinese ink painting techniques to portray scenery and figurative paintings with local and Southeast Asian themes. With a keen eye for colour and detail, he drew upon his observations of his surrounding environment to bring to life renditions of daily life activities. His painting subjects were often composed from his surrounding environment and daily life activities as he believed that a painting must be understood and be a recollection of one's thoughts. Many of his masterpieces were inspired by observations and insights from his numerous tours to Bali and the east coast of West Malaysia.

Chen was born in Swatow, China, in 1910. He received his education at the Union High School, and graduated in 1929. From there, he moved on to the Xinhua Academy of Fine Arts. After arriving in Singapore in 1931, he taught art at various secondary schools, before joining the Nanyang Academy of Fine Arts as a lecturer in the Chinese ink painting department.

Chen's training at the Xinhua Academy oriented him towards the traditional principles of Chinese painting. He is firmly grounded in the Chinese tradition of painting as "idea writing", where inscriptions are used purposefully to fortify the meanings of the paintings. However, he also believed that such long-held traditions of Chinese painting should not be cast in stone. This meant he was open to exploration of new ideas and techniques. During this period, the art scene in Shanghai and China was also seeing the emergence of his peers, who were synthesizing modernism with conventional principles in Chinese ink painting.

Eventually, and in part due to the influence of life in Southeast Asia, he developed his signature painting style, which is defined by his belief that communicating art to his audience is a top priority in the creation process. This goes against the classic modernist approach that dictates that the innate subjectivism, sensibilities, and concerns of the individual artist should always take priority over viewer accessibility. He describes his philosophy towards art as such: "Art is a part of life and cannot exist independently from real life. Art must be objective. If a work of art fails to embody truth, goodness and beauty, it cannot be regarded as a true work of art."

In 1935, Chen co-founded the Salon Art Society (Singapore Society of Chinese Artists). In the same year, he was given a cash award at the King George V Silver Jubilee Art Exhibition. Chen taught art in various schools in Singapore between 1936 and 1970, and also served on various advisory and management committees of art societies in Singapore. Thirty years later, in 1965, in recognition of his contributions, he was awarded the Meritorious Public Service Star of the Republic of Singapore. Then in 1969, he co-founded the Singapore Watercolour Society with artists such as Lim Cheng Hoe, and Loy Chye Chuan. He also served as the society's treasurer for many years.

A landmark experience in Chen's career was a visit to Bali in 1953, together with fellow artists Cheong Soo Pieng, Chen Wen Hsi, Liu Kang, and Lim Hak Tai. Inspired by their visit, the group members collaborated to produce the Pictures Of Bali painting exhibition in the same year. The exhibition featured the paintings completed by the artists during their Indonesian sojourn and set the stage for the development of the "Nanyang School of Painting".

For more than fifty years after his arrival in Singapore in 1931, Chen participated actively in various local art exhibitions. His works could be seen in the annual National Day Art Exhibition and many local events organized by the art societies in Singapore. His reach extended beyond the nation's shores as well, for he was frequently selected to represent Singapore in overseas exhibitions.

Chen was also a prolific writer and frequent contributor to newspapers, exhibition catalogues, and magazines published by art associations. Through the written word, he actively engaged his peers and the local art community in discussions on issues such as the fundamental differences in Chinese and Western art, the functions of art education, and the need to develop a style of ink painting that was relevant to a multicultural environment. These writings offered a peek into Chen's thinking and provided an insider's view of art discourse in Singapore from the 1940s to the 1970s.

In the first published monograph on the history of art in Singapore and Malaysia, A Concise History of Malayan Art, published in 1963, Ma Ge wrote that Chen Chong Swee had received so much recognition for his art that it overshadowed his significant contribution to art education. In an article the same year, Cao Shuming quoted Ma Ge in order to draw attention to Chen's important contributions to art education and publication.

Paying tribute to his talent and contributions to the Singapore visual arts scene, the Ministry of Culture and the National Museum jointly presented a "Chen Chong Swee Retrospective" in 1984. Two years later, in 1986, Chen passed away. Two more exhibitions dedicated to Chen were held in the ensuing two decades: "Chen Chong Swee, His Thoughts, His Art", presented by the National Museum in 1993; and "Passages, selected works of Chen Chong Swee", by the Singapore Art Museum in 1998.

On 15 January 1994, 151 works of art by Chen, mainly Chinese ink paintings, were donated by the Chen family estate to the "Chen Chong Swee Charity auction" conducted by Singapore Sotheby's Auction House at the Empress Place Building. The auction garnered a total of $676,200 from the sale of 138 paintings, with the highest priced pieces, Returning From The Sea and Trengganu Beach, fetching S$66,000 and S$16,000 respectively.

In addition, more than 70 per cent of the collection was sold above the minimum reserve price. The funds raised through the auction went into the reserves for the NAC-Chen Chong Swee Art Scholarship, which awards aspiring artists with up to S$25,000 funding to pursue full-time postgraduate studies or research programmes overseas.

In March 1994, the Singapore Mint produced gold and silver ingots commemorating the late artist. The 75g-gold and 43g-silver ingots were printed with the artist's Drying Fish painting on one side, while the other side featured a portrait of the artist with his personalized signature and seal. These ingots were launched officially at the Reminiscence of Singapore Pioneer Art Masters art exhibition at the Takashimaya Art Gallery on 11 March 1994.

Chen, David

Educationist, Malaysia

David Chen Chong En was well known in Malaysia and Singapore as an outstanding educationist who was well versed in both Chinese and English languages. He was principal of Chung Ling High School (钟灵中学) in Penang before the Second World War (July 1931 to December 1941) and after the war (September 1945 to February 1952). Under his charge, Chung Ling High School became a reputable school in the northern states of Malaya because of the effective reforms he had introduced. In particular, his bilingual policy was most talked about and was regarded by many other schools as a model to be emulated. He was also actively involved in the Chinese education movement and was the first chairman of the United Chinese School Teachers Association of Malaysia (UCSTAM). Unfortunately, at the height of his career in education, he was shot dead by the Communist Party of Malaya.

David Chen hailed from Jiangning (江宁) in Jiangsu (江苏) province. Born in 1900, he attended Cui Ying High School (翠英高级中学) in Suzhou (苏州) in 1909 and studied at the Faculty of Arts Education in Jinling University (金陵大学) in Nanjing from 1924 to 1926. After his graduation, he taught geography and English at the secondary school section of the university, as well as Zhengyi Secondary School (正谊中学). He had also served as head of English Department at Chung Hua Secondary School (中华学校) in Dutch-occupied Tanjung Pandan on Belitung Island in Indonesia. From 1926 to 1927, he took charge of the Academic Department and Sports Department at Cui Ying High School in Suzhou. He served as president of the Federation of Sports Clubs of twelve private secondary schools in Zhejiang (浙江) from 1929 to 1930. In 1931, the Board of Directors of Chung Ling High School, through the recommendation of China's consul in Penang, Yang Nianzu (杨念祖), employed him as principal of the school. During his tenure of office, he introduced major reforms to strengthen the academic performance of the school. He was pragmatic in his school administration and before long Chung Ling High School rose to become a renowned institution, attracting students from near and far. The school board then decided to construct new school buildings at a new location. A fund raising campaign was held and an 11-acre piece of land at Lot 133 in Kampung Baru was later purchased. Construction works for the new school buildings began in October 1934 and were completed in September 1935. The new school buildings comprised a school hall, an administration office, classrooms, hostels, washrooms, basketball courts, badminton courts, etc.

During the Japanese Occupation, David Chen lived a secluded life in Cameron Highlands, but his wish to revive Chung Ling High School had never wavered. The British army regained control of Malaya on 3 September 1945 and by 15 September, David Chen had returned to Penang to meet his former colleagues to discuss plans for the reopening of Chung Ling High School. After two months of preparation, the school was officially reopened on 8 December 1945. Soon after the revival, the number of students increased sharply and there was an urgent need to have new school buildings. In 1948, David Chen and the school board started a campaign to raise funds for the school extension works. In May 1950, a new hall and sixteen classrooms were completed. The new hall, which was named "Huai Ze Hall" (怀泽堂), could accommodate 2,000 people at any one time and was then the largest hall among all schools in Malaysia.

In managing Chung Ling High School, David Chen had adopted the American missionary educational system of his alma mater, Jinling University. This system had a heavy emphasis on the English language and all final-year students in the senior middle classes were required to take the English examination. Apart from admitting selected good students, the school also tried to recruit the best teachers. With these measures, the school was able to score the best results in Penang for the Cambridge School Certificate Examination and the London Commerce Examination every year — unmatched even by the English-medium schools. David Chen was determined to produce students who were able to achieve high standards of academic performance and secure better job prospects. At the time of colonial rule then, this was only possible by using the English language as the medium of teaching in the schools. His ultimate objective was to ensure that students from Chung Ling High School were on par with those from the English-medium schools, if not better. Apart from stressing the academic performance of the school, he was also concerned with better welfare for the teachers. In particular, he had allowed an old Chinese language teacher, Guan Zhenmin (管震民), to stay on to teach in the school after retirement on a half-salary pension and such a move won him praises from the public. He had once said: "If we do not improve the lives of our teachers, it is just like planting vegetables without applying fertilizer."

While focusing on his educational work, David Chen had also played an active role in leading the Chinese education movement. When the USCTAM was established in December 1952, he was elected the first chairman. In trying to secure better welfare for the teachers, he had set up two committees to work on the establishment of the Teachers Welfare Fund and the standardization of criteria for teachers' salary scale. However, before such efforts could produce any result, he was shot dead by a gunman from the Communist Party of Malaya at 3pm on 4 February 1952 while he was on his way to attend a meeting of the Penang Chinese School Teachers Association. His assassination was a great loss not only to Chung Ling High School, but also to the Chinese education movement in Malaysia.

Chen, Georgette

Artist, Singapore

Born Chang Li Ying, Georgette Chen was a forerunner of the visual arts movement in Singapore in the post-World War II period, contributing to the birth of the Nanyang art style. While much has been recorded on her artistic achievements and contributions to the Southeast Asian, and more specifically Singapore, arts scene, little is known of her early life.

Contradictory accounts exist as to her date of birth, as well as her birthplace. Some sources claim she was born in 1906, others say 1907. A few sources claim she was born in Zhejiang Province, China, but the majority of sources claim she was born in Paris. What we do know, however, is that she was the fourth of twelve children in her family, and her father, Chang Sen Chek was an antique dealer who travelled extensively to New York, Paris, and London for business. As the Chang family followed Chang everywhere, all their children, including Chen, were exposed to art from a young age. Despite the fact that the Changs were predominantly based in the West, the wife educated their children in Mandarin at home, and the husband imbued them with Chinese nationalistic fervour for Dr Sun Yat-sen's revolution. Thus, all the Chang children grew up with a strong sense of their cultural identity. In turn, this Chinese cultural identity heavily influenced the themes in Chen's art.

In her formative years, Chen shuttled between Paris and America, soaking up the artistic atmosphere of both countries. As she preferred Parisian life and its abundance of museums to America, she left the Art Students League of New York after a year in 1926. When she returned to Paris in 1927, she studied at the Académie Colarossi and Académie Biloul with the support of her parents. Although her parents were supportive of her decision to be an artist, they were apprehensive about her career choice as they felt artists had to be dead before they were appreciated. However, her parents' fears were unfounded and Chen became a notable artist in her own right when the artwork she submitted for selection for the Salon d'Automne exhibition was selected in 1930. Her early work was lauded for being reminiscent of the late French Impressionist movement, with emphasis on heavy brush strokes as well as volume and texture.

At about the same period, she met and married her first husband, Eugene Youren Chen, a Chinese foreign minister and friend of Sun Yat-sen. A keen lover of the arts and music himself, her husband encouraged her to become a professional artist and helped advance her artistic career. For the duration of their marriage, Chen lived predominantly in Shanghai and travelled between Paris and China. This was an artistically productive period for her as she held two major exhibitions in Paris in 1937 — at the Palace of Painting as part of the Paris World Fair, and at the Women Painters Exhibition. During this time, she also held many exhibitions in Shanghai showcasing her still life paintings, and executed numerous portraits of Eugene Chen in the style of van Gogh.

Unfortunately the outbreak of the Sino-Japanese war curtailed her artistic production. She was placed under house arrest along with her husband for much of the war. Following her husband's death in 1944 as a prisoner-of-war and the end of the Second World War, Georgette Chen retook the art world by storm with a seminal show in New York at the Asia Institute. In this endeavour, she was sponsored by the Nobel Prize laureate, Pearl S. Buck. Some time during this period, she met and married her second husband, Dr Ho Yung Chi, with whom she moved to Paris in 1949. Once again, she exhibited her latest works at the Salon d'Automne and the Galerie La Licorne. In 1951, she and Dr Ho moved to Penang.

Following her divorce from Dr Ho, she relocated to Singapore in 1953 where she exhibited her work at the Chinese Chamber of Commerce and the Singapore Art Society. In 1954, Chen took a part-time teaching position at the Nanyang Academy of Fine Art which she held until 1980.

The 1950s marked Georgette Chen's mature period in art where she melded her Western-style post-Impressionist techniques with local subject matters thereby contributing to the evolvement of the "Nanyang Style". The most notable feature of the "Nanyang Style" is its hybridization of Asian themes with Western ideas and techniques. She was an expert proponent of the "Nanyang Style" and consequently became known as "Chendana" (Malay for sandalwood) and "Basket Chen" due to the recurring use of a basket motif in her later works. Given her training, extensive experience in painting, and unique artistic vision, she became the first female recipient of Singapore's Cultural Medallion for Art in 1982.

Ill health however prevented Chen from continuing her art after 1980. Subsequently, after an eleven-year battle with rheumatoid arthritis, she passed away on 15 March 1993 in Mount Alvernia Hospital. Her death did not mark the end of her contributions to the Singapore art scene. Far from it. Her shadow and "Nanyang Style" continue to loom over young artists in modern-day Singapore, for immediately upon her death, Lee Seng Gee, chairman of the Lee Foundation and executor of her estate, found a sizeable collection of paintings in two rooms of her house. These fifty-three paintings were accordingly donated to the Singapore Art Museum in June 1994, bringing the museum's collection of Chen's artwork to 104. Likewise, her house in Siglap Plain was auctioned for S$2.8 million, and the sum was used by the National Arts Council to create the Georgette Chen Arts Scholarship for art students. Funds from the sales of Chen's personal investment in stocks and shares, as well as donations sale proceeds of her house, were used for a new building for the Singapore Council of Women's Organizations, numerous community welfare projects for the local Malay community, and the Practice Theatre Ensemble in support of Chinese theatrical art in Singapore.

Chen Huiming

(陈辉明, 1927–)
Educator, Cambodia

Chen Huiming is the school principal of Duanhua Xuexiao (端华学校), the largest Chinese school in Phnom Penh, Cambodia, which claims to have 11,000 students.

Chen was born into a poor family in Puning (普宁), Guangdong in 1927. When he was four years old, he and his father left his birthplace to go to Guangxi (广西), and from there travelled to Vietnam (then under French colonial rule) where the family settled down. In 1953 the local Chinese school which the young Chen went to was caught up in the political unrest leading to it being banned by the colonial authorities. Chen's family was also affected and took refuge in Phnom Penh, Cambodia, where he continued his Chinese education at the Duanhua School between 1954 and 1956. In 1957 he finished his studies at Duanhua and was employed as a teacher by the school for more than ten years.

In 1970, General Lon Nol led a coup d'etat in Cambodia which brought the right-wing military group to power. Consequently almost all the Chinese schools in Cambodia, totalling more than 200, were closed down. Chen then moved to the province of Kratie on the Cambodian-Vietnamese border, a province controlled by the Khmer Rouge, which was supported by Vietnam. Chinese schools were still allowed to operate in this province so Chen taught at a Chinese school here as a relief teacher and a student of his, Aing Khun, later establish a Chinese school in Phnom Penh. In March 1974, however, the Khmer Rouge changed its policy and closed down all the Chinese schools in Kratie. Chen was then deported by the Khmer Rouge to the countryside to work as a farmer in the northern province of Stung Treng, also came under the control of Khmer Rouge.

In 1975, Khmer Rouge "liberated" Cambodia and began to establish a "socialist state" in which all those considered "enemies of socialism" were to be eradicated. They included the capitalists, intellectuals, professionals, schoolteachers, merchants, officials, soldiers, bureaucrats of the former government, and ethnic Vietnamese, etc. The ethnic Chinese, being urban dwellers and belonging to an undesirable class, became the target of the purge. In theory the policy had no ethnic overtones, but it was soon revealed that the Khmer Rouge not only prohibited the ethnic Chinese from using their language, but also induced them to abandon their traditions. Later both the Chinese language and Chinese culture were banned. Whoever spoke the Chinese language or dialects were considered to have committed a crime. In consequence many Cambodian Chinese hid their ethnic identity for fear of being persecuted.

It is interesting to note that the Chinese language and culture were suppressed not only by the pro-American Lon Nol government, but also under the communist rule of Pol Pot. The Pol Pot policy was the more extreme as it aimed at eradicating both the Chinese language and the culture. In December 1978 Vietnamese troops invaded Cambodia and installed a pro-Hanoi regime. That did not bring about an improvement in the position of the Chinese language and culture, however. As there had been no Chinese schools in Cambodia for more than twenty years, the ethnic Chinese community in Cambodia gradually lost their "mother tongue". The younger generation could only use the Cambodian language for communication purposes.

Chinese schools were re-established only after the end of the Cold War and the withdrawal of the Vietnamese troops from Cambodia. In September 1992, the Duanhua School was officially reopened and Chen was re-invited to serve the school, this time as principal. During the Pol Pot years and the Vietnamese Occupation, Chen had had no opportunity to teach; at one time he was even forced to become a farmer. It was only after Cambodia regained its freedom that he was able to resume his career as a schoolteacher and school principal. He has served as principal since the reopening of the Duanhua School.

According to Chen, Chinese schools have been sponsored by the local Chinese community as in the past, and Chinese leaders are eager to revive the Chinese language and culture. By 2006, there were about seventy Chinese schools in Cambodia, of which eleven were located in Phnom Penh.

Chen also points out that Duanhua School, which was sponsored by the Teochew Association, has about 11,000 daytime students in the main and branch campuses. Apart from them, there are 2,000 students who attend Duanhua evening school. There are approximately 300 teaching and administrative staff members in the school. Most subjects such as general knowledge, mathematics, geography, and history are taught in Mandarin, while the Cambodian language is taught four or five periods a week. The school uses primary school textbooks which are jointly written by the Cambodian General Chinese Association and the Jinan University (in Guangdong Province of PRC). However, at one time, it used high school textbooks that were written by Dong Jiao Zong, the Malaysian Chinese Schools and Teachers Association. As there are not enough Chinese schoolteachers in Cambodia, the Cambodian Chinese community has asked the PRC Government to send Chinese language teachers especially to teach more advanced courses.

Chen notes that the Chinese standard of the Chinese Cambodian students is low as they generally do not speak Chinese at home and the Cambodian language has become their first language. Because of this, Cambodian, rather than Mandarin, has increasingly been used to teach subjects to the students. It should also be noted that Cambodia used to have a half-day school system in which many students attended two schools: a Cambodian school and a Chinese school. However in 2006, before the Cambodia Government changed it to a whole-day system, the Chinese community in Cambodia began to change the Chinese schools into bilingual or even trilingual schools in order to retain the students. They therefore had to strengthen their courses in Cambodian and English in order to survive. In 2007 the Cambodian Government changed the Cambodian school system to a whole-day system, but this did not really affect the number of Duanhua school students. The transformation has apparently been quite successful as Duanhua School has managed to maintain its high student enrolments.

Chen Lieh Fu

(陈烈甫, Chen Liefu, 1908–)
Educator, scholar, Philippines

Chen Lieh Fu is an all-rounder who played many roles in life — educator, writer-author, scholar, columnist, political commentator, fund-raiser, builder, and administrator. He would like to be remembered, however, by the successes of the countless students who graduated from his school and made a name for themselves.

Chen was born in 1908, in Tong'an (同安) in Fujian, China. He finished high school in 1934 in Xiamen in Fujian, China, but his family was too poor to send him to university. Instead he served as an elementary school teacher for three years right after high school graduation. This experience started him off on the path of education. In 1929, Chen passed the competitive exam for a scholarship from Nanjing Central Political University (南京中央政治大学), from which he graduated with a degree in political science. In 1932, Chen headed the fourth ministry in charge of development and economics in Jiangning (江宁) in Jiangsu Province (江苏). He took the National Civil Service Examination, and having passed with excellent results, was promoted to head the Gaoheng Municipality (高淳) in Jiangsu, where he strengthened the treasury, increased agricultural taxes twofold, repaired dikes, controlled water sources to improve farm irrigation, and started its rural newspaper. He was well loved and respected by his constituents. In 1936, Chen received a grant from the Ministry of Education for a scholarship in the United States, where he obtained his masters degree in political science in 1938 from the Illinois State University. He also took up studies in modern history and public administration at this university and these studies later served him well in his research on, and subsequent work in, school administration.

With the outbreak of the Sino-Japanese War, Chen's scholarship grant was terminated. Due to the lack of funds to continue his studies, he transferred to the University of California for a year doing special research. In 1939, he returned home and took up various teaching jobs in Yunnan, Guizhou, and Chongqing, where he served as a trainer for young college graduates. From there, he was accepted at the Sichuan University (四川大学) as a professor, and also served as chairman of the Political Science Department for four years. Chen then became a professor at the Xiamen University (厦门大学) in 1944, where he was also chairman of the Political Science Department. At the time, Xiamen University was chosen as one of the top sixteen most important schools in China. In 1945, after the Japanese surrendered, Xiamen University was moved back from Changting (长汀) to Xiamen City and Chen moved with it. His townmates were elated with his homecoming and elected him to the City Council of Xiamen City where he served for two terms, or four years while continuing to teach at Xiamen University.

In 1947, he went to Lushan (庐山) in Jiangxi (江西) to attend the 2nd Youth Congress, and was elected a representative (干部) of the National Delegation. This Congress was merged with the Kuomintang (国民党) later, and Chen became a member of the National Party. Towards the end of 1948, when the conflict between the Kuomintang Party and the Communist Party escalated and civil war intensified, soldiers and refugees poured into Xiamen. At any time, fifty to sixty thousand soldiers were stationed on the small island. The city was chaotic and citizens were scared. Councilor Chen headed the civilian-military cooperation station to pacify them, restored peace and order, catered to the needs of the military, maintained good relations between the civilian and military, and kept the City generally safe until its liberation.

Because of the chaotic situation and continuing political instability, Chen decided to move to the Philippines through Hong Kong. He arrived in the late 1950s and settled first in Cotabato City in Mindanao, a southern island of the Philippines. He served as the principal of Cotabato Zhonghua High Shool (古岛中华中学) for four years and only in 1954 did he go to Manila and teach for four years at the biggest Chinese high school there, Chiang Kai Shek High School (中正中学), which later became Chiang Kai Shek College (中正学院). In 1957, he went to the southern Visayan island of Cebu where he became the administrator of the Chinese school, Zhongguo Zhongxue (中国中学) and mobilized the Cebu Chinese community to help put up a school building. He also worked to improve teacher training, raise the standard of education, and expand the school with six new buildings. Student numbers rapidly increased to 4,000. In 1963, in response to the changing political and legal environment, with the government adopting Filipinization measures to integrate the local Chinese, Chen convinced his Board of Trustees of the need to change the school's name to "Far Eastern College" (东方学院). He also expanded the college to include courses in secretarial studies, commerce, education, and obtained the permit from the Department of Education to expand the high school into a full-fledged college. He continuously served as president of the College in Cebu City for thirty-two years.

Chen is a scholar and writer as well, having published several hundreds of columns, articles, and academic papers in Chinese-language dailies, journals, and magazines in the Philippines, Hong Kong, and Taiwan. Many of his works touch on the Chinese problem, including concerns about Chinese language education in the Philippines. He has also authored nearly thirty books, all of them in Chinese. Among the important ones notably are: the Filipino People and Culture (菲律宾民族与文化); Philippine History and Philippine-China Relations (菲律宾历史与中菲关系); Philippine System of Civilian Rule; The Huk Rebellion and Social Reforms (菲律宾民治制度，虎克骚乱与社会改革); Southeast Asia Huaqiao, Huaren and Huayi (东南亚洲的华侨华人与华裔); Singapore under Lee Kuan Yew (李光耀治下的新加坡); The Philippines under Marcos (马可仕治下的菲律宾); Corazon Cojuangco Aquino — first female President in Southeast Asia (东南亚第一位女总统); Modern Chinese History (中国近代史); Western Modern History (西洋近代

His wife was Co Bit Dian and they have four children, two sons and two daughters, who are all professionals and live in the United States at present.

Chen Su Lan

(陈树南, Chen Shunan, 1885–1972)
Physician, anti-opium activist, Singapore

Chen Su Lan was a physician, anti-opium activist, founder of the Chinese YMCA, and philanthropist.

Chen was born in 1885 in Fuzhou, the younger of two sons of Chen Hui Mei and Dang Li Meng. At birth, he was named Nen Ya. His father died when he was very young and his mother, who was a nurse trained by Methodist missionaries, fled to the countryside when a foreign gunboat approached Fuzhou. The young Chen studied Chinese classics and sat for the Xiu Cai (秀才) examinations at the age of sixteen and thereafter enrolled in the Anglo-Chinese College in Fuzhou headed then by John Gowdy (1869–1963). In 1905, at the age of twenty, Chen left for Singapore to study medicine at the newly-established King Edward VII College of Medicine.

He was a brilliant student and a keen sportsman who excelled in tennis. When he graduated in 1910, he not only emerged as the top student of the first batch of students, but also topped his class in every subject except pathology, winning the Lim Boon Keng gold medal materia medica in the process. Instead of returning to Fuzhou, Chen decided to remain in Singapore, and established a medical practice in South Bridge Road. He offered his expertise and time to various local medical organizations, such as the Tan Tock Seng Hospital Management Committee (1935), the Central Midwives Board (1923), and the King Edward VII College of Medicine Council (1926–40). He also founded the Alumni Association of the King Edward VII College of Medicine in 1923 and was made president emeritus in 1952. Chen also served as president of the Malayan Branch of the British Medical Association (1949–50).

Immediately after graduation, he plunged headlong into local affairs and joined the Singapore Anti-Opium Society that had been established in 1906 by Drs Lim Boon Keng and Yin Suat Chuan (S.C. Yin). In 1911 Chen also became president of the United Chinese Library, which had been established by Sun Yat-sen in 1910. Despite his young age, he was held in the highest esteem. When S.C. Yin could not preside over the annual general meeting of the Anti-Opium Society in 1912, it was Chen who stood in. By campaigning so ferociously against opium, Chen risked being deported by the British colonial government which had legalized opium use and had a monopoly on the supply of opium. It was only after World War II that opium was finally outlawed.

In 1929 Chen became president of the Anti-Opium Society and, in that capacity, established the Anti-Opium Clinic in 1933. He served as its voluntary director and was successful in treating some 7,000 opium addicts, many of whom claim to have been cured within a few weeks of their admission. This clinic shut down in 1937 when the Japanese invaded China, and donations to the clinic were diverted to the China Relief Fund. In his continuing efforts to understand opium addiction and find its cure better, Chen became one of the world's leading authorities on opium addiction. From 1931–34, he served on the Standing Advisory Committee on Opium of Malaya.

Chen also campaigned against the widespread prostitution of the period 1928–31, and succeeded in getting the government to close down public brothels. He was also concerned about the scourge of tuberculosis, and his agitation and advocacy led to the establishment of the Rotary Anti-tuberculosis Clinic and the Singapore Anti-tuberculosis Association. He was a tireless social reformer and was a well known and respected public figure.

When the Japanese invaded Singapore in 1942, Chen tried fleeing the island. On 13 February 1942, just two days before the British surrendered, Chen left Singapore on one of the last ships leaving the island. The ship was attacked and Chen found himself and others floating in the sea, clinging onto a raft. They managed to make their way to a mangrove forest and were rescued the following day by a passing boatman who heard their cries for help. When they returned to Singapore, Chen was detained by the Japanese military police or Kempeitai. He was later released when the Japanese could not bring any charges against him. These wartime experiences were described in his book, Remember Pompong and Oxley Rise, which he published in 1969. These experiences also led to his establishing the Chen Su Lan Trust to undertake charitable work.

After the war, Chen was appointed to Governor Sir Franklin Gimson's Advisory Council. Using this as a platform, he raised social issues and problems resulting from the Japanese Occupation, but soon tired of the "speech-making", preferring action on the ground instead.

Chen was a third-generation Methodist and a staunchly religious man. He was active in the Fuzhou Methodist Church and represented it as a delegate at the Quadrennial Conference of Methodists in the United States in 1928. After he graduated from medical school, he joined the fledgling Chinese Young Men's Christian Association (CYMCA), established in 1907, and became its president in 1911. However this organization did not survive long and nothing was heard of it after 1913.

After the war, and seeing the problems of displaced and demoralized youths in Singapore, Chen tried to revive the Chinese YMCA. Together with a group of leaders from the Methodist, Presbyterian, and Anglican churches, he established the Chinese YMCA (later called the Metropolitan YMCA) anew in 1945 and served as its founding chairman. Responding to charges that he was being racist in having only Chinese in his organization, Chen argued that the YMCA did not sufficiently concern itself with youth whose main lingua franca was Chinese and, as such, did not attract these youths into its excellent programmes. He remained chairman till 1948 and then handed over his responsibilities to a board of directors. However, he was recalled in 1954 to help save the organization from bankruptcy. It had incurred a debt of M$370,000 in building its new headquarters in Palmer Road. Chen raised a loan and completed the building and continued serving as president for a decade till his retirement from the post in 1964. When he stepped down, he left the Chinese YMCA with a healthy surplus of M$81,000.

In 1947, Chen started the Chen Su Lan Trust to provide Christian organizations with funding for charitable and philanthropic work. He established this fund with $500,000 from his own pocket and its beneficiaries included the Scripture Union, as well as a children's home — the Chen Su Lan Methodist Children's Home (1968). Chen's public service extended to the Rotary Club (of which he was a director for many years and vice-president three times), as well as the Courts of the University of Malaya and then the University of Singapore. For his public service, he was conferred an honorary doctor of laws degree by the University of Singapore in 1952, and granted honorary membership of the Singapore Medical Association in 1968.

Chen died on 5 May 1972 after a long illness. He was survived by his seven children. In 2005, during the centennial celebrations of the National University of Singapore, the Chen Su Lan Trust donated S$2.5 million to the university to establish the Chen Su Lan Centennial Professorship of Medical Ethics.

Chen Wen Hsi

Artist, art educationist, Singapore

Dr Chen Wen Hsi, renowned for his avant-garde Chinese paintings and for influencing the early Chinese artists in Singapore, is an outstanding art educationist and pioneer in the development of the Singapore art scene. He was proficient in both traditional Chinese ink and Western oil painting, and experimented with a variety of styles ranging from Fauvism to Cubism. Chen was also one of the pioneers of the "Nanyang Style" which is unique in world art history. His works are locally and internationally acclaimed. In fact, it is not possible to talk about art in Singapore without first mentioning Chen Wen Hsi.

Chen was born in Jieyang, Guangdong province in China on 9 September 1906. Born in a family of scholars, Chen was interested in art at a young age and aspired to become an artist after graduation from secondary school. He attended the Shanghai College of Fine Arts in 1928 and subsequently enrolled in the Xinhua Art Academy in Shanghai. He learned art from famous artists such as Wang Geyi and Pan Tianshou, and was trained in both eastern and western art. It was also at Xinhua that he became acquainted with Chen Jen Hao, Chen Chong Swee, and Liu Kang, all of whom were to become Singapore's pioneer artists. The prosperity of Shanghai did not derail Chen from his love in art. Conversely, he worked very hard in his art education and established a firm foundation in eastern and western art.

From the start Chen was an artist with a wide repertoire. In his book, Fifty Years in Art, Chen recalled his artistic training in Shanghai. In addition to learning the styles and brush strokes of his teachers, he continued to research on the characteristics of other art forms, which included eastern and western art, aboriginal art in Southeast Asia, and folk art. He focused his research on lines in eastern art, and the parabola and trigonometry in western art; his hard work resulted in breakthroughs in content and style. As he put it, "My Chinese paintings are especially influenced by Western art. I am no longer restricted to the rules in setting the tableau by ancient artists. I focused on the theories in composition in Western art, for example principles in harmony, contrast, symmetry, rhythm, balance. In composition of modern art, 'top-heavy' and 'light-bottom' is considered aesthetically pleasing as the impact of the 'pressure' created allows livelier displays. I often applied this composition technique to Chinese paintings and the effects are very good." By taking nutrients from various genres of art, challenging tradition and integrating and complementing eastern and western art, Chen is able to invent his own unique artistic style.

Chen's paintings clearly demonstrate his personal style: merging of the east and the west; absorbing the essence from tradition; using the strength of some techniques to make up for the shortcomings of others; paying attention to the use of plastic arts, and the intermittent line. Chen's oil works are fundamentally realistic in style, injected with elements in the Impressionistic, Fauvist, and Cubist styles, and leading towards abstraction which displays a strong sense of simplicity. In his works, we can see that he uses the "nature" in everyday life and gradually injects a richer sense of subjective feelings. From complexity and the figural to simplicity and subtlety, he brings nature to a higher level. In terms of colour, his paintings demonstrate the unity of a variety of colours with a strong rhythm that leaves a strong visual impression. Chen is a master in the explicit and bold use of colours through observation of the surface structure of objects, which results in producing hues that are clear, transparent, and with a strong contrast. His works display the harmony of nature, and allow the reader to expand his/her artistic imagination beyond limits. His attentiveness in the modelling of the imagery and the holistic composition of the dot, the line and the plane is characteristic of the traditional style as well as the modern style. Chen's paintings are the products of traditional Chinese freehand brushwork and the Western modernist school.

After graduation in Shanghai in 1932, he taught fine arts in various secondary schools and colleges in Shantou. He also founded the Chun Yang Painting Society there. Leaving China in 1947, he travelled to Vietnam, Thailand, and Malaysia before arriving and settling in Singapore in 1948. For the many years that he lived in Singapore Chen taught art most of the time. He was an art teacher in Singapore Chinese High and a lecturer in the Nanyang Fine Arts College (currently the Nanyang Academy of Fine Arts). He was also a permanent member of many professional art bodies such as The Society of Chinese Artists and The Art Society. Over the years, Chen held more than thirty personal exhibitions in more than a dozen European and Asian countries and was very well known locally and internationally. In 1937, he received the recognition and praise of Chinese painter Xu Beihong at the second Chinese National Art Exhibition in Nanjing. The same year, an English arts magazine elected him one of contemporary China's ten greatest artists.

Chen is also best remembered for his works on the theme of gibbons. In the late 1940s he bought a white-faced gibbon from a local pet shop shortly after he arrived in Singapore. Rearing this in his home garden gave him immense opportunities to study the creature's postures and its characteristics day and night. Some of his favourite works on gibbons have been printed on stamps by the Singapore Government.

In 1952, Chen Wen Hsi and three other Singaporean artists — Liu Kang, Chen Chong Swee, and Cheong Soo Pieng — looked for inspiration in still life painting on the popular tourist island of Bali in Indonesia. The journey to Bali was catalytic in the development of their artistic ideologies and artistic practices. A year after their return, they organized a joint exhibition entitled, "Works from Bali", that shook the local art fraternity, and so began the "Nanyang Style" in painting. As one of the inventors of the "Nanyang Style", many of Chen's oil paintings focus on the lives of the people in various areas in "Nanyang" (Regions south of China, especially Southeast Asia). His animal and bird paintings are also filled with activities of life in a southern world that is tropical and sunny.

In 1964, Chen was awarded the Public Service Star by Tun Yusof Bin Ishak, the first president of Singapore. In 1975, he became the first local artist to be conferred the honorary degree of Doctor of Letters by the University of Singapore. He was also awarded the Gold Medal by the National Museum of History in Taiwan in 1980 and the 1st ASEAN Cultural and Communication Award in 1987. One year after his death, on 17 September 1991, Chen was awarded a posthumous Meritorious Public Service Medal.

There are many areas that fellow artists can learn from Chen. There are other artists like him who work very hard and have a career in art that spanned half a century. However, there are not many who would always demand a breakthrough in expression, unlike Chen. In his years of creating art, Chen never stopped the search for new forms of creation and expression. Equally valuable to the art community at large is Chen's contribution as an art educator. While he is internationally known for being one of the pioneers of "Nanyang Style", he committed more energy, time, and passion in training younger generations of artists and helped Singapore in nurturing many talents in art. As a pioneer in the Singapore art scene, his contributions and influence in art education are not to be forgotten.

Cheng Ching Chuan, Johnny

(庄清泉, Zhuang Qingquan, 1926–89)
Business leader, banker, philanthropist, Philippines

Johnny Cheng Ching Chuan was a prominent Chinese community leader in the Philippines, who was also an entrepreneur, banker, and industrialist, actively involved in different aspects of the Chinese-Filipino community, especially in the education of youth and community service. He served as president of the biggest community organizations, and also offered his service to the government as a representative of the Philippine Department of Trade and Industry to Hong Kong.

Cheng was born on 12 November 1926 in Qingyang (青阳) in Jinjiang Municipal, Fujian Province, China, and followed his father to the Philippines at the age of thirteen. His father, Cheng Chai Lun (庄材润), was a renowned business trailblazer in the Chinese-Filipino community who pioneered the cigarette manufacturing business before the Pacific War and became financially successful at an early age. His grandfather was Cheng Wang Ming (庄汪明), a village leader in Qingyang. Cheng pursued his secondary school education in the Philippines while helping out in the family business at the same time. His schooling was disrupted by the Japanese Occupation and he then participated actively in anti-Japanese activities of youth organizations.

In 1945, after liberation, the Cheng family rebuilt its businesses, especially the cigar and cigarette manufacturing business. In 1951, when former President Elpidio Quirino issued a decree banning the import of cigarettes, the Chengs brought in new machines from the United States and built one of the biggest cigarette factories in the nation, La Perla Cigar and Cigarette Factory, which started manufacturing cigarettes on a big scale and was renowned for the "Fighter" brand of cigarettes. This created employment for a vast number of jobless people after the war. In the 1950s, a third of the population of twenty million was believed to have used the tobacco products of the La Perla Factory.

Cheng's father, Cheng Chai Lun, was already a prominent and influential leader of the Chinese community at the time. He was the manager of the Hua Nan Cigarette Factory and vice-chairman of a Chinese owned private bank, the Equitable Banking Corporation. He also started to expand their businesses overseas while being more involved in philanthropic activities as a leader of various Chinese organizations, such as being president of the Tobacco Manufacturers Association of the Philippines, vice-president of the Federation of Filipino-Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry, vice-chairman of the Pasay Chung Hua School, chairman of the Qingyang Xiao Guang Elementary School, etc.

The senior Cheng was prepared to hand the management of the family business over to his son since the early 50s, and when he died in 1957, the Cheng family had already gained great prominence within the community, as well as in the country. Cheng took over at the helm and started to expand the business, extending it to even Hong Kong and Taiwan. He spearheaded the setting up of the Cheng Chai Lun Memorial Trust Fund as a vehicle to give something back to society. Cheng himself took charge of, and managed the trust fund to support scholarships for indigent, but deserving students, as well as long-term charity projects in support of Chinese organizations and schools, and especially Chinese-language education. The most notable project was the building of the Cheng Chai Lun Memorial Hospital in 1961, which housed a charity wing for indigent patients. Most Chinese organizations gave Cheng honorary positions out of respect for his accomplishments, and in gratitude for his generosity and continued support.

The profitable business of the La Perla Factory boosted Cheng's confidence to venture into many other lines of business. Together with his cousins, Chung Tiong

Tai and Chung Kiat Hua, he expanded their businesses and consolidated them into the Ching Ban Yak Group of Companies. The Group later invested in the Philippine Bank of Communications, the Far East Investment Co., Central Apollo Steel Factory, Philippine Nanhua Cigarette Co., and other lines of business such as textile, lumber, real estate, hotel and tourism, insurance, and import and export. In Hong Kong, the Group invested in real estate and owned several big commercial and residential buildings. They were also investors in Hong Kong's International Steel Corp., and in banking and finance.

In the 1960s, Cheng responded to Taiwan's call for foreign investments. He first established the President Hotel, one of the earliest modern hotels in Taipei, built while Taiwan was just developing its economy. The hotel was a pioneer in the tourism business and preceded many of the other modern Taiwan hotels by as much as twenty years. Cheng likewise invested in the Huaqiao Trust and Investment Corporation, and the United Overseas Chinese Bank, along with other Chinese businessmen from the Philippines. He owned 14 per cent out of the total 27 per cent equity held by the Philippine Chinese in the said bank.

In the late 1970s, Cheng took over the management of Huaqiao Trust and Investment Corporation. In 1982, the Philippine Government, in recognition of his business, banking, and management connections, experience, and expertise, appointed Cheng as a special assistant and representative of the Philippine Department of Trade and Industry to Hong Kong. He was then vice-president of the Federation of Filipino-Chinese Chambers of Commerce, and was tasked with the responsibility of enticing investors to the Philippines, especially for the manufacturing industry and infrastructure development. He succeeded in this responsibility and helped the Philippine consular office in Hong Kong to process investors' applications. His integrity was so established that these investors sometimes even trusted the remittance of foreign capital to him for the purpose of their investments in the Philippines.

The energy crisis in the mid-1980s, which caused a world economic slowdown, hit Cheng badly. The Huaqiao Corporation failed and was closed down in 1985. The Taiwan Government sued him for the failure, but he was acquitted two years after the case was filed against him. His Hong Kong banks and investments were likewise badly affected because of the domino effect of the energy crisis on the finance sector. The Taiwan Government even had to come up with an emergency rescue package. Throughout these financial difficulties, Cheng persevered, using his own real estate properties and shares in the United Overseas Chinese Bank to bail him out.

As a Chinese community leader, Cheng was looked up to with respect by the local Chinese. He became president of the Cheng Family Association, and was always ready to render his help. Thus in 1985, despite suffering business setbacks, Cheng was elected the sixteenth president of the Federation of Filipino-Chinese Chambers of Commerce. He worked to entice foreign investments into the country, encouraged investments in agricultural pursuits and in modernized farming facilities to improve food production and agricultural exports. Cheng also pushed forward the idea of the integration of Chinese Filipinos into the mainstream society as the only viable solution to the Chinese problem in the Philippines. It was the tenth year after President Marcos allowed easy access to citizenship through administrative means. Cheng exhorted the new citizens to be loyal to the country and to serve the Philippines as citizens, not just in name, but in deed.

Cheng was elected chairman of the Chinese Charitable Association in 1988, a position he would hold for three terms. He united the Board of Trustees and administrators and had them cooperate as one in the financial and administrative management of the Chinese General Hospital, which was celebrating its centennial at that time. He exhorted the community to support this 100-year-old community project. With the help of other community leaders, he worked to expand, professionalize, and modernize the hospital, while supporting the move to build a new Chinese cemetery, as the existing one was already too congested. He also addressed the welfare of Chinese-language school teachers and supported many youth activities.

Cheng died on 15 June 1989. In his lifetime, he had the occasion to meet and deal with all past presidents of the Philippines, from Elpidio Quirino (1948–53), Ramon Magsaysay (1953–57), Carlos P. Garcia (1957–61), and Diosdado Macapagal (1961–65) to Ferdinand Marcos (1965–86) and Corazon C. Aquino (1986–92). He also had dealings with the EDSA People Power Revolution leaders, Chief of Staff General Fidel V. Ramos, and Defense Secretary Juan Ponce Enrile.

Cheng Heng Jem, William

Entrepreneur, philanthropist, Malaysia

Tan Sri William Cheng Heng Jem is a Malaysian entrepreneur who once held the posts of chairman of National Economic Development Committee (Malaysia) and president of the Associated Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry of Malaysia (ACCCIM). He is best known for being the "Steel King" of Malaysia. However, steel only forms one of the interests of his stable of companies known collectively as the Lion Group. Cheng's Lion Group also has interests in retail, agriculture, mining, computer, as well as property development and services. Lion Group owns the Parkson Retail Group, which has departmental stores in Malaysia, China, Indonesia, and Vietnam. However, despite his current wealth and social position, Cheng remains a humble man, mindful of the way he started out in business. He is also a simple man in private. He has three children with his wife, Chelsia Chan, a former actress cum singer in Hong Kong, whom he married in 1981.

Cheng was born in Singapore on 19 March 1943, the second son in the family. His father, Cheng Chwee Huat, hailed from Chaoyang (Guangdong, China). He spent his formative years in Singapore where he attended primary school. He went to Malaysia to attend the Catholic High School in Kuala Lumpur. Cheng's business acumen was apparent from a young age for his first business experience came at the age of ten when he assisted at the Teck Chiang Foundry Company, an iron foundry founded by his father in 1939 in Singapore. He joined his father at the foundry when he completed his formal education.

By the time his father sought to diversify Teck Chiang Foundry in the 1960s, Cheng proved to be a valuable asset to the company. Under the joint efforts of Cheng and his father, the foundry expanded operations to include the production of rubber compounds for retreading tyres, and the manufacture of furniture through Tuck Heng Manufacturing Ltd. and Teck Chiang Manufacturing Ltd. Through these ventures in the production of rubber compounds and furniture, the family business grew and soon expanded to Malaysia in 1956. The expansion was largely due to Cheng's far-sighted business thinking. As he was the second eldest in the family, and could therefore not call the shots, he took the initiative to push himself and the family business forward so as to test both his own limits as well as the company's.

By his own admission in later years, he acknowledged that the family was reluctant to expand the business as rapidly as it did, and Cheng lamented the stresses he and his family members had to endure to reach a consensus on any matter touching on the family business. As a result, he came to the conclusion that if he wanted to flex his entrepreneurial muscle and realize his visionary plans for the company, he would have to do so himself. Being an innovative person with driving ambition, he pushed the family business to expand in other rapidly developing fields of the time.

Due to Cheng's vision for the company, his courage to venture into other fields of manufacturing, and his perseverance, he obtained his big break in 1976 when he acquired an associate stake in Kinta Steel Sdn. Bhd. This granted him a licence and pioneer status from the government to produce steel wire rods. Undeterred by the fact that he had limited financial resources at the time, he decided to take over Kinta Steel. Once he took over, he began to stock up on steel scraps as his business intuition sensed that the price of steel would increase in the near future. His foresight proved to be right when he made a big fortune from steel scraps and soon had more than sufficient funds to expand the company.

This eventually led to the establishment of Lion Metal Manufacturing Sdn. Bhd. in Malaysia, through which Cheng helmed the company's business in manufacturing steel building materials. Not satisfied with this, Cheng foresaw other opportunities for the family business to expand and soon merged Tuck Heng Manufacturing Ltd., Teck Chiang Manufacturing Ltd., Teck Chiang Foundry, and Lion Metal Manufacturing under the Lion (Teck Chiang) Sdn. Bhd. banner.

With the demise of his father in the late 1970s, Cheng grasped the opportunity to take the family business further by expanding operations in Malaysia. This effectively left his elder brother, Cheng Theng Kee, in charge of the Singapore-based operations of company. Cheng's reason for choosing Malaysia as his base of operations was simple — he believed that Malaysia had more opportunity for business developments owing to its larger geographical size. As a result, he began building his business empire in Malaysia in the 1980s and never once has he regretted this decision. Indeed, it proved propitious as he eventually became one of the top entrepreneurs of Malaysia with his Lion Group controlling six other publicly listed companies.

Indeed, Lion (Teck Chiang) Sdn. Bhd. proved to be so successful that it was renamed Lion Corporation Bhd. in 1981 and listed on the Kuala Lumpur Stock Exchange in 1982. A year later, Kinta Steel was listed as Amalgamated Steel Mills Bhd. and later renamed Amsteel Corporation Bhd. in 1994.

This then was how Cheng earned his moniker, "Steel King of Malaysia". He was passionate about the steel business and enjoyed working alongside his workers at the steel factory. Cheng never put on airs, despite gaining immense wealth. Although he knew there was more money to be made if he went into property development, he continued to pay more attention to the production of steel. This was because he held steel to be strategic to the country's development. Cheng's courage and determination to stay in the steel manufacturing business paid off and Lion soon became the number one steel producer in Malaysia. Under his leadership, it grew to include Amsteel, Antara Steel and later Megasteel Sdn. Bhd., which was granted a pioneer status from the government and was exempted from corporate tax for ten years. Cheng fitted out Megasteel, Amsteel, and Antara Steel Mills with state-of-the-art machinery and technology.

The success of Lion Group's forays into steel led Cheng to pursue other opportunities in retail, as evinced by the opening of the Parkson departmental store chain throughout Malaysia. Parkson's success in Malaysia compelled Cheng to take the leap and expand the business further afield. As a result, Lion Group ventured into China in 1992 by opening the first Parkson departmental store in Beijing. This was a highly successful venture and the Lion Group has fifty-two Parkson stores in China to date. This makes Parkson the largest foreign-owned departmental store chain in China.

However, Cheng did suffer setbacks as well, especially during the Asian Financial Crisis of 1997. In its glory days, the Lion Group was among Malaysia's top ten diversified groups, with a hand in nearly every sector of the economy, from property development to financial services. Following the financial crisis of 1997, the group succumbed to huge foreign exchange losses when banks withdrew their lines of credit. At the lowest point of Lion Group's RM10 billion debt woes, several of Cheng's friends advised him to leave his business empire. Instead of doing so, Cheng bravely pressed on and came up with a restructuring plan to save his empire by committing millions of his personal assets to the Lion Group. He succeeded in winning back investors' and bankers' confidence.

Due to his dedication, humility, and hard work, Cheng has achieved much through the Lion Group and has shaped the corporate landscape of Malaysia. In its seventy-five years of business, the Group has always been mindful of its responsibility as a caring corporate citizen, channelling back to society whatever benefits it could. In the last ten years, the Group and its companies have contributed over RM50 million to charity through its two foundations, the Lion Parkson Foundation and the Lion Group Medical Assistance Fund, both initiated by group chairman and CEO, Tan Sri William Cheng, as well as through other charitable programmes.

Cheng was named "Property Man of the Year" by the International Real Estate Federation (FIABCI) Malaysia at its 14th Malaysia Property Award gala dinner on 4 September 2006. He was appointed president of the Associated Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry of Malaysia (ACCCIM), as well as president of the Kuala Lumpur and Selangor Chinese Chamber of Commerce and Industry in 2003. Cheng was conferred the title of Tan Sri by the Government of Malaysia in 1991 for his contributions towards the economy of the country.

Cheong Soo Pieng

Artist, art educator, Singapore

Cheong Soo Pieng was born in 1917, Xiamen, China. With support from his family, Cheong began his art education at the Xiamen Academy of Fine Arts from 1933 to 1935 under teachers such as Lim Hak Tai, who was to play an instrumental role in Cheong's life later. The Xiamen Academy of Fine Arts was a private art academy and a product of the 1919 May Fourth movement, an intellectual, cultural and political movement that rejected traditional Chinese values for a selective adoption of Western science and democracy. The teaching of Western painting, sculpture, design and Chinese ink painting by the Xiamen Academy of Fine Arts manifested the spirit of the May Fourth Movement in adopting Western ideas and art forms, particularly the scientific study of the human anatomy through nude studies, perspective, light and proportions in art.

After graduating in 1935, he furthered his studies at the Xin Hua Academy of Fine Arts, a more prestigious art academy in Shanghai offering a similar art curriculum that offered both an education in both Western and Chinese art forms. His formative years in both these academies would prove critical in Cheong's later artistic development when he arrived in Singapore in 1946 that was influenced by sources from three traditions: Western easel painting conventions, Chinese ink painting pictorial formats and techniques, with local subject matter and materials.

The Sino-Japanese War (1937 to 1945) disrupted Cheong's art education in Shanghai as the Xin Hua Academy of Fine Arts was destroyed by the Japanese air raids. He returned to Xiamen around 1938 and began to teach at Yi Zhong School from 1939 to 1943. The social and political turbulence did not end with the surrender of the Japanese in 1945. The civil war between the Chinese Communist Party and the Kuomintang continued, prompting many intellectuals and artists to leave Xiamen for another place to continue their artistic practice. Cheong was one of them.

It was never an easy decision to leave his family to strike out a new life abroad, especially so for Cheong as his wife was then pregnant with his second son. His decision to settle in Singapore after leaving Xiamen in late 1945 to Hong Kong and then to Singapore in 1946 was in no small part due to Lim Hak Tai, the principal of the Nanyang Academy of Fine Arts (NAFA) founded in 1938. NAFA was first situated at St Thomas Walk, a modest place with only 30 to 40 students. Hak Tai provided Cheong with lodgings and a studio at NAFA before he moved to River Valley Road in the middle of the 1950s to accommodate his wife and two sons who came from Xiamen to join him.

The 1952 Four Artists to Bali exhibition organized by the SAS of the four artists, Chen Chong Swee, Cheong Soo Pieng, Chen Wen Hsi and Liu Kang in 1952 was a watershed in the history of Singapore art. As art historian,

T.K. Sabapathy described, "In 1953, these four artists organised an exhibition titled Four Artists to Bali which was significant, particularly in relation to the depiction of the human figure. It resulted in the creation of figure types which are indelibly linked with the Nanyang Artists and which proved to be influential on other artists."

The success of the Four Artists to Bali exhibition gave Cheong impetus to travel in his search for new visual sources and motifs. Travelling became a mode of practice and sketching an important way in which to capture the immediacy of capturing the atmosphere of a subject through quick drawings aided by the portability and accessibility of a sketch book, pencil and pen when he travelled to Borneo in 1959, and Europe from 1961 to 1963. It was in Europe where he held solo exhibitions in London at the Fost and Reed Gallery, and later in group exhibitions in Glasgow, Dublin, Cologne, Hamburg, Berlin and Munich. Cheong was one of the first Singapore artists to hold solo exhibition abroad in Europe. His sojourn to Europe marked the start of new experimentations in abstraction and his brief abandonment of figuration. His sojourn to Europe brought confidence and prestige to his status as one of the most sought after artist in Singapore. He made one of his most risky decisions in 1961 to leave his lecturing position at NAFA to turn professional as an artist. His ability to focus all his time on his artistic practice was rewarded by public and corporate commissions for his works in the 1960s, a period of public commissions by both private and government bodies.

Experimentations in sculpture explored by Cheong continued with renewed vigour in the late 1960s and 1970s. His experimentations in sculpture started from his student days at the Xiamen Academy of Fine Arts in China in the 1930s where sculpture was taught. His experimentations in distorting the human figure are evident in his sculptures, revealing influences by Piccaso and Henry Moore.The distortions of faces are reminiscent of Picasso while the fluid curves of the body pay homage to Henry Moore. Sculpting was also a way in which Cheong conceived and studied space. The concave depressions and convex elevations make volume and shadows that he would further explore in his pictorial works that attempt to resolve the artistic problem of creating the sense of space on a flat surface. First publically shown at the First and Second Sculpture Exhibition in 1967 and 1969 respectively, his metal reliefs were abstract compositions using everyday materials such as rivets, bottle caps, metal wires and even bicycle bells, breaking new ground in the use of found objects that contemporary artists such as Tang Mun Kit, Tang Da Wu and Lim Poh Teck continued to employ in their art making in the late 1980s. The 1970s for Cheong was also a period of consolidation and reflection as he looked back at his earlier works and re-configured them. He returned to Bali in 1977 in search of new ways to represent Balinese figures with fresh eyes. His lines became thinner and his depiction of figures more lyrical and stylized compared to his earlier depictions of his figures in the 1950s.

Beyond his concerted efforts in creating a new pictorial style, his other equally important contribution to Singapore's art history was his role in nurturing the future well-known Singapore artists. Now established artists like Ng Eng Teng, Seah Kim Joo, Khoo Sui Hoe, Quek Wee Choo, Lin Hsin Hsin, Tay Bak Koi and Thomas Yeo developed under his guidance. Amongst the Nanyang artists that were teaching at NAFA, Cheong had the most influence with students from both sides of the causeway imitating his style. This phenomenon is not surprising as he espoused a bridging of worlds: Between that of the modern and contemporary; Western pictorial conventions, traditional Chinese ink painting and Southeast Asian subject matter; and that of his own outer and inner worlds.

Cheong Soo Pieng died in 1983 just months before his retrospective exhibition at the National Museum Art Gallery was due to open, leaving behind two sons and a daughter. He was planning to hold a major solo exhibition in China, the place of his birth, which never materalized due to his sudden death. Short as his life may be, he was a towering figure in the history of art beyond Singapore. As noted art historian T.K. Sabapathy said, "When the story of art in Singapore is finally told, Cheong Soo Pieng will assume a pre-eminent stature. For that matter, he will emerge as a formative presence in accounts of modern art in Southeast Asia as a whole."

Chia Boon Leong

(谢文龙, Xie Wenlong, 1925–)
Football player, Singapore

Chia Boon Leong is widely considered to be one of the most talented and highly regarded football players ever to represent Singapore. An Olympian in 1948, when he was talent scouted by coaches and officials from China, Chia Boon Leong was a household name in the Asian football world in the immediate post-war years. His active playing career also coincided with the period of Singapore's dominance of the Malaya Cup during the 1950s. Chia competed at every available level and later became a manager and member of the Football Association of Singapore Council.

Born on 1 January 1925 in Singapore, Chia learned his soccer skills in Pasir Panjang, the area where he grew up and first went to school. Although slight in physical build, he was able to capitalize on his speed, exceptional ball skills, and quick tactical brain. He was a young player who was inspired by the exploits of individuals in the Singapore Malaya Cup team in the late 1930s, and encouraged personally by Chua Boon Lay, himself an Olympian in 1936. However his days of schoolboy representation were cut short in 1942, when he was attending Raffles Institution and a representative of the Morrison House team. During the Japanese Occupation, he became a member of the Rovers team that participated in an eight-game league tournament for the Alsagoff Shield. There were charity matches too, with the Rovers defeating the fancied Cosmopolitans while raising funds for the various farming schemes initiated by the Japanese. In almost bizarre circumstances in 1943, together with manager Chua Boon Lay and goalkeeper Chu Chee Seng, Chia was included in a tour party that travelled by rail up to Malaya. Footballers and hockey players combined to participate in what was called the Syonan Goodwill Tour.

Fortunately for Chia he was able to continue playing during the Japanese Occupation and his emergence after the war as one of the most skilful players in Singapore can be attributed to his undoubted natural ability on the ball, his fitness, and agility. He became known as "Twinkletoes" and certainly dazzled and destroyed many defences, not just with his skill on the ball, but with his ability to deliver penetrative passes, particularly to the centre forward at the time, Awang Bakar. He also learned how to deal with aggressive defenders who tried to take advantage of his smaller frame. By guile and speed he made many opponents appear sluggish.

In the period immediately after the war, the Rovers and the Base Ordnance Depot teams benefited from his footballing skills. Chia was recognized as a top class player and earned the opportunity to play a series of tour matches in East Asia and Southeast Asia. He represented Lien Hwa (United Chinese) in 1947 during an exhausting forty-two-day tour of Bangkok, Hong Kong, Shanghai, and Manila. It was during this tour that he played his most memorable match. Lien Hwa defeated local champions Tung Hwa in Shanghai, and Chia won the respect of the fans and players alike on account of his enduring stamina, determination, and selfless industry at both ends of the pitch.The capacity crowd of 12,000 clearly appreciated his accurate passing, his high work-rate and his aggressiveness against bigger opponents.The crowd mobbed the diminutive Chia as he left the pitch. A potentially threatening experience was transformed into a heart-warming burst of delight that was both natural and spontaneous.

Partly as a result of this particular performance, he was selected to represent China at the Olympic Games in 1948. The process of selection, involving trials in Hong Kong, caused friction amongst officials of the Malayan Chinese Amateur Football Association and the Singapore Chinese Football Association (SCFA). Chia and goalkeeper Chu Chee Seng had contravened a rule stating that no player should participate abroad without prior approval. However, when it was recognized that their selection was indeed an honour, no action was taken against them.

The China team met in Singapore before its departure to London. Lee Wai Tong and C.C. Yung were the team officials who kept a paternal eye over the twenty-three-year-old Chia. Yung considered his squad a stronger combination than the China team that had played in the Berlin Olympics in 1936. The players apparently enjoyed their visit to London, which included a tea reception in the presence of the royal family.

The China National Football team lined up against Turkey in Walthamstow for its Olympic debut. Unlike Chua Boon Lay twelve years before, Chia won a place among the eleven players. The game itself was a physical challenge for the Chinese, who lacked experience against the bigger European players. Nevertheless, Chia was praised for his speed and methodical play. It was reported that China played attractively, but found it difficult to match the Turks in terms of their physical approach to the game. China held their opponents to a single goal, but then lost their striker, Chu Wing Keung, through injury. No substitutions were allowed at that time, so China had to fight on with only ten men.The final score line of 4-0 was no disgrace.

Chia continued an illustrious career when he returned to Singapore.The Malaya Cup was resumed in 1948 with a combination of pre-war veterans and new blood. The Singapore team failed to reach the final as it was eclipsed by Negeri Sembilan, but Chia showed his usual industry. In 1949 he suffered from a brief loss of confidence, but bounced back to claim a place in the All-Singapore team — a squad that included British Services players and local players. Chia played a pivotal role in Singapore's successful bid to recapture and then retain the Malaya Cup in 1950, 1951, and 1952.

He was also a member of the side that represented Singapore at the second Asian Games in Manila in 1954 where he impressed his hosts. Later in the year he was voted the best player in Malaya and won a return trip to England as part of a training scheme to gain more exposure to the physical game at Highbury, the home of the Arsenal club. At the end of the 1955 season Chia decided to retire from representative football. He did not wish to continue unless he could maintain the highest standards of play. Instead he devoted time to his family and career as a financial executive with Rediffusion.

However he was not lost to football totally. In 1978 he became manager of the Singapore national team, and later participated in a goodwill tour that took him to the Soviet Union and back again via England, including the Bisham Abbey training establishment near London. In the party was the young Fandi Ahmad. Chia's term as a member of the Football Association of Singapore (FAS) Council coincided with Singapore winning the Malaysia Cup in 1980. During this time, Chia was also chairman of the FAS Welfare Committee.

Chia Boon Leong still cuts a dashing figure today. It is almost impossible to believe that this trim, vital, and good-natured individual, who is invariably modest about his past, remains an important link with a particularly rich period of Singapore's football legacy. In May 2011 he was presented with a medallion to commemorate his appearance at the London Olympic Games. As one of Singapore's 167 acknowledged Olympians since 1936, he has been assigned the number 7 in the chronology created by the association known as Olympians Singapore.

Chiam See Tong

(詹时中, Zhan Shizhong, 1935–)

Politician, teacher, advocate, solicitor, Singapore

Chiam See Tong is well known in Singapore as an opposition party leader and the long-time representative of the Potong Pasir single-member constituency from 1984 to 2011. As leader of the Singapore People's Party (SPP) and the Singapore Democratic Alliance (SDA), as well as the elected representative of his constituency, he was one of only two opposition leaders in the country represented in the Singapore Parliament (1997–2011). The other was the Member of Parliament for Hougang, Low Thia Khiang, the secretary-general of the Workers' Party (WP).

Despite Chiam's ability to retain his seat in parliament and constituency for over twenty years, his political career has been anything but smooth sailing. Prior to entering politics, he had been a secondary school teacher and then a lawyer. Following the completion of his education at the Anglo-Chinese School, he earned a Bachelor of Science degree at Canterbury and Victoria Universities in New Zealand in 1961. After he returned to Southeast Asia at the age twenty-seven, he taught at Mahmud Secondary School in Pahang, Malaysia (1962–63) and then at Cedar Girls' Secondary School in Singapore (1964–72). After teaching for few years he left for Britain to study law between 1972 and 1974.

On returning from his legal studies in Britain in the early 1970s, he embarked on a political career while simultaneously serving as an advocate and solicitor. His foray into politics was unsuccessful at the time. It was not until he changed his tactic of standing in elections as an independent candidate and formed the Singapore Democratic Party (SDP) in 1980 that he managed to attract attention as a contender vis-à-vis the ruling People's Action Party (PAP) candidates.

As an SDP MP, he came into contact with other prominent, more politically experienced opposition figures such as J. B. Jeyaretnam of the Workers' Party (WP). This brought about the discussion of electoral strategy amongst the opposition groups and enabled Chiam to build up a support base with like-minded individuals in the electorate. In forming the SDP and cooperating with the other opposition parties of the time, he not only contributed to the fostering of solidarity amongst the opposition parties, but also managed to carry out first-hand the kind of strategy that would likely yield an electoral victory. Therefore, he abided by the united opposition strategy of not standing in the Anson constituency by-election in 1981, thereby allowing the more experienced Jeyaretnam to win the seat and become Singapore's first opposition Member of Parliament since 1965. Chiam reaped the benefits of his collaboration with the other opposition leaders in the 1984 elections when he contested and won the seat in Potong Pasir against the PAP's Mah Bow Tan.

It was not until the 1988 election that Chiam came into his own in politics. Following Jeyaretnam's dismissal from parliament in 1986 over a financial misdeed, Chiam succeeded in holding on to his constituency and he became the only opposition party Member of Parliament. The opposition, it would seem, took courage from Chiam's re-election to the Potong Pasir constituency for a consecutive term, and renewed its efforts in deploying the by-election strategy in which the opposition parties agreed to contest fewer than half of the seats in parliament. This allowed the PAP to be returned to power on nomination day, thus reassuring Singaporeans of a PAP government. The SDP, under Chiam's leadership, won three seats in the single-member constituencies of Potong Pasir, Bukit Gombak, and Nee Soon Central in the 1991 election. In the same election, Low Thia Khiang of the Workers' Party also won a seat in parliament, bringing the number of opposition seats in parliament to four. The fact that the opposition managed to gain four seats which was its best performance since the 1963 election (when the opposition Barisan Sosialis Party managed to win thirteen out of fifty-one seats) came as a shock to the ruling PAP.

Inspired by its victories in the 1991 election, the SDP recruited Chee Soon Juan and contested against the then Prime Minister Goh Chok Tong in the 1992 Marine Parade group representation constituency. The failure to defeat Goh Chok Tong affected the SDP badly as it led to a rift within the party as tensions grew between Chiam See Tong and Chee Soon Juan. Despite Chiam's attempt to censure Chee's loud claim that he was the target of a political plot by the PAP government when he was sacked by the National University of Singapore for allegedly using his research funds to send his wife's Ph.D. dissertation to the United States, the SDP's central executive committee ignored Chiam's criticism, ousted him as general secretary, and replaced him with Chee. Chiam then took the matter to the Singapore Press Club, for which the SDP tried legal means to strip him of his membership. Outraged by the central executive committee's decision, Chiam and his supporters then left the SDP and formed the Singapore People's Party (SPP) in 1994. The courts refused to countenance Chiam's dismissal from the party and he remained a member of the SDP until the 1997 election in which he contested from his incumbent Potong Pasir seat under the SPP banner after taking over the position of secretary-general from Sin Kek Tong. The 1997 election saw Chiam returning to his Potong Pasir seat for yet another term.

Prior to the general election in 2001, Chiam put together the SPP, National Solidarity Party, Singapore Malay National Organization, and Singapore Justice Party to form the Singapore Democratic Alliance (SDA), of which he is the de facto leader. Once again, Chiam retained his seat in Potong Pasir but only narrowly vis-à-vis the PAP's tactics of "punishing" the constituency by not allowing its public housing blocks to be upgraded which allegedly hindered Chiam from implementing improvement works in his district by delaying official approval for his plans. In the 2006 general election, Chiam's victory in the constituency of Potong Pasir was still a narrow one, albeit better than the one in 2001. This time the PAP had changed tactics in its attempt to woo the voters. Instead of "penalizing" the voters for voting for Chiam, the PAP offered a S$80-million upgrading package for the residents of Potong Pasir if its candidates were to be elected. However, even this offer did not sway the voters of Potong Pasir as Chiam clinched 55.8 per cent of the votes, which was an improvement from the 52.4 per cent he received in the 2001 election.

Given Chiam See Tong's endurance as a Member of Parliament for Potong Pasir in the face of various PAP tactics to woo his supporters, it may be safe to assume he is politically astute. He had been elected by the voters of Potong Pasir for many terms, and he seemed adept at playing the precarious political game in Singapore. In contrast to other notable opposition party leaders in Singapore, Chiam has never been sued by the government for slander or defamation. Unlike Jeyaretnam and Chee Soon Juan, Chiam has not faced politically motivated charges, fines, or efforts to prevent him from taking part in elections. Compared to Jeyaretnam, he was less outspoken against the PAP government and did not seek to confront the leaders of the PAP government. He was also unlike Chee in that he did not vociferously claim that the government was running a smear campaign against him. In fact, one of the hallmarks of Chiam's many years in parliament has been his moderate principles. He did not speak or behave in a way that the PAP government might be deemed antagonistic. It is likely that Chiam was able to hold onto his parliamentary seat because he was moderate and did not seek to oppose the ruling PAP government at every turn. In the 2011 general election, Chiam's wife, Lina Loh, represented him as the SPP candidate in defending the Potong Pasir seat but lost to the PAP candidate, Sitoh Yih Pin, by a very narrow margin of 114 votes (0.72 per cent). However, she was offered a Non-Constituency MP (NCMP) seat in parliament for the high votes that she garnered. In the same election, Chiam himself led a five-member team to contest in the Bishan-Toa Payoh GRC against the PAP five-member team led by then deputy prime minister Wong Kan Seng but was also defeated. The Chiam team (SPP) won 43.07 per cent of the votes against the PAP's 56.93 per cent.

Chiang See Ngoh, Claire

(张齐娥, Zhang Qi'e, 1951–)

Social activist, entrepreneur, author, Singapore

Underneath her feistiness and tenacity, former Nominated Member of Parliament (NMP), Claire Chiang is very much a beautiful woman with a wide understanding of social issues. Her fierce determination in forwarding not just the causes of the less fortunate in society, but that of women as well, has led to her becoming one of the foremost role models for Singaporean women. It has often been written that Claire Chiang is a woman with a strong passion for life, full of intelligence, inner strength, passion for people, and causes.

Her support for women's rights, family life, and the disadvantaged in society stems from her childhood experiences whilst growing up in relative poverty in a shophouse along Race Course Road in Little India. Born on 4 October 1951, her family was so poor that she did not have a bed to herself until she reached adulthood and used to share her room with two brothers and her paternal grandmother. Through this, however, she grew closer to her paternal grandmother who, along with her mother, influenced her early ideas on feminism and womanhood. Also, she effectively enjoyed an upbringing in a multiracial background. While growing up in shared housing with eleven other Hainanese family members, Chiang learnt the importance of living in harmony with everyone, as well as the importance of listening to the views of others. Despite the fact that her father worked as an accountant and her mother did various odd jobs to make ends meet, she was given every available opportunity by her family to develop herself.

As evinced from the conditions of her youth, Chiang came into contact with diversity and adversity and learnt to deal with them. She learnt the importance of being frugal and living sparingly. She also benefited from her parents' wide circle of friends from various backgrounds and walks of life. Despite their poverty, her parents were always giving food to the less well-off and her father offered free professional accounting services when needed.

A key source of inspiration to Chiang was her mother, who was determined to provide her only daughter with every opportunity possible to better herself. Thus, she worked at odd jobs to support her family and saw to it that her daughter had ballet lessons, piano lessons, Chinese dance lessons, and was enrolled in two primary schools simultaneously — Nanhua Chinese and Raffles Girls School — so as to reap the benefits of a bilingual education. Though she was initially resentful of the pressure placed on her, Chiang grew up to be grateful to her mother's vision for her when she achieved her Bachelor of Arts degree in Sociology from the University of Singapore in 1974, a diploma in French from Sorbonne University in France in 1975 and a second class Honours degree in Sociology, with a thesis on the Hainanese in 1977.

Given her childhood experiences of living and interacting with people of different backgrounds and walks of life, Chiang was more mature and more socially aware than most when she graduated from university. As early as 1975, she served society through her position as personal assistant to the cultural counsellor at the French Embassy. By subsequently entering academia in 1978, she sought to promote her ideas of feminism, the roles of women, and how society could be bettered. Between 1978 and 1987, she moved from being a Sociology tutor at the University of Hong Kong to being a tutor at the National University of Singapore. In 1985, she obtained her Master's degree in Philosophy degree (with special focus on Sociology) from the University of Hong Kong, with a thesis on factory women and their work. This interest in women and their lot took another turn when she joined the Association of Women for Action and Research (AWARE) in 1988.

In 1994, she became the human resource director of husband Ho Kwon Ping's Wah Chang/Thai Wah Group of companies. However, it was as the founder and executive director of the Banyan Tree Gallery which retails crafted gifts that she showed her mettle as a business-savvy woman. Her foray into this business, her contacts with regional indigenous local artisans, and the company's successful management of the various Museum shops in Singapore, made the business elite in Singapore pay attention to her, so much so that she became one of the only two women to be given places on the council of the Singapore Chinese Chamber of Commerce and Industry. By October 1997, her business ethics and dedication to women's issue in society earned her the position as one of Singapore's first female NMPs.

Over the years, her career has spanned the fields of academia and business, but never once had she lost sight of bettering society as well as the lot of women in Singapore. She developed and implemented workshops to help police officers treat victims of domestic violence in a more sensitive manner. In addition to heading AWARE, she has also headed the Society Against Family Violence and has been a board member in a number of welfare agencies. Most recently, she deployed her research skills in the publication of an award-winning book, Stepping Out: The Making of Chinese Entrepreneurs (1993), which was subsequently made into a Chinese drama serial in 1999. She was so successful in forwarding women's causes and her career that Her World magazine nominated her Woman of the Year in 1999.

It is hoped that Singaporean women would follow Chiang's example and be undeterred by the glass ceiling existent in most careers. If anything, she has demonstrated that women can pursue both a meaning life for themselves, as well as a meaningful career.

Chien Ho

(Tan Chien Ho, 陈清河, Chen Qinghe, 1906–85)

Forest conservator, timber industry leader, Myanmar

U Chien Ho was reportedly a rare talent who had made his mark and contributed to the Government of British Burma by conserving one of the most important resources of his country — forests. He was chief forestry conservator of Burma, the first locally born Myanmar-Chinese to be so appointed, being the adviser as well as the designer of national plans for the timber industry in Burma. He had also shared forestry knowledge through publications and translations.

U Chien Ho was born on 25 January 1906 in a town called Yamethin, in the Mandalay district, in Central Burma. His maternal great grandfather, U Ah Chu, wore a pigtail, as did subjects of the Qing Dynasty. U Ah Chu left his hometown in Guangdong in 1808 at the age of thirteen, and first landed on the then newly discovered Singapore, called the "Lion City". From Singapore, U Ah Chu went to Burma. He grew up in the Royal Palace of Burma in Ava as a playmate to Prince Mindon. When the prince ascended the throne as King Mindon, U Ah Chu was appointed the royal florist. King Mindon became King Thibaw at the end of the colonial period in 1885. U Chien Ho's father, Tan Sit Yon (U Sit Yong), came from a village near Amoy (Xiamen) in Fujian Province of China. Chien Ho's mother was Daw Kyin Lwan. Tan Sit Yon made his livelihood as a shopkeeper in Yamethin, where the young Chien Ho spent his early school days. A fire reportedly destroyed their shop and home, but that did not stop the youth from graduating with distinction in 1925 from Sein-Lu School in Tounggu town, a city lying midway between Rangoon and Mandalay.

In 1928, at the age of twenty-two, he won the U Shwelay scholarship at the Mandalay National School. He then applied for a government scholarship to attend a chemistry course at Oxford University, but was instead selected for a scholarship by the then chief forest conservator of the British administrator to attend a forestry course at Edinburgh University in the United Kingdom. In 1930, he completed his forestry course with a First Class Merit Certificate & Certificate of Due Performance and, in addition, won the first prize in the forest engineering subject at the university. He returned to serve the country as a first-class government officer, a rare feat during the early days of British Burma. In 1945, he was appointed in the senior civil affairs service (Forests) and held the rank of a major reporting to the chief forest conservator, who was based in Simla, the summer capital of the British Colonial administrator in northern India. He was responsible for overseeing the conservation of teak forests. Teak has been a vital export of Burma.

He was director of the Timber Project Board, and concurrently general manager and chief conservator of Burma Forest from 1948 until his retirement in 1962, a position that was rewarded with a pension that had never before been offered to non-white British subjects.

He worked with many renowned European forest conservators in Burma, such as A.H.M. Barrington, H.R. Blanford, D.P. Hewett, C.W. Scott, D. J. Atkinson, E.S. Hartnoll, R. Unwin, A.R. Villar, R.W.V. Palmer and M.N. Gallant. Gallant was famous for the invention of the M.E.D. Index, the system of calculating revenue for teak wood.

As the leader of Burma's Teak Committee, U Chien Ho was the authority to verify and classify Burmese teak, which was then, and even until today, a highly priced and sought after commodity. U Chien Ho was also involved in other areas. He visited Rome six times to attend the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) conferences as a delegate from Burma. Between 1951 and 1962, he represented his country in international conferences in the Asian Pacific region, such as in Bangkok and Singapore, in Europe, and in the United States. According to his memoirs, his most memorable moment was in 1951, when Rome hosted the 1st FAO Conference. U Chien Ho and 300 participants were officially invited to meet the Pope at Castle Gandolfo, where he was accorded the privilege of shaking hands with the Pope.

In the years following his retirement, he wrote many books with his friends, and did translations. Most of his works focused on the management and protection of Burma's forests, including the award-winning book, Burma Teak, which clinched the National Literature Award in 1965. In 1976, after the Burmese Government nationalized teak and hard wood exports, he became the adviser and designed national plans for the timber industry.

When he was seventy years old, he completed his autobiography, My Life, after having gone on a world tour with the FAO as a Burmese representative. This autobiography, written in Burmese, comprises 332 pages and was completed on 5 September 1977. Among his more than twenty articles and manuscripts are Burmese-translated-into English works, including popular ones such as Our Golden Teak, Forest Management, and Myanmar Teak. He also translated several English articles into Burmese for the Rangoon Arts and Science University, namely "Forest Protection" (R. Unwin), "Forest management" (N.V. Brasnett), "Economics Plantations" (H.E. Hiley), "Silvicultural System" (R.S. Troup), "Some aspects of Silviculture in Burma" and "Local Supply Working Circle" (both by C.W.D. Kermode), and "Local Supply Working Circle" (Tourney & Kermode).

As a Burmese of Chinese descent, U Chien Ho recalled in his autobiography: "We, overseas Chinese, born and brought up in Burma, will surely die in Burma. I myself have Chinese blood but I wear Burmese longyi and Burmese traditional long hair style with yaungtong (turban covered on head). I wear Chinese costume and Chinese pig-tail on my head only once during Chinese Year. As for religion, I am a devout Burmese Buddhist following Burmese traditional worship. I give out 'ang pau' money for children on the auspicious Chinese New Year days and celebrate the auspicious time by inviting Burmese friends to my house for Chinese dinners."

U Chien Ho died on 13 July 1985. He was the son-in-law of Li Boon Tin, the former director (1946–64) of the Oversea-Chinese Banking Corporation Ltd. (Singapore). His wife, Daw Ohn Kyi, was a Hokkien Chinese. They left behind four sons and four daughters.

Chiew Chee Phoong

(丘启枫, Qiu Qifeng, 1940–)

Journalist, educator, Brunei

Chiew Chee Phoong, who was born in 1940 in Kuala Belait, Brunei, is a leading journalist and educator in Southeast Asia.

Chiew owes his success in life to his father's decision to send him to a Chinese school. In 1953 Chiew graduated from Chung Hua School in Kuala Belait, where he was born and raised. Unlike many of his seniors at school, he could not seek entry into famous Chinese schools overseas such as the Chung Ling High School in Penang, or Chung Cheng High School or Chinese High (Huaqiao Zhongxue) in Singapore because his father's retail and sundry shop was not doing well and the family could not afford him that choice. Chiew did not then switch to local mission schools as most of his fellow students did even though this course of action promised better employment prospects in oil companies and with the government. He enrolled instead at Chung Hua School in Miri, Sarawak, and a year later, went to Chung Ching Middle School (中正中学) in Seria, an oil town about ten miles away from his home. He eventually became a leader in the Mandarin-speaking world. Towards the end of 1950s, he often contributed his essays to local Chinese dailies.

After graduating from Chung Ching Middle School, he taught in Pai Yuek School in Bangar of Temburong, which was renowned for its rainforests, but was the most remote and underdeveloped district of Brunei. While in Temburong from January 1960 to August 1961, his dream of pursuing further studies in a university beckoned him from time to time. He, like his contemporaries, wanted very much to seek admission to the Nanyang University of Singapore, then the goal of many students from the Chinese-medium schools in Southeast Asia. Unfortunately for Chiew, his father's shop had closed down with debts yet to be settled. The only way out and forward was to head to Taiwan where he enrolled in Taiwan Normal University, a teacher training institute providing free education for students who qualified as secondary school teachers. During his studies there, he was exposed to a completely Chinese environment, and his passion for Chinese culture, particularly the poems of Tang and Song dynasties, as well as classical literature in general, grew. His mastery of the Chinese language and his learning of Chinese history and literature attained new depth and breadth.

In 1965, Chiew returned to Brunei after graduation. From 1966, he started teaching again and did so for eleven years, initially as a teacher in Chung Ching Middle School, Seria, and then rising to become dean of study and finally principal of Chung Hwa Middle School, Kuala Belait, for three years, ending in 1977.

This was a critical period in the history of Chinese education in Brunei. The British Protectorate gained self-rule under the Constitution of 1959, which was promulgated on 29 September 1959. It then prepared for independence in 1984. A major change made in 1973 nationalized all private schools from 1974, giving them a common syllabus that used Malay as the only medium of instruction; English and Chinese could be taught as a subject. The Chinese community resisted the proposed change vigorously, fearing that the abrupt change would throw the eight Chinese schools into chaos. Thus, a series of meetings was held.

Representatives from all the Chinese schools and associations were invited to attend the meetings chaired by the Chinese leader, Pehin Kapitan China Lim Teck Hoo, at Chung Hwa Middle School in Bandar Seri Begawan. The consensus reached in writing was presented to the government as an appeal for gradual changes to be introduced in stages, starting from the lower secondary and then from senior secondary. Of the three secondary school principals, Chiew was the only one who was local and qualified. While the other expatriate principals felt inhibited to express views on policy matters, Chiew was quite outspoken and made a significant contribution by calling for a compromised solution throughout the state.

However at the height of his teaching career, Chiew's asthmatic condition deteriorated to such an extent that he was advised to quit teaching on medical grounds. While thinking about his next step, he received an offer to work for the Taiwanese Government. At the time Chiew was a stateless person often embarrassed by Immigration officers in various countries asking him why his travelling document was not a passport, but a dubious paper called "Certificate of Identity" issued by a British Protectorate such as Brunei, or a British passport specially endorsed for travelling to a limited number of countries, but not to the United Kingdom for the purpose of residence. Such humiliating experiences drew him closer to Taiwan which he served dutifully for eight years, working in its Brunei Office for Trade and Culture for the first four years, and thereafter in Taipei as its Information Officer attached to the Executive Yuan (Cabinet). However he later realized that bureaucracy was actually incompatible with his inclination for freedom and independence of thought and began another search for new opportunities.

In May 1985, at the age of forty-five, he joined Lianhe Zaobao《联合早报》, the only Chinese daily in Singapore. He was assigned as a Hong Kong correspondent in August 1990, transferred to Beijing as China correspondent two years later until February 1994, when he was named Taipei correspondent. He successfully established the first bureaus for the press in Beijing and Taipei respectively.

Chiew was invited to join the Hong Kong edition of the widely circulated United Daily of Taiwan《联合报》in November 1994. When the daily stopped publication at the end of 1995, the Chinese weekly, Yazhou Zhoukan《亚洲周刊》, quickly hired him as senior editor in February 1996. Four years later, Chiew was promoted to deputy editor-in-chief. In July 2003, he retired to write a book he had long planned, but felt obliged to accept a post to teach journalism at the School of Journalism and Communication, Shantou University (汕头大学), in September 2004. In February 2006, he resigned and returned to Brunei to be with his ageing mother who passed away peacefully in Brunei in 2007 at the age of ninety-four. She was survived by seven daughters and a son.

In 2000, in a lengthy article carried by the then only English daily in Brunei, Borneo Bulletin, he was extolled by the writer as a "world-class journalist from Belait". In his book, Bright Moon Over Thousands of Miles《明月千里》, a selected collection of journalistic writings recently published, the group managing director-cum-editorial superintendent of the Sin Chew Media Group in the foreword compliments Chiew as a "historic chapter in the annals of Southeast Asian journalists". He said that from Chiew, one gets Asian news and views that are closest to history. In another foreword, contributed by his former boss, the editor-in-chief of Yazhou Zhoukan, Chiew was alluded to as one of the many Southeast Asian Chinese who refuse to be psychologically marginalized, and who stay aloof from the Mainland-Taiwan politics, but who perseveres to preserve their identity through adherence to Chinese culture.

Chiew married twice. His first marriage was amicably dissolved, and he took custody of his adopted son. His second wife, M.H. Chang, who is a Taiwanese and school principal, and their daughter now reside in Singapore where she is a citizen.

Chiew has been residing in Brunei since 2006 to serve an English daily, The Brunei Times, as group assistant editor-in-chief, with the special task of launching its Chinese version in due course.

Chin Fung Kee

(陈宏基, Chen Hongji, 1920–90)
Engineer, educationist, Malaysia

Tan Sri Datuk Ir. Professor Dr Chin Fung Kee, JMN, PSM, DMPN, DSc (Belfast), FICE, FIStructE, FIE (Malaysia, Singapore, Ireland), MCIWEM, Hon FICE, Hon DSc (Belfast, Singapore and Glasgow), FWA, is Malaysia's most respected and outstanding civil engineer, not only in the practice of engineering, but also in engineering research and education. He is known for his excellence in geotechnical, structural, and hydraulic engineering. He was a local pioneer engineer who played a key role in the development of engineering education, research and practice in the country. His knowledge and contributions benefited the engineering fraternity both nationally and internationally and his achievements were recognized worldwide.

Chin was born into a goldsmith family, to parents Chin Siew Woon and Chang Nyuk Khim on 27 February 1920 in Nibong Tebal, Penang.

He completed his secondary education at the Bukit Mertajam High School, and was awarded a Straits Settlements Scholarship to study at Raffles College in Singapore where he obtained a First Class Diploma in Arts. He then taught in his old school until he won a Queen's Scholarship in 1949 to study Civil Engineering at the Queen's University of Belfast. In Belfast he won the Foundation Scholarship in Civil Engineering and the Belfast Association of Engineers Prize. In 1952, Chin graduated with First Class Honours in Engineering and proceeded to complete his Master's degree at the same university while working as an assistant lecturer.

Chin returned to Malaya in 1954 and served as an engineer with the Drainage and Irrigation Department before joining the University of Malaya in 1956 as lecturer and went on to be senior lecturer and finally professor. He was acting vice-chancellor for seven years and, for a period, was simultaneously professor and dean of engineering, as well as deputy and acting vice-chancellor.

He retired as professor emeritus in 1973 and joined Jurutera Konsultant (SEA) Sdn. Bhd., where he was responsible for the design and construction of many highway bridges, high-rise buildings, reclamation works, and structures on soft ground.

Chin played a major role in the formation and development of the Faculty of Engineering, University of Malaya. In 1957 after Malaysia's independence, the government decided to set up the University of Malaya in Kuala Lumpur.

With an allocation of RM1.5 million only for the project, the team under Chin went full swing to build the Faculty of Engineering at Pantai Valley. Within a period of four months the engineering buildings were completed and equipment was moved from Singapore to Pantai Valley to enable the first session in engineering to continue in May 1958 without a break.

When he was acting vice-chancellor, Chin was the de facto project director in the planning, design, and construction of many buildings, including the international award winning Faculty of Medicine building.

During his tenure with the Faculty of Engineering, Chin's great achievement, attained through the collective effort of both staff and students, was to produce the first batch of five graduates in 1958 and to build up in a short period of a few years, a degree which attained international recognition. A pass in the engineering degree from the University of Malaya was readily accepted by British universities for postgraduate studies, which normally required a good honours degree.

Chin is remembered for his leading role in the design and construction of the first Penang Bridge and the Komtar building foundation rectification work in Penang and many other projects such as the North-South Expressway.

He was very deeply involved in the planning, design, and construction supervision of the Penang Bridge. The project was bestowed the Grand Award by the Council of Consulting Engineers of Washington in the 1986 U.S. Engineering Excellence Competition. He introduced some innovative design features thus achieving considerable savings in cost and time. In particular, special natural rubber bearings were designed for the project. This has given rise to a new industry and market for the use of natural rubber. The bridge bearings were later further developed into special foundation bearings (base isolators) and used in seismic designs of earthquake-resisting buildings and bridges worldwide.

In 1970 Chin developed the concept of the inverse slope method for predicting pile ultimate bearing capacity, without testing the pile to failure. This method, which can save cost and time during construction, is now internationally known and acknowledged as the "Chin Method" in the piling industry. Arising out of his involvement as an independent consultant in the Komtar building foundation problem in 1977, Chin developed a method of diagnosing the pile condition in the ground. This method has been widely used by practising engineers.

Chin published more than seventy technical and research papers and a book entitled, The Penang Bridge — Planning, Design And Construction. The book, which is the one and only kind giving a first-hand account of all the important aspects of the bridge, is a treasure to Malaysia's national engineering heritage. The Institution of Engineers in Malaysia published a book entitled, Selected Papers of Professor Chin Fung Kee for the ease of reference and benefit of practising engineers.

In 1984 he was awarded the degree of Doctor of Science by his alma mater for his independent research on the hyperbolic behavior of soils and concrete. He was also made Honorary Doctor of Science by the University of Singapore in 1975, the University of Glasgow in 1986 and his alma mater in 1989.

Throughout his professional career Chin was dedicated to public service. He served as an honorary consultant to the Malaysian Government on numerous engineering problems and projects. He was a member of several commissions and committees set up by the Malaysian Government to administer, study, and investigate various matters pertaining to engineering.

Chin was chairman of the governing council of the National Institute for Scientific and Industrial Research of Malaysia; a member of three Royal Commissions; a member of the National UNESCO Commission, Malaysia, and a member of the Coordinating Advisory Committee, Malaysia Rubber Research and Development Board. In 1988, The National Council of Scientific Research and Development Malaysia presented him with the National Science Award.

In recognition of his contributions he was conferred the honour of Johan Mangku Negara in 1967, the Panglima Setia Mahkota (which carries the title "Tan Sri") in 1980, and Darjah Yang Mulia Pangkuan Negeri Pulau Pinang (which carries the title of "Datuk") in 1985.

His successes earned him widespread reputation and recognition. He was an Honorary Fellow of both the Institution of Civil Engineers, UK and The Institution of Engineers, Malaysia (IEM), of which he was a founder council member in 1959, and president from 1966 to 1968. He was also president of the Southeast Asian Geotechnical Society from 1973 to 1975 and the vice-president for Asia of the International Society for Soil Mechanics and Foundation Engineering from 1981 to 1985. He was chairman of the Commonwealth Engineer's Council from 1973–77.

Chin passed away on 29 August 1990 after a short illness. He is survived by his wife, Wong Swee Yong, a daughter, Kathleen Chin Kie Fong, and three sons, Dr Alan Chin Kie Loong, Dr Ian Chin Kie Cheng, and Peter Chin Kie Siew.

In memory of Chin's achievements and contributions, several lectures and awards have been named after him. The Southeast Asian Geotechnical Society established a Professor Chin Fung Kee Lecture to be delivered at every Society Conference held once every three years in Southeast Asia. The Engineering Alumni Association of the University of Malaya in Malaysia set up and funded the Professor Chin Fung Kee Memorial Lecture. His former students provided the fund for the "Tan Sri Professor Chin Fung Kee Prize" for the top student in the master's programme in Geotechnical and Geo-environmental Engineering at the Asian Institute of Technology in Bangkok. The Tunku Abdul Rahman College established the "Professor Chin Fung Kee Memorial Prize" for the best student in the Final Year Advanced Diploma in Technology (Building) Examination. The University of Malaya set up the Professor Chin Fung Kee Gold Medal Award for the best engineering student in the final year examination.

In honour of Chin's achievements and contributions, the IEM named the auditorium in the new IEM Building after Chin in 2009 and in 2010 the Penang State Government decided that a new road would be named after him.

Chin was a humble man, a role model, a teacher, and a friend to the many who have been fortunate to know him and work with him. He was a man of principles and integrity who dedicated his life to excellence, and his services to the engineering profession and society at large. He is remembered as one of the great engineers who had excelled in engineering practice, research, and education.

Chin Peng

(陈平, Chen Ping; real name: Ong Boon Hua, 王文华, Wang Wenhua, 1924–)
Communist, guerrilla leader, Malaysia

Ong Boon Hua, alias Chin Peng, was for forty-two years the secretary general of the clandestine Communist Party of Malaya (CPM), whose armed struggle against British rule hastened the achievement of Malaya's national independence in 1957.

Although much of his life and leadership of the party remained shrouded in secrecy for about three decades until his memoirs, My Side of History, were published in 2003, he is best known for his wartime (1942–45) exploits as a guerrilla leader. His role as a national liberation fighter, however, remains controversial within Malaysia today.

At the end of World War II, Chin Peng's heroic role as an anti-Japanese resistance leader was highlighted in Spencer Chapman's account, The Jungle Is Neutral (1952), in which he is portrayed as the key link between the resistance movement in Malaya and the British armed forces based in Kandy, Ceylon (now Sri Lanka).

Post-war newspapers called him "Britain's most trusted man". For his wartime services he was awarded two military medals and an Order of the British Empire (OBE), which was revoked when the CPM took up arms against British rule in June 1948.

Born in Kampong Koh, in the southern township of Sitiawan, which lies in the state of Perak in peninsular Malaysia, on 21 October 1924, (which accordingly entitled him to Malayan and later Malaysian citizenship), he became a communist at the young age of fifteen after joining the underground CPM.

In the interwar period it took great intellectual and moral courage to join the banned CPM as once its members' identities became known, the British police hunted them down.

He adopted the alias "Chin Peng" (a name by which he is best known in the country) because all secret cell members were required to conceal their true identities from the police. He found the communist ideology attractive as it stood for social justice, the elimination of poverty, a new classless world order, and the end of imperialism.

Chin Peng rose to become the party's secretary general, its highest-ranking post, at the age of twenty-three after ousting Lai Tek, his predecessor.

His father was born in Fuchow, the capital of China's Fujian province, and emigrated to Singapore where he met and married Chin Peng's mother. They belonged to the Heng Hua clan associated with the hardware trade. They then moved to Sitiawan where they ran a bicycle business.

The second of eleven children, Chin Peng studied at the Hua Chiao (Overseas Chinese) Primary School in Sitiawan, and later briefly attended a secondary school, the Anglo-Chinese Continuation School. While there, the police discovered his communist activities and he disappeared underground to evade arrest.

Within the movement he worked first in 1940 as a probationary member, in charge of members in the Sitiawan district, was then transferred to Ipoh, the capital of Perak state, to do propaganda work, and subsequently appointed the party's state secretary in 1942, the year he married a party comrade, Lee Khoon Wah, who was from Penang state. They have three children.

In 1941, at the outbreak of World War II, which saw the Japanese Army's occupation of Malaya, the CPM had concluded a pact of cooperation with the British administration, which accepted the party's offer of help in the form of volunteers to fight the Japanese.

This led to official recognition of the CPM and to the formation of several detachments of the party's guerrilla force, the Malayan People's Anti-Japanese Army (Malaiya renmin kang ri jun), the first batch of which was sent out on January 10, 1942 to operate behind the Japanese enemy lines.

In Perak Chin Peng was responsible for establishing communication and supplies lines between the urban areas and the guerrilla forces in the jungle camps. He was the liaison officer who arranged meetings between the British special operations group, Force 136 led by John Davis, and top party officials in the Blantan highlands in 1943 and 1945, to discuss the airdrop of money and arms to the guerrilla groups.

At the end of the war, in recognition of his wartime services, Chin Peng was awarded a military medal at the steps of the City Hall in Singapore and later invited to attend a victory parade in London where he received a second medal.

In 1947 the party's central committee purged its secretary general, Lai Tek, after Chin Peng and another committee member, Yeung Kuo, had exposed him as a British agent. Chin Peng was elected to replace him, and the party began to adopt a "militant" line against the British administration. After ousting Lai Tek, Chin Peng had all along suspected that it was British Police Special Branch officer Innes Tremlett who had planted Lai Tek in the party, but he recently discovered to his dismay from the published biography of John Davis, his close friend in Force 136, that it was Davis who was actually Lai Tek's spy master. A source close to him revealed to me that he felt "very bitter and deeply betrayed", having himself written a foreword to the biography written by Margaret Shennan.

Despite British intelligence failing dismally to uncover the secret that the party was planning an insurrection, the British administration unknowingly seized a psychological advantage by declaring an emergency in Malaya in June 1948, in the wake of widespread labour unrest, including murders of white planters on rubber estates, which it blamed on unlawful elements of the CPM.

The party, feeling that constitutional struggle was made impossible by the emergency restrictions, called on its disbanded former guerrillas to rise up and rearm for national independence and end British rule in Malaya. The British put up a reward of $250,000 (Straits dollars) on Chin Peng's head.

The Malayan Emergency lasted from 1948 to 1960, in the midst of which Malaya secured independence on 31 August 1957. In December 1955, Chin Peng and two CPM leaders, Rashid Maidin and Chen Tien, attended "peace talks" in Baling (a town in Kedah state) with Tunku Abdul Rahman, Malaya's chief minister (better known as "The Tunku"), David Marshall, Singapore's chief minister, and Tun Tan Cheng Lock, the Malayan Chinese Association (MCA) leader.

The two chief ministers had been voted into office in recent general elections in their respective states as part of Britain's decolonization programme to grant self-government in an effort to combat communism and hasten the end of the Malayan Emergency.

At the Baling talks, Chin Peng rejected the offer of amnesty when he failed to secure legal recognition for the CPM, and refused to accept the condition that the police screen his guerrillas when they laid down their arms.

However, he made the surprising offer that the party would cease hostilities and lay down its arms, if the Tunku secured the powers of internal security and defence in his talks on Malaya's independence with the British Government in London.

This offer was given wide publicity in the local and foreign press. It strengthened the Tunku's bargaining position in the London talks, which allowed him to win Malaya's independence. "The Tunku capitalized on my pledge and gained considerably by this," claims Chin Peng in his memoirs. "My Baling pledge had been given in good faith and on the understanding that there would be a second round of peace negotiations from where we could proceed further."

After independence, however, the Tunku refused to hold a second round of talks. In 1960 the Tunku's Alliance government ended the Malayan Emergency, after Chin Peng and his guerrillas had retreated to the Malayan-Thai border.

An ailing Chin Peng left for Beijing to recuperate and reorganize the party's struggle. He remained in Beijing for twenty-nine years and did not return to the border again until 1989 to bring the CPM's armed struggle to a close after negotiating an agreement with the Malaysian and the Thai Governments.

Since 1989, public controversy has swirled over the party's role and its real contribution to the achievement of Malaya's independence in 1957. Some people have argued that while the party's struggle for independence was valid up to 1957, its continuation thereafter against the popularly elected governments of Malaya and Singapore is difficult to justify.

Nevertheless, the Tunku in his memoirs, Lest We Forget (1983), acknowledged the communists' role in the struggle for independence: "Just as Indonesia was fighting a bloody battle, so were the communists of Malaya, who, too, fought for independence."

His application to return to Malaysia to launch his memoirs in September 2003 was rejected by the Malaysian Home Affairs Ministry. Chin Peng earnestly desired to return to Malaysia, as permitted in the peace treaty. He challenged the government's ban in the High Court, but was unsuccessful and he was refused leave to appeal to the higher Federal Court. Singapore, however, allowed him to make a brief visit from 6–8 October 2004 to speak at the Institute of Southeast Asian Studies (ISEAS). Shortly after the ISEAS visit, he was invited to visit Singapore a second time when he met Singapore's former prime ministers, Lee Kuan Yew and Goh Chok Tong.

Chin Peng in his memoirs has described himself as a nationalist and freedom fighter. He has taken responsibility for the thousands of lives lost and sacrificed in the cause of the communist struggle. "This was inevitable," he said, in an interview with me in Canberra in 1998, "it was a war for national independence. But if it had not been for our armed struggle, it is unlikely that Britain would have expedited the granting of Malayan independence."

Chin Poy Wu, Henry

(陈沛武, Chen Peiwu, 1937–)

Police commissioner, businessman, company director, Malaysia

Although Henry Chin Poy Wu presently serves as an independent non-executive director, chairman of audit committee, member of nomination committee, and member of remuneration committee of Glenealy Plantations Malaya Berhad, and is associated with other corporate posts in many other industries in Malaysia, he is best remembered as the indefatigable commissioner of police in Kuala Lumpur who reduced crime in the Malaysian capital.

Chin was born on 11 August 1937 in Kuching, Sarawak, which was then part of Borneo. He and his younger brother, Chin Poy Siong, were brought up in Kota Kinabalu, Sabah, by their mother, Xie Xia Yu, a kindergarten headmistress who was widowed at the age of forty-four. Xie was conferred the title of "Datuk" in 1986 after her son, Henry Chin, had been given the title. Likewise, Chin's young brother, Chin Poy Siong, was also granted the title of "Datuk" in 1987. Henry Chin Poy Wu has two children. His elder son married in August 1992.

After completing his Senior Cambridge level at school, Chin joined the police force. Records state that he joined the Northern Borneo Police Force as a probationary inspector on 14 July 1955. In the course of his long career in the police force, he served in various key positions throughout Malaysia, specifically Kota Kinabalu, Sandakan, Tawau, and Keningau in Sabah, as well as other high ranking posts in Perak, Johor, and Kuala Lumpur. He rose steadily through the ranks.

On 3 July 1961, he was made senior inspector of investigation at Sabah Police Headquarters. He was then promoted to head of the Kota Kinabalu District Police on 31 August 1965 and head of Perak State Criminal Investigation on 4 July 1979. Two and half years later (on 4 January 1982), he rose to the position of head of the Johor State Criminal Investigation.

A crowning moment of his career in the police force came when he was promoted to deputy commissioner, and this was subsequently topped by his being made commissioner of police in Kuala Lumpur on 22 June 1990. It was a post he held until his retirement in August 1993. Chin's appointment as commissioner of police in Kuala Lumpur was particularly significant as he was the first ethnic Chinese to hold that post in Malaysia. This fact was made more significant in light of Malaysia's pro-Bumiputra policies which favour ethnic Malays.

During his term of service as police commissioner of Kuala Lumpur, Chin significantly reduced the crime rate in the Malaysian capital. In turn, this earned him the respect and admiration of his colleagues and the public. The Malaysian press likewise lauded his achievements in reducing the crime rate in Kuala Lumpur. This may be attributed to Chin's cultivation of a public image of being responsible, efficient, fair, enthusiastic, approachable, and friendly. Because of this, he was a highly popular police commissioner. His popularity meant that there was a widespread appeal for him to stay in his post when he was due to retire in August 1992. This was despite the official requirement that government staff had to retire at the age of fifty-five. The public, in particular, the Chinese community in Malaysia, urged him to stay on. In fact, numerous signed letters poured in to then inspector general of police, Tan Sri Hanif Omar, requesting that Chin remain as police commission of Kuala Lumpur.

Due to this overwhelming request from the public, Chin was allowed to serve as police commissioner for another year. This is testament to his successful efforts in giving the Malaysian Police Force a trustworthy and friendly face. Chin has said that the most satisfying aspect of his career as police commissioner in Kuala Lumpur was the successful creation of a cordial and understanding relationship between the public and the police. He emphasized this opinion in an interview he gave to the Malaysian press, "We have to let the public know our role, limitations and capabilities as policemen. I would really love to see the day when the public has complete confidence in the police force."

Throughout his career in law enforcement, Chin urged police officers not to betray the people's trust in them. He also repeatedly asked police officers to give fair attention to the public's different complaints and concerns. He likewise appealed to the public to work closely with the police force and he encouraged the public to come forward and provide information on social vice proactively to enable the police to curb social problems and maintain order in society. During his tenure as police commissioner, he helped his fellow police officers by prioritizing the finding of accommodation for the city's policemen and their families. He also ensured that police officers had proper offices in which they could work. After thirty-eight years of service, Henry Chin Poy Wu retired from the Royal Malaysian Police Force on 12 August 1993, an exemplary model for all policemen.

Before his retirement, there was much speculation as to whether Chin would return to Sabah and become a politician. With his reputable career, affable personality, long years of service in the police force, the influence he exerted with his approachable manners, and the good rapport he had with both the public and the press, leaders of several political parties invited Chin to join them. However Chin elected not to enter politics when he retired. Instead, he chose to involve himself in the business sector. As a result, he is currently director of several publicly listed companies.

Not long after his retirement from the police force, on 30 September 1993, Chin was appointed an independent non-executive director of Malaysian Mosaics Bhd. He later assumed the position of deputy chairman on 10 January 2002 and held that post until 31 January 2007. Chin was also appointed an independent non-executive director of Hap Seng Consolidated Bhd. on 5 February 2002 and was its chairman from 12 March 2002 to 31 March 2005. Hap Seng Consolidated Bhd. is a subsidiary of Malaysian Mosaics Bhd., which is listed on the Main Board of Bursa Securities. Chin is also a member of the audit, nomination, and remuneration committees, all of which are subcommittees of the board.

Presently, Chin is also a director of JT International Bhd., Nanyang Press Holdings Bhd., Glenealy Plantations (Malaya) Bhd., Eastern & Oriental Bhd., Kilang Papan Seribu Daya Bhd. and Magnum Corporation Bhd. These companies are similarly listed on the Main Board of Bursa Securities. Although he is officially retired from the police force, he retains his interest in the areas of crime prevention and crime reduction through his positions as a member of the Sabah Pardon Board and vice-president of the National Crime Prevention Foundation. He also sits on the Board of Universiti Malaysia in Sabah.

Chin Sophonphanich

(Tan Piak Chin, 陈弼臣, Chen Bichen, 1910–88)

Banker, tycoon, Thailand

Chin Sophonphanich was born on 10 November 1910 to a Chinese immigrant father of Teochew descent and a Thai mother near the Thonburi side of the Wat Sai floating market. At the age of five, he travelled back to China with his father. He completed elementary school there and helped his father with farming. When it rained, his father had to go to retrieve him from school so he could help mitigate the flooding at the farm. At the age of seventeen, Chin moved back to Thailand. During his twelve-year stay in China, he achieved linguistic proficiency in both Chinese and Thai.

On returning to Thailand, Chin started his working life doing manual labour as a cargo transporter for an agricultural firm, working the route from Bangkok to Ayutthaya. After this, he worked at a timber manufacturing mill. Because of his diligence, thirst for knowledge, and intellect, the owner of the mill taught Chin accounting, while also giving him responsibility for customer relations and service.

After Chin had worked for three years at the mill, the owner expanded his business by opening a new facility and handed control of the original mill to Chin, who was twenty years old at the time. His time as manager was short-lived, though, because the plant caught fire and was forced to shut down and cease all operations.

With his business destroyed, Chin returned to China. There he entered into an investment with local businessmen, turning to the shipping industry and running the route between Shantou and Shanghai. This foray into the local business was unsuccessful though, and he once again returned to Thailand.

On his return, Chin was approached by Tae Keng Hung, the owner of a company called Siem Heng Long that specialized in the selling and retailing of construction materials. At this point in time (1939), Chin decided to start working at Siem Heng Long. The company went on to become very successful commercially, becoming so prominent that construction of both public and private buildings had to go through Siem Heng Long for materials procurement.

From then on, Chin decided to save all of his money to invest in a fully owned firm selling construction equipment near the Phatthanakan Theater in Charoen Krung Road. Most of the business that he conducted dealt with iron and steel goods. This venture experienced such rapid success that he registered the firm under the name Asia Trading Company Limited Partnership. When Chin was twenty-nine, the government enacted a trade policy to promote Thai goods. Asia Trading benefited so greatly from this that it was able to spawn two additional companies, one selling stationery and the other canned goods.

When the Pacific War ended, construction repairs were necessary to restore Bangkok to its pre-war state. Chin approached fifteen merchants and they pooled their stocks to create an organization called Mahakit in 1945. The group managed to raise an additional one million baht, with Chin holding one third equity in the organization that soon held a large number of shares, making this project very successful. From this point on, he started several new businesses, such as gold and rice trading, and department stores.

In 1944 Chin was approached by fifteen of his friends to raise shares/funds to form the Bangkok Bank. The decision to create a bank came at a time when local businesses were finding it very hard to apply for loans from the banks, and Chin and his friends saw an opportunity to help alleviate that problem. The first branch opened on 1 December 1944 at 2 pm, with the prime minister inaugurating the official opening ceremony. Chin started his career at the bank in mid-1945 as a comprador, searching for potential customers and guaranteeing their debts for a fee. He thrived so much in this role that the bank's total assets increased between the moment he joined the bank to the end of the year, from 10.2 million baht to 18.5 million baht, a jump of 8.3 million baht.

From that point on, the Bangkok Bank kept growing and became the first Thai commercial bank to have branches overseas, with a Hong Kong branch opening in 1954 and a Tokyo branch in 1955. Chin became president of the bank in 1952 and occupied the position for twenty-five years, the longest tenure ever held by a Bangkok Bank president. The coup in 1957 by Marshall Sarit Thanarat forced him to relocate to Hong Kong until 1963, as he feared that his closeness to the ousted regime would endanger his life. However, he succeeded in continuing to operate the bank, not least by making Field Marshal Praphat Charusathian its chairman. In 1972 he met Zhou Enlai and managed to help promote relations between China and Thailand by acting as an adviser to the visiting Thai sports team.

In the social realm, Chin set up the Chin Sophonphanich Foundation, which helps and donates to various social organizations and enterprises. Included in this list is St John's University, whose owner said that if Chin Sophonphanich were not around, there would be no St John's. In 1977 Chin was bestowed the Knight Grand Cross First Class of the most important royal order of Thailand, the Order of the White Elephant.

During his lifetime, Chin married twice. His first wife, Lau Kwei Ying, was of Chinese descent and bore him two sons, Rabin and Chatri Sophonphanich; Chatri would eventually replace his father as president of the Bangkok Bank when Chin retired in 1977. With his second wife, Boonsri, he had seven children, including Chote and Khunying Chodchoi Sophonphanich.

On 4 January 1988, Chin passed away from heart and kidney failure at Bamrungrat Hospital. He received royal sponsorship from His Majesty King Rama IX for the eight-angle shaped coffin; other royal touches included the performance of the pi, a Thai instrument, and drumming during royal bathing rites. A three-day wake was held and the royally sponsored cremation was attended by the king himself on 9 April 1988. Chin is acknowledged and accepted by Thai society as a person who built his fortune from the ground up, and became an admired legend to local businessmen who desire to enjoy great accomplishments.

Ching Banlee

(庄万里, Zhuang Wanli, 1899–1965)
Industrialist, community leader, art collector, Philippines

Over the course of half a century Ching Banlee established his business in the Philippines, the oldest of which, Cheng Ban Yek & Co. is already 90 years old. Yet, it is in his celebrated studio of Liangtuxuan (两涂轩) that his highest aspirations and achievements live on.

Ching was born on 9 May 1899 in Jinjiang, Fujian Province, China, in the village of Sanguangtian in the town of Qingyang. At 16, he graduated from the village school with exceptional marks and, having earned the high regard of the principal, himself became a teacher in the school. At 18, he followed his father to the Philippines to begin a new livelihood. There, in an arduous half-century of unspeakable hardships, he built his fortune with his bare hands. In the 1920s, Ching co-founded the Cheng Ban Yek Company with cousins Ching Chay Guan (庄材元) and Ching Chay Chiu (庄材鰍). They pioneered in buying and selling of food products and procurement and export of Philippine food and native products. Later, he established the Ban Lee remittance business. The businesses prospered and they ventured into industries such as rice milling, coal production and textile milling. He set up a branch of the Cheng Ban Yek Company in Singapore and foreign exchange in Xiamen. In 1932, the Company also ventured into cooking oil manufacturing, establishing the International Oil Factory, which competed against foreign brands. At the outbreak of the Pacific War and Japanese occupation of the Philippines, the Company was taken over by the Japanese and the International Oil Factory was completely destroyed.

After the war, Ching and his cousins Chay Chiu and Chay Lun (材润) worked together to revive their businesses. They established La Perla Cigar and Cigarette Manufacturing Company. In 1947, the cousins reapportioned the stocks in Cheng Ban Yek and Company. La Perla Cigar and Cigarette Company went to Chay Lun and Ching Banlee became the Chairman and General Manager of Cheng Ban Yek Group of Companies as well as the International Oil Factory, which he revived. Baguio Oil, the main product of the Company, became a household name synonymous to edible oil. They also produced coconut oil, industrial lard and margarine as well as laundry soap. He and younger brother Chay Bi (材美) and other nephews started the Philippine Steel Mills where he was Chairman and General Manager. Together with brothers Chay Yun (材允) and Chay Bi, Ching founded the La Suerte Tobacco Corporation (三已兄弟烟草公司) and they also reorganized the Central Knitting and Manufacturing Corporation where he was General Manager.

In the management of business affairs, his principal tenet was that of persuasion by moral influence. On a wall of the company boardroom hung a horizontal wooden tablet bearing the handwritten characters for "health", "sincerity", "loyalty", and "determination", each with its own explanatory comment, and intended as guidelines to encourage colleagues to serve state and society in their commercial and entrepreneurial activities.

When Ching was 37, he embarked on extensive tours of Europe, America, Russia and China, and it was in the course of these travels that he first conceived the notion of starting a collection of artworks and antiques. His bosom friend, an educator, historian, geographer and philosopher, Dr Zhang Qiyun, has written of the germination of this idea.

In 1937, Ching went to Hainan Island with plans for establishing a sugar refinery. Later, he returned to his hometown in Fujian to plan investments there. It was the sudden obtrusion of the Marco Polo Bridge Incident, the ensuing Sino-Japanese War and the events of World War II, that shattered his dreams as entrepreneur and art collector. Upon the outbreak of Sino-Japanese War, he and cousin Chay Chiu, through the Cheng Ban Yek Co., donated an airplane in support of China's war efforts. For the duration of the Japanese occupation of the Philippines, he not only contributed materially to the Kang Di Hui (the Organisation for Resistance) but was also active in its operations. Everywhere the Japanese army set a price on his head, and he was nearly captured and imprisoned. But, as he used to say, "the enemy may destroy my wealth and take my life. Never can they conquer my will".

Ching donated considerable amounts of money to support charitable projects as well as education and culture in the Philippines. In 1946, he donated a big sum of money to buy medicines to rescue his town mates in epidemic stricken Ching Yong. He continued giving of medicines to the poor, the widows and orphans for several decades. In 1947, he and his brothers donated a huge amount to help build three primary schools in China, and together with cousin Chay Chiu, they each shouldered half of the maintenance and administrative costs of these schools. He also invested in the building of the famous Chinese Cultural College (中国文化学院) in Taipei.

With the revival of his businesses after the war, Ching became more active in Chinese community organizations. He was a trustee of the Manila Chinese Chamber of Commerce, the Federation of Filipino-Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry, Inc., and the Chiang Kai Shek High School. He also headed the Ching Family Association and the Chinese Charitable Association which managed the Chinese General Hospital and the Chinese cemetery.

On 19 October 1965, after visiting the World Fair in New York, he flew to Boston to see a friend. There he suffered a sudden heart attack and passed away, aged barely sixty-six, his mind still bursting with ideas for ambitious undertakings and fresh cultural and educational projects.

The numerous treasures of his studio Liangtuxuan make a stunning array, the scrolls ranging from the Song to the Ming and Qing periods. In his lifetime, Ching had already classified the works in his collection in a catalogue both systematic and easy of reference, and which included meticulous annotations concerning the provenance and authenticity of each. Besides his collection of works by famous painters and calligraphers, it contained rare editions of Chinese classics: The Complete Works of the Four Treasuries (四库全书), The Complete Library of Ancient and Modern Times (古今图书集成), A Comprehensive Historical Mirror in Aid of Government (资治通鉴), The Complete Library of Philosophical Writing (诸子集成) and Supplement to the Complete Buddhist Scriptural Writings (续藏经).

Ching esteemed the company of the wise and learned often receiving Chinese and foreign visitors of distinction at Liangtuxuan.

Many were friends from cultural, artistic and educational circles, who not only enjoyed his art collection, but also admired the cultured temperament and classical Confucian virtues that won him a unique reputation as a man of both business and learning.

Sharing Ching Banlee's love for the arts are his children, Alfredo and Rita. Rita Ching Tan, who received an M.A from the School of Oriental and African Studies (SOAS), University of London, is now a specialist in Chinese trade ceramics of the 10th–17th centuries, having mounted several exhibitions on different types of Chinese trade ceramics found in the Philippines and published the accompanying exhibition catalogues for the Oriental Ceramic Society of the Philippines. Tan is also curator of the Chinese trade ceramics in the collection of the Ching Ban Lee Ceramic Gallery of Bahay Tsinoy, museum of Chinese in Philippine life. She is the curator of the well-known Roberto T. Villanueva collection of Chinese and South-East Asian trade ceramics now on loan to the Ayala Museum.

Her brother, Alfredo Ching, an MBA holder from the Wharton School, University of Pennsylvania, is serving as Chairman and President, steered the Cheng BanYek to its present stature. Under his leadership, Cheng Ban Yek has been able to maintain its foremost position in the industry, its vegetable oils and by-products known by a brand that is a household name nationwide. He also founded the first private charity clinic in the Philippines, dispensing free medicine and medical treatment to the indigent, and served as a founder and board chairman of the Nutrition Center of the Philippines, an advisory body to the WHO and UNESCO. In the arts, Alfredo helped found and serves as trustee of the Manila Chamber Orchestra Foundation, which promotes classical music to raise the cultural consciousness of the average Filipino. Together with his sister Rita, Alfredo donated their father's collection of classical Chinese paintings and calligraphy to the world famous Shanghai Museum, fulfilling their father's lifelong dream of restoring these treasures to China, for which they each received the "Magnolia Award," the highest award of the city of Shanghai. They also donated their father's collection of rare editions of Chinese classics to the National Library in Beijing.

Interview with Alfredo Ching and Rita Ching Tan, 5 January 2011.

Ching, Jeffrey

(庄祖欣, Zhuang Zuxin, 1965–)

Composer, Philippines

Jeffrey Ching's works in classical music "have expanded the scope and quality of Philippine musical literature, and no other Philippine composer has achieved such depth, dimension, and volume of work at so young an age", according to ex-Philippine President Fidel Ramos. A recipient of two of the highest awards of distinction for academic excellence from Harvard University, Ching graduated with a double degree and double magna cum laude in sinology and music. In a world inundated by pop fads and poor imitations, Ching stands out as a bastion of culture and refinement through his passion for composing classical music that reflects his eastern heritage.

Ching was born to Chinese parents in Manila on 4 November 1965. He began composing before he was ten and remained self-taught until the age of seventeen when his first opera, Rendezvous in Venice, was premiered. However it was not only to music that Ching was drawn in his boyhood, as he also had a fascination for Chinese culture, fostered by his close-knit family. "I grew up next door to my paternal grandfather's private museum of ancient Chinese scrolls (a collection now on permanent display at the Shanghai Museum), and both my parents always emphasised to my sister and me the importance of never forgetting our ancestral roots", he recalls. He therefore read sinology as well as music at Harvard University and received the John Harvard Scholarship for "academic achievements of the highest distinction" twice, as well as the Harvard Detur Prize, the university's oldest prize for academic excellence. He earned a double *magna cum laude*with a graduation thesis on the sumptuary laws of the Ming Dynasty, based on extensive research into primary sources. After graduation he went to England to read law, philosophy, and composition at Cambridge and London Universities. For several years, he taught music at the University of London, where he held the post of lecturer-in-music until 1991.

In 1990, 1993, and 1997 Ching represented the Philippines in three major cultural delegations to China that toured Beijing, Shanghai, and Xiamen, where his compositions were presented. In 1998, he was commissioned by the Philippine Government to compose a work to commemorate the centennial of the Philippine declaration of independence from Spain. This resulted in Ching's third symphony, Rituals, which fused Balinese gamelan, Chinese Ming Dynasty, and Spanish Renaissance elements into a continuous forty-five-minute collage for three orchestras and a male chanter. The same year, Ching was named one of five "Outstanding Young Citizens of 1998" by then President Fidel V. Ramos, who said that Ching's works "have expanded the scope and quality of Philippine musical literature, and no other [Philippine composer] has achieved such depth, dimension, and volume of work at so young an age". He was given an award for excellence in the field of Art, Literature and Culture in the 2003 Dr Jose P. Rizal Awards for Excellence organized by The Manila Times and Kaisa Para sa Kaunlaran.

In 2006, Ching's fifth symphony, Kunstkammer, premiered at the Berlin Philharmonie under renowned Russian conductor Michail Jurowski; and later that year, his fourth symphony, Souvenir des Ming, premiered at the Shanghai International Arts Festival under Michail's equally famous son, Dmitri Jurowski. Two Deutsche Oper Berlin commissions, Bombyx mandarina/Bombyx mori for string quartet, soprano, and percussion, and his chamber arrangement of the Chinese folksong, Molihua (茉莉花), premiered in 2009 with members of the orchestra of the Deutsche Oper Berlin.

Ching's large scale composition, the opera, Das Waisenkind (The Orphan), premiered in 2009 in Theater Erfurt — the most progressive opera house in Germany — and won the Zuschauerpreis (Audience Prize) for Best Opera of 2009–10. This work, featuring a libretto in seven different languages, a diverse cast of protagonists and music from four epochs and six countries, and an orchestra combining western classical and electronic instruments with the timbres of a Chinese folk troupe, was hailed by critics as nothing short of brilliance. The opera was minutely analysed and warmly praised by several prominent European critics, one of whom called it "a stroke of genius". Gerhard Rohde, of the Frankfurt newspaper, Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, described it as:

> the attempt to filter from various sources of the cultures of the world, > from their languages, stories, and music, a kind of world-music theatre, which — with a topic from darkest prehistory — brings us close to the timeless history of man.

But the highest accolade came from the doyen of Berlin music critics, Klaus Geitel of the Berliner Morgenpost, who said in a private letter to Ching:

> I confess: In all my nearly 86 years I have never heard or seen a work or performance comparable to this one from Erfurt, and I will return to your opera soon, though without the hope of ever knowing it by heart or mastering its essence. In truth the opera seems to me unique, not least of all, through the crossing and criss-crossing of time and place, of old European and timeless Asian music.

Ching cites two things that ignited and continues to fuel his passion for music: "admiration for the intellectual discipline and spiritual aspiration of the cultures of the past; and rejection of the mediocrity and superficiality of much of contemporary life. The first drew me to the investigation of classical music, the second resolved me to create a new musical language for the reinvigoration of contemporary culture".

What makes Ching's work so intriguing and refreshing is that it combines western classical music with eastern references. For example, his Terra Kytaorum, premiered in 2001 in Berlin, creates an hour-long, pseudo-historical liturgical service for the last Mongol emperor out of French, Tibetan, Chinese, Korean, and Japanese medieval traditions. In this piece, Ching also first attempted to craft musical sculptures out of Chinese calligraphic samples by a precise tabular method that he created.

After having spent most of his life in England, Ching now lives much of the year in Berlin with his family — his wife, the Spanish-Filipino soprano, Andión Fernández, for whom the vocal parts in his principal works were created, and their son and daughter. "Unfortunately I am drawn to Manila less and less for the performance of my works," he laments.

Chiongbian, William Lee

(1914–2002)

Entrepreneur, political leader, Philippines

William Chiongbian left behind two outstanding legacies for posterity — a successful shipping empire he built from scratch, as well as a long and unsullied political career. He was a Cebu-based shipping magnate who later became an equally successful local, then national, political figure, representing Mindanao (Misamis Occidental) until his self-imposed retirement. He was an avid sportsman who even created a football team among his employees and provided them with housing, and a medical doctor as consultant.

Born on 7 December 1914, Chiongbian's roots, like most Chinese Filipinos, are from Fujian province in China. His original Chinese name is not available, but he was a descendant of the Chiong (Zhong 钟) family. His grandfather, Joaquin Chiong, settled in Jimenez, Misamis Occidental, in the southern island of Mindanao. Joaquin Chiong married Magna Taghap and had a son named Victoriano, who was the father of William Chiongbian. When Victoriano Chiong was of age, his father sent him to China to take a proper, arranged bride from Gulangyu Island, just off the coast of Xiamen. Victoriano Chiong and Lee Chay Hong (later known as Doña Rosario) lived in Oroquieta, then Plaridel, with their children William, Alex, George, James, Jenny, Peter, and Ellen.

It was when Victoriano Chiong was at Silliman University that he started using "Chiongbian". William and Alex, in time, were sent to Silliman. As both boys were close in age, they attended the same levels in primary school. Alex emerged as class valedictorian, while William came second. William then lost interest in his studies and missed classes, and at age thirteen, Victoriano sent the young William on a three-year "exile" to be with his grandmother on Gulangyu Island. This served as punishment for his wild ways, which included hanging out with groups dynamiting fish and indulging in cockfighting, with the latter becoming a lifelong passion. After returning home, William compensated for the lost time by finishing his studies through acceleration.

In Cebu, Chiongbian eloped with Virginia "Inday" Sy, from the Sycip clan, and eventually married her on 29 January 1939, when the Sycips reluctantly agreed to the union. The couple went to live in Iligan, where Chiongbian engaged in copra trading. His father had long since transferred his business concerns to Cebu, operating cargo and passenger ships plying between Cebu and nearby islands. Not long after the wedding, Don Victoriano perished with his boat, M/V Dona Rosario, on his way to Masbate. Consequently, the family not only lost everything, but also inherited his debt to Don Ramon Aboitiz. The brothers William and Alex managed M/V Paulino for Aboitiz until their father's loan was paid off. William Chiongbian then took on the role of family breadwinner, and developed a lifelong distaste for taking a loan.

Second World War created great opportunities for those who were ingenious and daring, both of which Chiongbian had a lot. After evacuating his family to safety in Ormoc, Leyte, Chiongbian chartered a rickety sailboat called a "batel" to bring him to other islands where he bartered whatever saleable items he could source — dried fish, sugar, cigarettes. By 1943, he had saved P3,500 and could use that amount to buy cheap stolen Lawton bills proliferating in Mindanao. Taking a slow island-to-island trip by batel, then truck, he reached Manila where Chiongbian converted his 20,000 Lawton bills into genuine P10,000. He continued his barter activities until the end of the war, when he bought his first ship from the Lim family of Sweet Lines, an established name in inter-island shipping. Protecting their turf, the Lims quoted the outrageous price of P45,000.00 to the upstart Chiongbian, who immediately paid it without batting an eyelid.

William L. Chiongbian Shipping was established on 13 December 1945 with a ship named M/V Don Victoriano in honour of his father. He hired the industry's best ship captain and engineer for its maiden voyage from Cebu to nearby Tagbilaran and Siquijor, then to Plaridel and Ozamis in Mindanao. Yet, even the best men could not prevent the ship from sinking as it hit a submerged junk while it headed for the channel, fortunately, causing no casualty. As would his gambler's luck, the U.S. Army refloated his ship, repaired it, and gave it a new hull. The army was informed and the channel was cleared of all junks and impediments. Chiongbian soon purchased two boats from the U.S. Naval Base in Cavite with a Philippine National Bank loan of P150,000.00, the only loan Chiongbian ever made in twenty years. That same year, 1947, he bought five additional F/S ships from the Philippine Shipping Commission at P150,000 each on reasonable terms.

In January 1945, Chongbian gave his sister-in-law, Felisa Yap-Chiongbian, wife of his seriously ill brother George, some shares in the company, and set her up as treasurer. Two of his father's former trusted employees were positioned as cashier and dock operations manager. He also convinced a boyhood friend to join him as jefe de viaje, taking charge of all cash disbursements onboard. Younger brother Peter also joined the fledgling company. Brothers Alex and James got some money through the Reparation Law. Both invested well, and James set up the Eastern Paper Mills and the Eastern Shipping Lines.

In May 1949, William Lines was incorporated with an initial three ships, and added three more a year later. That year, Chiongbian was honoured as "Shipping Man of the Year" by the Business Writers' Association of the Philippines. He was hit twice by economic recessions: 1951 when he grounded three ships to keep the company viable; then 1961 when he moored his fleet of fifteen ships for slow repairs and kept them in tiptop shape, while he sailed only five.

In 1962, Chiongbian told sister-in-law Felisa that it was time for her and his brother Peter — both loyal William Lines employees — to venture out on their own as Chiongbian's children were almost done with school and would soon take over the company's reins. Chiongbian gave his two siblings their own ships and told them to name their future shipping company George & Peter Lines, Inc., which still exists to this day, plying the southern routes.

The William Lines Group of companies spawned Fast Cargo Transport Corp., Fastpak International Corp., Fast Transit Systems Corp., Virginia Farms, Inc., Virginia Food, Inc., Virginia Development Corp., Cebu Asian Motors Corp., Cebu Industrial Marine Corp., Asturias Aquaculture Corp., and Wander Lanes Travel Company, among others.

Chiongbian's other great achievement was being a public servant to his town mates in Misamis Occidental. In June 1953, he accepted President Elpidio Quirino's challenge and won a congressional seat. He became assistant majority floor leader in the House of Representatives — the first from Mindanao. He was a member of the four-person Philippine delegation to the 15th United Nations General Assembly. Chiongbian was elected and served for eight terms through many administrations. During the presidency of President Corazon C. Aquino, Chiongbian ran for governor in Misamis Occidental and won by a great majority in 1988. He served his constituents well for more than thirty years, until he retired in 1992.

Chongbian died on 17 August 2002. With Inday, he had six children: Elizabeth, Victor, Albert, Elena, Henry, and Edward. In 1966, Victor S. Chiongbian took over the reins of William Lines, Inc. The company changed hands with a posted sales record of P10.9 million and assets totaling P28 million, and with no loan reflected in the company's financial statement. By 1992, the Philippine Business Profiles ranked William Lines, Inc. number one in the shipping industry and 86th among the Philippines' Top 1000 Corporations.

Chiu Kim She, Santos

(张金扇, Zhang Jinshan, 1902–1979)
Businessman, community leader, Philippines

It was a bright Friday morning in 1967 when Filipinos from all walks of life in Iloilo gathered in the streets, participating in the parade, performing and speaking on stage, watching the programme. It was the celebration of the 65th birthday of their beloved Santos Chiu Kim She — an outpouring of gratitude for an admired and respected citizen, a true and trusted friend.

Chiu has touched so many lives simply because he cares about people and did not hesitate to offer his time, resources, and zeal. In so many ways, he has reached out to the less fortunate, victims of difficult circumstances, institutions and organizations that needed his encouragement. He has awakened the spirit of volunteerism in the community. Whenever there was sad news of accidents and natural disasters, he was the first to respond and contribute to fund-raising activities. Whenever the community experienced hardships, he suggested means by which everyone can help one another. Whenever schools or public areas were damaged or deteriorating, he was most willing to help in their restoration. His life was a testament to his love of his country and countrymen. The celebration of his birthday was just a small token of appreciation for the man he was and the life he lived.

Chiu was born on 24 February 1902 in the quiet community of Amoy, China. When he was twelve years old he expressed his intention to travel and pursue his studies. It was this motivation that brought him to the city of Iloilo. In 1914, he continued his studies at the Chinese Commercial School and the Iloilo Institute and displayed excellent leadership skills in school. He also began to be well versed in the English language and the native dialect. His pleasant experiences in Iloilo convinced him to stay in the Philippines and make it his home.

After graduation, he established his business, Pane Supply, in Iznart Street, Iloilo City. His enterprise was involved in buying and selling palay (rice grain), cereals, and other native products. He became known to local dealers as an honest and upright businessman.

He was likewise trusted and patronized by the community.

Chiu lived a quiet and satisfying family life. He married Antonia Kim Suan with whom he had eight sons and daughters. His children, Elena, Juan, Jose, Alfonso, Ramon, Victor, Jorge, and Rosario, are his source of happiness and pride as they are all graduates and productive members of the community.

Aside from taking care of his family, Santos was also concerned with the welfare of his employees. Even before the institution of security services, he was conscientious about opening bank accounts for each of his employees. He gave them funds to start their savings and encouraged them to be prudent.

When the Second World War broke out, Santos and his family were forced to abandon their home and business. He brought his family to the mountains of Victorias in Negros Occidental and in an evacuation area in Barrio Tison, he began to cultivate a sugar plantation to sustain them. He also tried to carry on a small trading business in dry goods, clothing, and medical supplies. These activities proved to be very helpful because he was able to extend his help to others who were ravaged by the war. For those who were desperately in need of food, clothing, and medicine, he gave these away for free. For those who were strong enough to work, he employed them. He became well loved by those he helped, proving that he lived up to his name, "Santos," meaning "God-sent".

Even as he helped the community tide over during the war, he also participated in waging a fight against the Japanese imperial forces. He used his business opportunities to travel to create linkages with guerilla forces. Even under threat of death by Japanese soldiers, he refused to divulge information about the whereabouts of his guerilla comrades. Instead, he cleverly convinced the soldiers that there were none in the area. In this instance, he not only saved his own life, but the lives of so many brave guerillas as well.

The liberation from the Japanese Occupation allowed Chiu and his family to return to Iloilo. Deeply changed by his experiences during the war, Santos felt that he had a new lease on life and vowed to dedicate the rest of it in the service of his fellowmen.

In 1960 the country experienced a serious rice shortage and Iloilo City was not exempt from this economic crisis. Due to Chiu's influence and encouragement, he was able to convince Filipino and Chinese rice vendors to band together and provide cheaper rice to city residents. A system was also established giving every member of the community an equal opportunity to avail themselves of the affordable rice. Instead of taking advantage of the crisis for economic gain, Chiu took it upon himself to lead his fellow businessmen in alleviating the plight of their community. When the rice shortage recurred, his system of handling rice shortages was implemented.

One of his primary advocacies was education. He believed that children deserve not only to have quality education, but also decent school facilities. He donated his money for the construction of school buildings, equipment for school facilities, and even markers and iron gates. Aside from these, he also sponsored poor Boy Scouts so they could participate in Boy Scouts activities, such as jamborees. His most ambitious project was the construction of a two-room school building in Barrio Obrero, La Paz in Iloilo City in 1961. For his generous act, students no longer had to have classes suspended or conduct their studies under trees because of the lack of adequate facilities.

Whenever communities were struck by natural disasters, such as fires, typhoons, and even volcanic eruptions, Chiu was one of the first to respond. If the area of the fire or typhoon was accessible to Chiu, he would personally visit the place to comfort the victims. On his return there, he would already bring the results of his fund-raising efforts: rice, bread, sardines and other basic necessities.

Iloilo City was not the only community that benefited from the generous assistance of Chiu. When Taal Volcano erupted in 1965, he mobilized one of his most creative strategies of raising funds. A float mounted on a roving truck depicted an artificial volcano, emitting smoke. On the vehicle was a banner, "Where are they going? They need your help". The citizens who saw the float knew that although the roving volcano was man-made, the Taal Volcano it was depicting was real and the damage it had caused, undeniable.

Even as the disasters were countless and seemingly never-ending, Chiu never grew tired of initiating fund-raising campaigns and spreading awareness to mobilize his community to help. More than the material and economic support that he gathered, he was able to foster volunteerism in his fellowmen. He made people realize that they were not just individuals, not merely a small city, but a significant part of a larger community. Whatever donation they gave was not measured by the amount or the cost, but by the sincerity and selflessness that it expressed.

Public servants who were probably being ignored by the public they served had a special place in Chiu's heart. When he saw that police stations were deteriorating, he donated resources for their repair. When a group of five policemen and firemen lost their lives trying to put out a fire, Chiu sponsored a fund-raising campaign in the community in recognition of the men who lost their lives in service. Instead of asking the government or other officials to provide for the families of those who died, Chiu generously gave from his own pocket. For him, public officers were an important part of the community. They also deserved the support and aid of the community in times of great need.

Though a naturalized and not one born in the Philippines as a citizen, because of his philanthropic works, he was admired and respected by all, local and immigrants alike. He also paved the way for stronger ties between Filipinos and Chinese-Filipinos. His works in the community made Filipinos see beyond his Chinese ancestry and accept him as one of them. For other Chinese-Filipinos, he became an example of a productive and well loved Filipino. Chiu dedicated his life to being a "new Filipino". He once claimed that his passion to help others was an expression of his gratitude to this country, his home.

Chock, Angela

(卓如燕, Zhuo Ruyan, 1955–)
Soprano, Malaysia

Angela Chock is an accomplished light-lyric soprano and one of the few outstanding Chinese vocalists from Malaysia. She has won many awards at the national vocal competition and the Malaysia-Singapore vocal competition. Her powerful vocal cord has been heard at various stages of her career not only throughout the country, but also abroad in Singapore, Indonesia, Brunei, Hong Kong, Taiwan, China, and Italy. Her tuneful and seasoned voice exudes feelings and passion, making her the ideal interpreter of art and folk songs as well as operatic arias by Mozart, Scalatti, Bellini, Rossini, and Donizetti.

Chock was born to Chock Mun Chong (卓文章) and Wong Fen Har (黄芬霞) on 12 December 1955 in Old Town, Petaling Jaya, Selangor. She was the eldest in the humble family of five children. Music had always run in the family for her mother, who liked to sing, was the biggest fan of bygone Chinese singers in the 1950s. Knowing this, her father who worked as a bus driver then, saved up to buy her mother a Rediffusion set which the family listened to all day long as they went about their household chores. Thus began Chock's early exposure to the splendour of songs and music.

Even at the age of sixteen, she began participating in many singing competitions. Her first attempt was the RTM (Radio Television Malaysia) Talent Time Classical Songs Competition in which she won first prize. This was followed by many more prizes from classical songs competitions across Malaysia and Singapore. It was in one of these that she met her first voice teacher, Madam Ong Pek Choo (王碧珠), who was a graduate from the Hong Kong Conservatory of Music. Ong recognized the raw talent in Angela and nurtured her until her own unfortunate passing from lung cancer two years later. Saddened but still ever determined, Chock continued to learn the art from prominent local vocalist, Li KeYing (李克莹).

Music and vocal training did not come easy for her. After leaving high school at the age of nineteen in 1974, she made the first of many trips to Taiwan in order to improve her vocal skills. Unfortunately, after a short stay she had to return to Malaysia on learning of her mother's deteriorating health from a losing struggle with brain cancer. Due to the family's poor financial situation, she had to help support it by working odd jobs, including helping out in her father's eatery and as a sales assistant.

At the age of twenty-three in 1979, she had saved enough money to make her second trip to Taiwan. There she took private lessons from an American vocal teacher at Dong Hai University. However, when her funds ran out six months later, she had to return again to Malaysia. She earned a living as a stall keeper and hairdresser and helped her siblings through school.

At twenty-seven year of age, she went to Taiwan a third time. As she was not allowed to pick up where she left off in the vocal course she had enrolled for a long time ago, she had to enrol herself for the diploma of Home Economics at the Taiwan Cultural University instead. Her interest in music, however, had not disappeared. She spent more time brushing up her vocal skills with Taiwanese vocal teachers Zhai Hei Shan (翟黑山) and Zeng Dao Xiong (曾道雄). She also studied Theory of Music from the former and opera from the latter. Two years later, she returned to Malaysia and began teaching music at Hin Hua Secondary School, Klang, and Chong Hwa Secondary School, Kuala Lumpur. All the while, Chock also performed at many local events. With her hard work, she even managed to finance all her siblings through university. During this period of hardship, she kept her dream of one day becoming a renowned vocalist alive by continuing to take lessons from Lilian Li Shui Lian (李水莲).

In 1988 when Chock was thirty-two years old, with limited funds of RM10,000 sponsored by relatives and friends, which was just enough for tuition fee, she went off to Italy to pursue her vocal course. For two years, she took her vocal quality to a high art in terms of musical shape and dramatic intent when she furthered her training with Mandalina Avegnoni, from whom she learned the piano, and Lorraine Nawa Jones Marenzi, from whom she learned vocals at T.L. Da Victoria Music College in Rome, Italy. During her stay, she was also invited to hold two concerts at the Tre Pini Songs and Arts Festival, where she met with great success and won adulation from the audience. Because of her tight budget, to finance all these extra efforts to build a stronger foundation in music, as well as to support herself, Chock worked as a housekeeper, restaurant waitress, and also did household chores for teachers and wealthier coursemates. Her teacher, maestra Marenzi did not charge her any fee at times. With Marenzi's support, she overcame the language barrier and found her coloratura and lyrical voice qualities. She developed a wide repertoire of her favourites that included Italian arias, Schubert's German lieder, and works by Bellini.

After returning from Italy to Malaysia in 1990 at the age of thirty-four, Chock sought to pass on her knowledge and taught classical singing at the Malaysian Music Academy and also to students of Hin Hua Secondary School and Chong Hwa Secondary School in Kuala Lumpur, for two years.

She also collaborated with many sponsors, musical groups, and orchestras, including the Yin Qi Choir, Sing Chew Jit Poh, Dama Orchestra, Taipei's Cosmos Operatic Group, and the YTL Group. Chock also performed abroad, and recorded five CDs, mostly about Chinese artistic songs, namely Gui Qu Lai Xi (归去来兮) (Coming Back) (1992); Zhongguo Mingeji (中国民歌集) (A Compilation of Chinese Folk Songs) (1994); Yue Guangguang (月光光) (Moonlight Lullaby) (1996); Bailingniao Ni Zhe Meimiao de Geshou (百灵鸟你这美妙的歌手) (The Sweet Singing Bird) (1998); Zai Na Yaoyuan de Difang (在那遥远的地方) (A Far Away Land); and others that are Christian hymns such as Wo Gesong Ni (我歌颂你) (I Praise Thee).

Her noted career achievements include performing at the Sin Chew Jit Poh Literary Award Ceremonies for three years, at the Malaysian Chinese Association events, and also at former Malaysian Prime Minister Datuk Seri Abdullah bin Haji Ahmad Badawi's 65th birthday celebrations in 2006.

Her untiring commitment to vocal refinement has made her a mature singer. She performed in numerous concerts' operatic highlights, including the roles of Mimi in La Boheme, Zerlina in Don Giovani, and Marenka in The Bartered Bride. She also performed in oratorios such as Handel's Messiah, Mendelssohn's Elijah, and Haydn's Creation.

Being a devout Christian, Chock was also co-founder of the Christian Musician Fellowship of Malaysia. Her devotion to the faith has also seen her performing pieces such as Hymn of Praise and Mozart's Requiem in many Christian concerts.

Chock was happily married and actively involved in performing, essay writing, travelling, vocal music teaching, and the training of younger generations.

Chong Ah Fok

(张亚福, Zhang Yafu, 1956–)
Teacher, writer, Brunei

Chong Ah Fok is a rare kind of Chinese in Brunei Darussalam as he specializes in the Malay language and writes literature in Malay. He has won numerous awards for his short stories and novels and his other works have also been used as teaching, research, and seminar materials.

Chong was born on 8 May 1956 in Limbang, Sarawak, and moved to Brunei Darussalam in 1959. After completing his "A" Level studies, he started working as a Malay teacher at Chung Ching Middle School in Seria in 1979, and later moved to Saint Andrew's School in Bandar Seri Begawan where he still is presently. Over the years, apart from busy teaching, his interest in writing since Secondary Four has continued to grow. Besides raising the standard of Malay literature and culture of his students, he also enriches the local Malay literature scene, which is rare for a Chinese.

Chong was educated in the Malay medium from primary school to univesity. His achievements in the Malay language was due to his love of the language and passion for writing. Also due to these achievements, he managed to continue his studies at the University of Brunei Darussalam in 1994. Chong had to start working after completing his G.C.E. "A" Level studies in order to support his poor family. After working for more than ten years, he had the chance to further his studies, and therefore really treasured the opportunity. He majored in the Malay language, minored in Malay literature, and graduated with a Bachelor of Arts in Education with First Class Honours. During his years at university, his excellent results won him the Book Prize Award every year, and also the Excellent Graduate Award upon graduation. In 2005, he took a Master's degree at the same university, and completed in a year his thesis titled, "Kajian Novel-Novel Terpilih Brunei Darussalam dari Perspektif Pengkaedahan Melayu" or "A Study of Selected Brunei Darussalam Novels from A Malay Methodology Perspective".

Chong's father, Chong Ah Hwa, came from China, and Brunei was his first stop. He ran a small stall, and even used a small boat to travel up the Limbang River and moved around in Limbang town. When he finally settled down in Limbang, he opened a lumber and sawmill. Unfortunately, he did not enjoy the stable life for long as he died a few years later.

At the time, Chong Ah Fok was only three years old. After his father's death, his whole family moved from Kampung Ukong to live with an uncle in Kampung Pandak, Limbang. His mother Ludang binti Kitan, had to shoulder the burden of bringing up five children, and therefore could really not afford additional education fees, and so could only send her children to a government school, which did not charge school fees.

Chong's uncle later married a cousin of his mother. With the help of his father's younger brother, his whole family moved to Bandar Brunei (old name of Brunei's capital Bandar Seri Begawan) and lived with his uncle. His uncle was not a wealthy man either, and lived in Kampung Sultan Lama in the water village near The Royal and Custom Excise building in Brunei's capital. Although Chong was still very young, he helped his cousins to take care of the family business during the day, and sold popsicles around town with his cousins in the afternoon. Two years later, his mother married a Dusun man, Yunan bin Ahmad, and settled down in Kampung Batang Mitus in Kiudang, Tutong District, where she is still living.

Due to Chong's strong foundation in the Malay language and his deep interest in Malay literature and culture, his family's economic situation did not stop him from pursuing his interest in Malay writing. His studious efforts led him to many successes in the Malay literary world, and enabled him to compete with other Malay writers. His expertise in both long and short story writing, won him numerous awards, including first place for Radio Brunei's Short Story Award (1978), for Ibu or Mother; first place for the Language and Literature Bureau's Novel Writing Award (1988), for Angin Pagi or Morning Breeze; second place for the Literature Critique Award (1998), for Kesejajaran Motif dan Tema Dua Buah Cerpen Yang Sama Tajuk: Satu Kritikan Bandingan Intranegara or Parallel Motive And Theme of The 2 Short Stories With The Same Title: An Intracountry's Comparison.

In order to raise his skills and standard of writing, Chong actively takes part in writing workshops, including those organized by the Language and Literature Bureau and other departments. In pursuing his passion for writing, he appreciates all opportunities different departments offer him to express his thoughts and feelings in writing. His firm belief in literary writings, and his writing efforts in this field explain his success in the literary sector. He strongly believes that if a person cannot make a substantial contribution to the country, then he or she must work hard at the mental level — put in more effort into the country's literature — in order to give something back to the country where he or she grew up. There is no doubt that it is this sincere heart that is the driving force behind his writings.

Chong's works published by the Language and Literature Bureau for the public and for use in schools in Brunei Darussalam, as well as in Malaysia, include five novels, seven short stories, one poem, one radio drama, and one television drama.

His achievements in literature are directly related to his long-term exposure to local culture, especially the Chinese and Malay cultures. Professor Yusuf Hassan even praised Chong as a writer with a multiracial and multicultural background. Chong personally thinks that his writing expertise comes from reading different books, the themes which are usually based on country and its people. Hence, some of his writings are also being used as school textbooks.

Chong's literary works are simple and easy to read; the style is concise, but creative, and also writes in many different genres. His works are rich in romance, but at the same time, full of realism, and occasionally, modernism. Due to his status as a professional Malay language teacher, he was appointed a member of the Lower Secondary Textbook Evaluation Committee. He was also a member of the Upper Secondary Examiner Committee for a few years. With his rich experience in teaching, he has been publishing a Malay Language exercise book for secondary school students from 2007, including a Malay Language Grammar exercise book for Form One to Form Three, and also a Traditional Malay Language and Poetry exercise book, for Form Four and Form Five, in order to raise the standard of language of secondary school students.

Apart from his Malay writings, Chong is also involved in various studies related to the Malay language. To date, he has published about ten research papers and some of them have been selected as special topics for research works.

Chong's achievements in the Malay language are well received by fellow writers in Tutong District where he lives. Under his leadership, they successfully published three anthology of creative literary works. In conjunction with His Majesty the Sultan and Yang Pertuan of Brunei Darussalam's 60th birthday anniversary, the group published a poetry anthology, Ristaan Anak Merdeka. In conjunction with Brunei Darussalam's Silver Jubilee National Day celebrations, they published two more works — an anthology of short stories, A Journey, and an anthology of poems. After that, he received strong support from fellow writers and was appointed head of Language and Literature under the Language, Art and Culture Association, Tutong District, since 2006. The group has organized several writing workshops, language and literature seminars and talks, both in Tutong District and nationwide.

Chong Ah Fok is married to Yong Hock Man and they have three sons and three daughters.

Chong Kah Kiat

(章家杰, Zhang Jiajie, 1948–)
Former Chief Minister of Sabah, Malaysia

Chong Kah Kiat was a lawyer turned politician who came to occupy the state's highest executive office under a complex rotation system. His rise was due more to his administrative ability and his loyalty to the federal government than political support in the state.

Chong was born on 2 June 1948 in the town of Kudat in Sabah, which together with neighbouring Sarawak, formed the eastern wing of the Malaysian federation. Very little is known of his childhood except that he was a bright student who furthered his studies in law at the Victoria University of Wellington, New Zealand (VUWNZ), obtaining a LLM in 1974. While a student in New Zealand, Chong was the secretary of the Malaysian Students Association of VUWNZ. Like most Malaysian students overseas, he kept abreast of Malaysian politics, particularly in Sabah, through discussions with fellow students and diplomats and also the Malaysian newspapers. Chong shared the resentment of many of his colleagues towards then Chief Minister of Sabah Tun Mustapha Harun, notorious for his en masse conversion of non-Muslims to Islam through bribery and intimidation.

Chong returned to Sabah after completing his studies and inevitably joined politics shortly after a newly-formed party called Berjaya, backed by the federal government, managed to oust Mustapha's party called the United Sabah National Organization (USNO). Despite his moves to placate the federal government by converting many non-Muslims to Islam, Mustapha actually harboured ambitions of seceding Sabah to join up with parts of the southern Philippines to form an Islamic state called Bornesia, with him as a sultan.

Berjaya came to power in 1976 by defeating USNO in the state elections. Though Chong was following developments closely, it was only five years later — in 1981 — at the party's second elections that he contested a state seat as a Berjaya candidate and won. He was appointed assistant minister to Chief Minister Harris Salleh in 1982. But under Harris Salleh, Berjaya, which started out as a multiracial party, soon became unpopular like USNO because it adopted a strong pro-Muslim line. As such it was much resented by the Christian Kadazan-Dusuns, the largest among Sabah's thirty-two ethnic communities, which accused it of discrimination against their community in Sabah's multi-ethnic mix. Joseph Pairin Kitingan then formed a new party called Parti Bersatu Sabah (PBS), dominated by the Kadazan-Dusuns and Chinese, and in the state elections of 1985, PBS defeated Berjaya and came to power.

Chong, who contested in the Sabah 1985 elections under a Berjaya ticket, lost to a Chinese candidate of PBS, Wong Phin Chung. For the next two years, Chong who had lost his assistant minister's position, went back to private practice as a lawyer. In March 1987, he became a member of the supreme council of Berjaya, the party's highest policymaking body. However he resigned from Berjaya when he sensed that it was growing weaker and incapable of making a comeback to Sabah politics.

Chong and several Chinese leaders in Sabah then formed a new Chinese-based, but multi-racial oriented party, called the Liberal Democratic Party (LDP) in 1989. He became its pro-tem secretary general then, but two years later in 1991, Chong rose to the party's highest position, that is, president. The LDP, which was against the then ruling party of Sabah, PBS, allied itself with the federal United Malays National Organization (UMNO) which entered Sabah politics in 1991. UMNO replaced USNO, which had dissolved itself after its heavy defeat by the PBS, which became the ruling party of Sabah for the next nine (1985–94) years.

Although the LDP took part in the 1994 Sabah elections, its president, Chong, did not contest. He was thus not directly involved in the political drama which saw the collapse of the PBS which won the state elections narrowly, but lost the state government when many of its assemblymen defected to UMNO and its allies, which then formed the Sabah chapter of the ruling National Front (NF) coalition government.

In 1995 Chong was appointed a senator in Malaysia's upper governing chamber and became a minister in the Prime Minister's Department. He was to remain there for the next four years during which he enjoyed a close and cordial working relationship with Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad. In 1999, with Mahathir's blessings and a newly acquired profile as a federal minister, Chong returned to Sabah to contest the state elections under an LDP ticket in his home town of Kudat and won. He was then appointed that state's minister of Tourism Development, Environment, Science & Technology.

The NF coalition in Sabah comprised several parties representing Muslim indigenous peoples such as Bajaus, Suluks, and other fringe groups, the non-Muslim indigenous peoples such as the Christian Kadazans-Dusuns and Muruts, as well as the Chinese. To prevent a squabble for the chief minister's post, Mahathir decided to rotate the five-year position among the NF components. Mahathir's arrangement was that a Muslim indigenous person would occupy the position first, followed by a Chinese, and then the non-Muslim indigenous person.

Chong became Sabah's thirteenth chief minister under the rotation system in 2001, as a representative of the Chinese, even though his LDP had only two or three assemblymen in the then fifty-plus seat state assembly. He was able to govern well because he had the full backing of Mahathir behind him. Thus whatever he requested from the federal government was duly given to him. Mahathir was pleased with Chong as he had proven to be a very capable administrator. Chong held the position for two years under the rotation system and passed it over to his successor, UMNO's Musa Aman, who was incidentally his classmate at the All Saints School in Kota Kinabalu in the 1960s.

Chong, who retained his state ministership role which was revamped as the Tourism, Culture & Environment minister, under Chief Minister Musa, was also appointed a deputy chief minister in 2003. Over the next four years he enjoyed a close working relationship with Musa. In 2006, he resigned as president of LDP after serving fifteen years to give way to Liew Vui Keong. The next year in April, Chong resigned not only his deputy chief minister's position, but also his state ministership, citing "matters of principle".

The media, which was closely following Chong's movements, soon found out that Chong was unhappy and resigned from his positions because Musa had in November 2006 cancelled an earlier government approval given in February 2006 by the Kudat Town Board to the Thean Hou (天后) Temple Charitable foundation to erect a 108-foot high statue of Mazu, the Goddess of the Sea on the beach front in Kudat to attract tourists from Taiwan and Hong Kong. Chong, as Tourism Minister had been instrumental in getting the project off the ground. Thus he was very angry that several months of work-in-progress, resulting in the construction of a huge platform for the statue's base, had come to naught. The reason given by Musa was that the proposed statue was near a mosque and would purportedly offend Muslim sensitivities. The Sabah media, which reported that Musa had offered Chong an alternative site some fifteen km away for the statue, but it had been turned down, also gave the impression that Chong was not cooperative.

Chong was to clarify later that Musa's offer would, in fact, benefit the Federation of Hainanese Clans & Associations in Sabah and Labuan, who had earlier successfully applied for the site, and, in a way, Chong would have been excluded. He also told reporters that the mosque mentioned by Musa was, in fact, some 600 metres from the proposed statue, so the question of Muslim sensitivities did not arise. Chong then disclosed that Musa was, in fact, unhappy with his move, as Tourism Minister, in stopping a $5-million project in Sipadan on 15 May 2006, when a huge barge carrying tons of construction materials breached the islands and destroyed the beautiful corals in the sea. Thus his cancellation of the Mazu statue project in Kudat was more an act of vengeance on the part of Musa, who allegedly had a vested interest in the cancelled Sipadan project. In July 2010, Chong lost his appeal in the Federal Court in Kuala Lumpur against the Sabah Government's decision to reverse the earlier approval by the Kudat Town Council for the statue to be erected. But Chong is adamant to continue his fight as parts of the statue imported from China or Taiwan lie unopened in crates in Kota Kinabalu, while a few hundred kilometres away in Kudat, the erected concrete platform for the statue stands bare.

Chong King Liong

(张景良, Zhang Jingliang, 1933–2006)
Community leader, Malaysia

Chong King Liong, the son of Kelantan gold merchant Zhang Ying Ju (张迎驹), was a member of the group, Si Hui, Guangdong (广东四会).

Chong graduated from the National University of Taiwan and worked as a mechanical engineering consultant. Famous as a man of action, Chong, however, kept a low profile.

Since 1975, he has led the Association of Taiwan Graduates in the move to urge the Malaysian Government to give recognition to the engineering and chemistry degrees from Taiwan. It was during Chong's time that the Federation Association of Taiwan Graduates was established and a permanent building was purchased to house it. He was the founder and president of the Association of Taiwan Graduates from 1974–75 and was re-elected for a second term from 1976–77. In 1980–81, he was again appointed to lead the association and later, held the post of adviser.

Given his striking and outstanding leadership, Chong received due recognition and was elected into the Selangor Chinese Assembly Hall. At this time, there was a growing apprehension among the Chinese about the future of their culture because of the implementation of the National Cultural Policy in 1971. In 1983, Chong headed a group of Chinese community leaders to meet the Cultural and Youth Minister, Anwar Ibrahim. The meeting's objective was to express concern about the National Cultural Policy and to plead for the preservation of multicultural diversity in the formulation of the policy. Unfortunately, the meeting was in vain and the results were disappointing. The status quo on national cultural policy was maintained and declared during the Parliament on 29 July 1983.

Unfazed by the failure, Chong teamed up with Khoo Siong Chi, president of the Selangor Chinese Assembly Hall, to bring together fifteen major Chinese associations (15 Huantuan). This strategic alliance produced a comprehensive draft outlining demands for civil rights. The historical Joint Declaration (JD) was submitted in 1985.

When Khoo completed his term in February 1986, Chong went on to fill the seat of the deputy president. In undertaking this role he assisted the new president, Zhang Zheng Xiu (张正修), who was appointed in March 1986. While serving his term, Zhang was diagnosed with cancer and struggled with a long series of intensive treatments. The illness and ensuing treatment took a toll on him and left Chong to undertake most of the activities and responsibilities.

Under Chong's leadership, a Civil Rights Committee (CRC) was set up on 30 August 1986. He played a significant role as its spokesman, championing civil right movements in Malaysia during the 1980s. Chong was also instrumental in establishing the Huazi Resource & Research Centre that was intended to be the think-tank for the Chinese community.

These were times coloured by political and multi-ethnicity tensions. As the community leader, Chong had to take on the challenges that emerged during this difficult period. The entire Chinese community was caught up in clashes of cultural, political, and economic issues. To make matters worse, twenty-four Chinese-capital-based cooperatives were ordered to shut down on 8 August 1986, days after the general elections. Taking immediate action, Chong called for an emergency meeting to negotiate a win-win solution. One of the remedial steps was to form a legal advisory team of thirteen veteran lawyers to assist the affected members of the cooperative.

Selangor Assembly Hall president Zhang lost his battle with cancer and passed away during his term in 1986. Obviously the best candidate to succeed him, Chong became the president of the Selangor Chinese Assembly Hall in February 1987.

Even while the cooperative issue remained unsettled, talks began to circulate that amendments to the Education Act 1961 would further marginalize Chinese- and Tamil-medium schools. The rising concern over the future of Chinese education in general, and the shrinking opportunities for Chinese students to gain admission into local tertiary institutions in particular, led to the reactivation of the Chinese Education Movement (Dongjiaozong) from 1973–87 (Tan 1992). In September 1987, it was announced that non-Mandarin educated headmasters and teachers would be posted to National-Type Chinese primary schools to head them as the senior administrators. This sparked a huge outcry and set off boycotts and rallies from the Chinese community. Chong, together with the Dongjiaozong, called a protest meeting on 11 October 1987.

Over 3,000 delegates, representing both ruling and opposition parties, joined the Chinese Associations in a meeting at Thean Hou Temple, Kuala Lumpur. In such highly charged and unpredictable circumstances, Chong chaired the meeting valiantly. Not long afterwards, the infamous Operation Lalang was launched and nearly 150 individuals were detained without trial under the Internal Security Act (ISA).

Chong ended his services with the Selangor Assembly Hall in April 1990, having performed several laudable accomplishments before leaving his post. First, he had been able to put forward proposals from the Chinese community in a memorandum for the government's consideration in formulating its post-New Economy Policy after the NEP ended at the end of 1990. Dr Kua Kia Soong, the director of the Resource & Research Centre, who had been working on the memorandum earlier, was held under the Internal Security Act (ISA) at Kamunting Camp. Chong continued the unfinished task to ensure that the memorandum was submitted in time.

Second, to sustain and secure financial backing for the Huazi Resource & Research Centre, Chong conceived the idea of publishing a directory of commerce and industry. To carry out this ambitious plan, he took it upon himself to visit some thirty-three major towns personally, soliciting for support.

Third, through the cultural committee, Chong had approached a multinational corporation, Tiger Beer, to sponsor a one-year cultural performance tour held in twenty-three towns all over Malaysia. This feat raised over RM800,000 in donations for the National Cultural Fund. Sadly, after Chong's retirement, the fund was not managed to benefit the public as it was intended originally.

Chong passed away peacefully on 8 September 2006 at the age of seventy-three.

Chong, Rosemary

(née Chow Poh Kheng, 周宝琼, Zhou Baoqiong, 1929–)
Politician, social activist, Malaysia

Rosemary Chong, who was born in Ipoh in 1929, is the first Wanita Malayan Chinese Association (MCA) president. She became the first non-Malay woman M.P. in 1975, and the first non-Malay woman deputy minister in 1982. As a social activist, she has over the years been involved in the Red Cross, the National Council of Senior Citizens Organization, and the Ampang Old Folks Home.

Political representation of Chinese women in the first decade after Malaysia's independence lagged behind that of their Malay counterparts. Chong's accomplishments mark the slow progress charted by Chinese women in the political arena. In recognition of her services, she was conferred the second highest Malaysian honorific title of Tan Sri in 2007 — the first Wanita MCA member to be bestowed this honour.

Her late spouse was Dr Chong Yew Chong (张耀宗), a medical practitioner. They have five children. Her primary education and two years of secondary school was at Anglo Chinese Girls School in Ipoh. She continued her schooling at St Mary's College, Hong Kong, after which she completed a B.A. in education at the Hong Kong University. Her grandparents and parents migrated from Guangdong so Chong is the first-generation Malaysian in her family. Her grandfather, Chow Kai (周佳), a tin miner, has a road in Ipoh named after him.

The path taken by Rosemary Chong, beginning with women's traditional roles as housewife and mother in the private domain before involvement in the public realm, reflects the journey of many Malaysian women of similar social standing. However, only a minority embarks onto politics.

Soon after her marriage, not one to stay idle, she entered the teaching profession and taught English for five years at the Chung Hwa School, Setapak. Thereafter, when her husband left the government service to start his own private practice, she stopped teaching to help out in her husband's medical clinic in Pudu.

Chong's foray into the public sphere began when Dr Chong was working at the Kuala Lumpur General Hospital. With time to spare, she joined a group of women to help out in the spastic ward. She enjoyed her stint there as she found it rewarding, and continued for a few years until the government decided to close down the ward. Subsequently, she joined the Red Cross (Malaysian Red Crescent Society in 1975), following on the heels of her husband who was chairman of the Disaster Management section. She participated in fun fairs and related projects such as fund-raising, her organizational skills coming into play.

Not surprisingly, mindful of her involvement in social activities, a family friend, Lum Kin Tuck, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens Organization Malaysia (NASCOM) roped her in to join this association and take on the post of deputy president. She resigned from this when she became more active in politics.

The next non-governmental organization with which Chong has been associated from 1975 to the present is the Ampang Old Folks' Home. The home is located in the Selayang constituency which she won. Finding it in poor condition, Chong got involved with a view to improving it. From the time she became a member of parliament (MP) in 1975 till 2000, she raised around RM900,000 for a RM1.8-million building which now houses fifty elderly inmates.

Chong ventured into politics in 1971, joining the MCA after her domestic responsibilities were reduced when the last of her children went off to study abroad. MCA president Tan Siew Sin had been searching for someone like Chong, with ample experience in charity work and a proven ability in management, to set up a women's section. Women members till then were individual members in branches and divisions without a separate organization of their own. At a seminar for women organized by MCA Selangor in May 1972, a protem committee was formed with Rosemary Chong elected as convenor of Wanita MCA Selangor. Two months later, Wanita MCA Selangor was officially launched, followed by the establishment of a Women's Section in branches and divisions throughout Selangor State. After that, other states formed their own Wanita MCA — in Perak, Penang, Kedah, Negeri Sembilan, and Kelantan. Within one year, membership rose from 800 to 30,000. In August, a forum and conference for Chinese women on Women's Day was organized, with a very encouraging turnout. As Chong expressed, "it was much higher than expected", filling the Selangor Chinese Assembly Hall. "It gave us confidence in fighting for the cause of Chinese women politics in Malaysia."

Chong gives us her take on why she accepted Tan Siew Sin's call. "It is a waste for the nation if talented and educated Chinese women are to stay out of politics." Initially reluctant to enter politics, she was persuaded to give it a shot as she recognized that "social work and politics are almost the same. Both vocations concern the welfare and well-being of the rakyat". Without really knowing what politics entailed, she took the plunge and spent the next thirteen years building up the women's wing before her exit in 1986. Chong took on the mantle of leadership thrust upon her, achieving many "firsts" on the way.

From her position as the first Wanita MCA president in 1975, she went on to become the first non-Malay woman MP in 1975, the first non-Malay woman deputy minister in 1982 (Ministry of Culture, Youth and Sports, thereafter Ministry of Education in 1984 and back to Ministry of Culture, Youth and Sports in 1985), and the first Wanita MCA member to be conferred the title "Tan Sri" in recognition of her services in 2007. Chong's other achievement was to serve as Speaker of Parliament in 1987.

It was not all plain sailing though, and the first hiccup came in 1973 when internal party politics impacted on the reformist movement seeking to topple the party leadership. As a supporter of the "Reformation Movement", Chong was sidelined until a new president came into the picture. In 1974, Lee San Choon invited Rosemary Chong to assume leadership of the National Wanita MCA, thus enabling women political participation to take a few steps forward. The following year, 1975, was declared International Women's Year by the United Nations. This coincided with a by-election in Selayang where Chong was selected as the candidate. She used the slogan "raising feminism" (提高女权) to win with a large majority of 11,904 votes. This was indeed a milestone for Chinese women as previous women candidates, such as Tan Ah Ngo and P.G. Lim in 1964, and Au Keng Wah in 1969, failed to win seats in earlier, national-level general elections. Chong won the Ulu Langat seat in 1978 and retained it in 1982 with an improved majority

Initially, Wanita MCA was labelled as "tai-tai tuan" (太太团), a party whose members are ladies of leisure. Chong recalls the hard work involved, of her efforts to go beyond merely complementing the men in their political struggles, to fight for women's rights. In addition to projects targeted at women, such as cooking and handicraft classes, as well as fund-raising for the Tunku Abdul Rahman College, Chong tried to raise awareness among Chinese women for their own betterment. A notable example of her contribution to assist Chinese women was to inform them of their rights under a new law (the Law Reform Act aimed at regulating customary marriage practices for non-Muslim women in Malaysia by abolishing polygamy and providing protection for the first wife when husbands contracted second or third marriages), passed in 1976, but which only came into force in 1982.

Life after politics has not slowed down for Chong. Beginning with her involvement as one of the founders and patron of the Yin Ngai Musical Association (研艺粤剧音乐社) in the 1990s, she went on to found the Yoke Yip Association of Dramatic Arts (玉叶社), based at the Ampang Old Folks' Home, to produce Chinese opera performances to raise funds for the home's daily operations. Coming from a well-to-do background, she persists in carrying the tradition of being charitable and continues to accept responsibility as chairperson for the Home. She has turned her passion for opera singing into a means to sustain her social work. No wonder, she earns acclaim as a role model for women in the fields she has embraced with gusto.

Chong Wan Oon, Steven

(张万安, Zhang Wan'an, 1957–)
Judge, Brunei

Dato Paduka Steven Chong Wan Oon is an important figure in the legal community in Brunei Darussalam, and his influence extends beyond this community, as he is well respected in the wider society of Brunei.

Steven Chong received his initial education in St George's School, Brunei Darussalam, and later furthered his studies in the United Kingdom where he attended Mid-Gloucestershire Technical College. He later completed his bachelor of arts degree (honours) in humanities in 1981 at the Dorset Institute of Higher Education. A year later, he was qualified as barrister of law of Lincoln's Inn, by the Inns of Court School of Law (London). By 1983, he was professionally qualified as an advocate and solicitor of the Supreme Court of Brunei Darussalam.

Chong has been a civil servant ever since he started work after the completion of his education in London. In 1987 he was assigned as the magistrate/registrar of the Magistrate Court of Brunei Darussalam, and then went through a series of consecutive promotions to posts such as senior magistrate/registrar of the Supreme Court of Brunei Darussalam (1989), chief magistrate/registrar of the Supreme Court of Brunei Darussalam (1991), judge of the Intermediate Court of Brunei Darussalam (1998), judicial commissioner of the Supreme Court of Brunei Darussalam (1999), high court judge of the Supreme Court of Brunei Darussalam (2001), Court of Appeal judge of the Supreme Court of Brunei Darussalam (ad hoc basis) and judge advocate of the Royal Brunei Armed Forces (2006).

Having been in the field of law for many years and met all kinds of people during this time, he has a good understanding of human nature — good enough to give fair and objective judgments at work. As a judge, he is always impartial in his judgments, and sound in points of both criminal and civil law, as well as procedure, evidence, and logic. Three of his cases are adequate examples: Hjh Rosmahwati bte Hj Bakar v Doni Bin Akup, Civil Appeal No. 13 of 2007, Court of Appeal of Brunei Darussalam; Haji Ahmad bin Haji Malai Besar and Mohammad Qahruddin bin Ahmad vs The London & Lancashire Insurance Co. Ltd. (Originating Summons no. 17 of 1998), Appeal from Registrar; and PP vs Edgar Puzone. E, alias Ibrahim bin Abdullah Puzone (Criminal Trail no. 12 of 2003). The first two are civil cases: he was one of the judges for the former, sitting in the Court of Appeal, the highest court in Brunei; and the high court judge hearing an appeal for the latter. The last case involved an accused facing a murder charge for stabbing and killing a woman. The chief justice (C.J.) and Steven Chong were the trial judges. They demonstrated their sound knowledge of law, evidence, and logic, denying the defendant's attempt to establish insanity as a defence and to escape any conviction. The judges were convinced that it was a premeditated and brutal murder and that the accused had a motive for killing the person — he had gone to the place carrying the knife with him to stab the victim and had the presence of mind to keep the knife out of sight until the attack. He knew what he was doing — and was convicted of the charge accordingly.

Chong did not achieve his current success in the Brunei legal world overnight. It was his effort and enthusiasm in his legal job that slowly put him at the highest peak of his career. As a judge, Chong is not only respected by the legal community, but also the whole Brunei society. He also set an example to the younger generation by proving to them that education is the foundation that maps a person's success. His life story emphasized that only with a strong education background and will can dreams be realized.

He is one of the few Chinese in Brunei who have earned three prestigious awards granted by the sultan and Yang Di-Pertuan of Brunei Darussalam, namely the Meritorious Service Medal (PJK) in 1989, the Most Blessed Order of Setia Negara Brunei Darussalam 4th Class (PSB) in 1995, and the Most Honourable Order of Seri Paduka Mahkota Brunei 2nd Class (DPMB), which carries the title, "Dato Paduka" in 2002.

Chong is married to Datin Paduka Magdalene Chong, a woman lawyer working in the same legal field as him. Magdalene Chong completed her bachelor of arts (Honours) in law at North East London Polytechnic, United Kingdom in 1979. She qualified as a barrister-at-law of Lincoln's Inn in July 1980. By 1987, she was professionally qualified asan advocate and solicitor of the Supreme Court of Brunei Darussalam.

Magdalene Chong has been counsel/deputy public prosecutor for the Attorney General's Chambers, Brunei Darussalam, since 1980. She became deputy senior counsel in 1986. Two years later, she was appointed registrar of marriages, assistant registrar of Companies, Business Names and Trade Marks. In 1989 she was promoted to the post of senior counsel. She received a further promotion in 1991 to become principal counsel. By 1996 she was head of Civil Division. Chong has been solicitor general since June 1998. In fact, she is also a member of several boards and committees, such as the Brunei Currency and Monetary Board, Board of Employees Trust Fund (TAP), Executive Board of the Retirement Fund, Executive Board of the Strategic Development Capital, and the Audit Committee.

Magdalene Chong is also a director in several companies, including Brooketon Sdn. Bhd., Royal Brunei Airlines Sdn. Bhd., Royal Brunei Trading Sdn. Bhd., Golden Arches (B) Sdn. Bhd., Royal Brunei Engineering Sdn. Bhd., Golden Wings (B) Sdn. Bhd. and Royal Brunei Technical Services Sdn. Bhd. (as alternate director).

For her contributions to the country, Datin Magdalene Chong has received several honours from the sultan and Yang Di-Pertuan of Brunei Darussalam, including the Meritorious Service Medal (PIKB) (1992), Most Honourable Order of Seri Paduka Mahkota Brunei 2nd Class (DPMB), which carries the title, "Dato Paduka" (1999), and Long Service Medal (2001).

Choo Hoey

(朱晖, Zhu Hui, 1934–)
Conductor, Singapore

Choo Hoey has been associated with the Singapore Symphony Orchestra since its founding in 1979. He received his music training at the Royal Academy of Music and graduated in 1955 with the Manns Memorial and Ernest Read prizes for conducting. He then went on to further his studies at the Conservatoire Royale de Musique in Brussels. He established a career as a visiting conductor throughout Europe and South America before being appointed music director of the Singapore Symphony Orchestra (SSO). During his seventeen years tenure, he gradually built up the orchestra and developed an extensive repertoire ranging from the early baroque to contemporary masterpieces. He was appointed conductor emeritus from July 1996.

Choo Hoey was born on 20 October 1934 in Palembang, Sumatra in Indonesia. His father, Choo Seng, a very keen music lover who played the violin and the flute, was an accounts clerk in government service and later became an English language teacher. Choo Hoey's initial exposure to music came from listening to symphonic works in his father's collection of old vinyl records. At a very young age, he was taught the rudiments of music and the violin by his father.

In 1945, after completing his primary education in Palembang, Choo Hoey continued his secondary education at The Chinese High School in Singapore. In 1947, he took up private violin tuition under Goh Soon Tioe, one of Singapore's most influential leading violin teachers who had trained in England. Choo Hoey passed Grade 8 of the Associated Board of the Royal Schools of Music violin examination, with distinction within two years. Having completed his high school education in The Chinese High School in 1950, he decided to further his music studies in England, with much encouragement from his parents. He arrived in August 1951 and enrolled at the Royal Academy of Music in London with the firm intention of becoming a conductor. As the academy stipulates that a conducting student must be able to perform more than one instrument, he continued his violin studies under David Martin, and took up the horn as his second instrument, first under Aubrey Brain, and then under Charles Gregory. His conducting teacher was Maurice Miles.

In 1954 he had the opportunity to attend the International Summer Academy in Salzburg, Austria. While there, he studied conducting under renowned conductor Igor Markevitch and violin under violinist André Gertler, former teacher of Goh Soon Tioe. He graduated from the Royal Academy of Music in violin and conducting in July 1955 and proceeded to win the Manns Memorial and Ernest Read prizes for conducting. During his Academy years, he was actively involved together with other students, in conducting and performing chamber works such as Stravinsky's The Soldier's Tale, Octet for Winds, and Dumbarton Oaks Concerto.

In 1957, to continue the violin lessons with Gertler, he went on to further his studies at the Royal Conservatory of Music in Brussels, Belgium. The following year, he got his first opportunity to conduct a chamber group comprising principal players of the National Orchestra of Belgium, in Stravinsky's The Soldier's Tale. Two weeks after this debut, he received a big break that all musicians dream of. He was offered the chance to stand in for the distinguished Spanish conductor, Ataulfo Argenta, who had been engaged to conduct the Belgium National Orchestra. It was unfortunate that he could not do this due to his untimely death, but this substitution at a moment's notice turned out to be a resounding success for everyone involved as the concert was performed to critical acclaim. As a result, Choo Hoey received an offer to lead the orchestra for a year starting in March 1959. During that year, as a young twenty-seven-year old conductor, Choo Hoey toured the Scandinavian countries. The concert reviews in the press were unanimous in their acclaim, a measure of their regard for his musical art and ability.

Choo Hoey's greatest triumph, perhaps, was his debut in London where he conducted the London Philharmonic Orchestra at the Royal Festival Hall in 1960. Fully aware of and extremely nervous about the ruthless and unscrupulous London critics, he managed to more than fulfil his conducting task and to surpass all expectations with impressive vitality and talent, demonstrating a deep understanding and affection for the music he was conducting. On 9 October 1961 he made his second appearance with the London Philharmonic Orchestra with Chinese pianist Fou T'song, performing Chopin's Piano Concerto, No. 2.

After a string of initial successes, Choo Hoey enjoyed a career as visiting conductor throughout Europe and South America from 1963 to 1968. In 1969, he settled in Athens, Greece, where he became the principal conductor of the Greek National Opera and was kept busy as a guest conductor of the Athens State Orchestra, Hellenic Radio and Television Symphony Orchestra, and Solanica State Orchestra. With these major symphony orchestras of Greece, he held the distinction of conducting numerous world premieres of contemporary Greek works. Many of these he recorded with the Hellenic Radio and Television Symphony Orchestra.

In 1979 he was invited to become the founding music director and resident conductor of the Singapore Symphony Orchestra. From the orchestra's modest beginnings, he gradually built it up and developed an extensive repertoire for it, ranging from the early baroque to contemporary masterpieces. In 1980, he also gave the then year-old Singapore Symphony Orchestra an added dimension to performing symphonic choral works by initiating the formation of the Singapore Symphony Chorus. On 13 June the chorus gave its inaugural concert, performing Brahms' A German Requiem in English. Upon stepping down as music director in July 1996, he was appointed conductor emeritus. By then, the orchestra had become a full-time professional orchestra with ninety-six members and is now regarded as a premier Asian orchestra, gaining recognition around the world. Under his direction, the orchestra went on four successful European tours, the debut being in 1985 to Scandinavia; the second in 1988 to Italy, Spain, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia; the third in 1991 to the United Kingdom, Greece, and Turkey; and the fourth in 1994 to France, Belgium, and Romania.

For his contribution to music in Singapore, he was awarded the Singapore Cultural Medallion in 1979, the Singapore Government Public Service Star in 1982, and was made an Honorary Doctor of Letters of the National University of Singapore in 1989. In 1997 he was appointed a "Chevalier des Arts et des Lettres" by the Government of France.

His career has taken him to most of the great music capitals of Europe, America, Latin America, Asia, and the former USSR. He has been a guest conductor with over sixty orchestras, including the London Symphony Orchestra, The London Philharmonic, the Orchestre de la Societe du Conservatoire de Paris, the Orchestra de la Suisse Romande, the Zurich Tonhalle, the Danish State Radio Orchestra, the Oslo Philharmonic, the Gothenburg Symphony Orchestra, the Orquesta Nacionale de Buenos Aires, Argentina, the Orquesta de Instituto Extension Musical in Santiago, Chile, the Central Philharmonic in Beijing, the Tokyo City Philharmonic, and the Hong Kong Philharmonic, and has collaborated with numerous renowned soloists.

Choo Hoey is married with two children and now resides in Greece.

Choo Seng Quee

(朱成贵, Zhu Chenggui, 1914–83)
Football player and coach, Singapore

Choo Seng Quee was one of the most respected, successful, yet controversial, football coaches in Singapore. He led the national side to successes in two Malaya Cup competitions (1964 and 1965) and one Malaysia Cup competition (1977). In an age of amateur football, he was never linked for long periods with a single team. He was constantly on the move — a peripatetic, yet iconic, figure. He was a rover and wanderer through troubled times, sometimes being deliberately provocative and rarely being an establishment conservative.

Born in Singapore on 1 December 1914, Choo enjoyed a forty-five-year relationship with football. In 1932, as a seventeen-year-old from Raffles Institution, he played in charity matches at the Jalan Besar stadium. Two years later he was selected to represent the Straits Chinese Football Association (SCFA) in second division league matches. His promotion to the first division team was rapid. In 1936 he became the football convenor for the Junior Civil Service Association. He also made his entry into the Malaya Cup games for Singapore.

In 1937 Choo represented Singapore in the Malayan Chinese Olympiad in Singapore. His finest competitive achievement, however, was a winner's medal in the 1937 Malaya Cup final victory when Singapore defeated Selangor, 2-1. More than just a player he became involved in administration and coaching. In 1939 he became a founder member of the Chinese Athletics club also known as Chung Wah. The team played charity matches to raise funds for the China Relief Fund. Chinese Athletics played friendly games against both community and military sides, often at Jalan Besar stadium.

Choo was a catalyst for change, pushing for club affiliation rules to be made more inclusive. Before 1940, small community teams were affiliated to senior associations, which in turn followed the lead of the parent body, the Singapore Amateur Football Association (SAFA). The Chinese Athletics club was created with the idea of avoiding the intermediate step of affiliating to the Singapore Chinese Football Association (SCFA). Choo's application to join SAFA was rejected in early 1941. This was the first of Choo's battles with the establishment.

After the Japanese Occupation, Choo, as secretary of Chinese Athletics, was urging officers from the British Military Administration to revive football in Singapore for local players by granting them access to the limited facilities available. This was a battle won because in October 1946, the Jalan Besar ground was derequisitioned and local sides could use the pitch on Tuesdays and Thursdays. Choo even published advertisements in the press seeking opponents for his team. Charity matches were organized from time to time. Choo devoted less time to playing and more to refereeing, coaching, and prompting changes in regulations governing participation and club affiliation. In 1946 the SCFA blocked the application of Choo's team to affiliate with the SAFA.

The following year, Choo was at the forefront of efforts to introduce an "open-door" policy whereby players could join any club, regardless of pre-existing communal arrangements. The controversial proposal was based on the assumption that the quality of football would improve if clubs could attract better players. However weaker players were also introduced and the standard of play in Singapore declined. In 1948 Chinese Athletics withdrew from the SCFA and successfully established itself as one of ten teams in a newly created SAFA league. Four of the teams were European, reflecting the ongoing presence of the military. The other six teams were communally based clubs.

Once the "open-door" policy had been introduced, Choo retired from serious play to focus on the demands of administrative work and coaching. He was even elected an honorary coach of the SCFA and an adviser to SAFA in 1949. Within a month he had outlined a rigorous schedule for the national team's progress towards potential Malaya Cup success. Shifting his focus to the national side, Choo resigned from the SCFA. In November 1949, he sought to create a Players' Association to look into the personal welfare of squad members. He was particularly concerned with the fitness and physical well-being of his charges. Ensuring an adequate diet had been a constant problem after the Japanese Occupation.

The 1950s proved to be a period of turmoil, change, and uncertainty. Choo stayed with Chinese Athletics until the end of year, but then made the first of a number moves in an attempt to secure a more enduring career as a coach — he joined the All-Indonesia Football Federation as a coach, a post that he retained until 1953. Choo became renowned as a writer of newspaper articles, and a coach eager to learn from the experiences of others, particularly those who had studied in the United Kingdom. He became a strong advocate of increasing the intensity of training — an approach that was not universally appealing to the players. In January 1958 he became a coach for the Football Association of Malaysia (FAM), enjoying employment on a month-to-month basis. His main task was to prepare the federation team for the Asian Games in Tokyo. He also helped individual states. Choo proclaimed that a revolution was needed to raise standards and suggested the establishment of a national soccer school in Malaya, and the introduction of centralized coaching. Again he was jousting with the authorities.

Plans were then made to send Choo to England to learn more from the professional teams there. These plans came to fruition only in 1961, when Choo departed for a six-month stint, courtesy of Burnley, Everton, and Sheffield United clubs. Choo made a good impression in England and became well qualified to introduce change into both the Malaysian and Singapore systems. His association with the FAM was redefined in 1963 when he was assigned the task of overseeing the national schools teams — in effect, a demotion. In 1964 Tengku Abdul Rahman, the Malaysian prime minister and president of the Football Association of Malaysia gave SAFA permission to use Choo as a coach for Singapore's Malaya Cup challenge. This was a major turning point for the man who was to become the first truly professional coach of the Singapore team.

Singapore won the Malaya Cup in 1964 and 1965, the first year of independence, under Choo Seng Quee. However his appointment as coach lasted less than a year. Sports such as football came under close government scrutiny and charges of mismanagement were levelled against SAFA. These proved difficult to resolve, so a new council was created. The Football Association of Singapore (FAS) was established in September 1965 with Choo as one of the coaches and a member of the selection panel. Very soon there were problems. At the 1965 SEAP Games there were allegations of gross behaviour and insubordination made against Choo and six of his players, resulting in suspensions. Choo only returned to the scene with the Reserves team a year later. Disputes continued into 1967, with the players demanding new uniforms and allowances. Then Singapore decided not to participate in the 1968 Malaysia Cup. So for Choo the local scene became the focal point.

By then, Choo Seng Quee was commonly known as "Uncle Choo". Always passionate about the game, unafraid of being confrontational, and extremely abrasive at times in his dealings with the players, he kept active in coaching. In 1969 he won the President's Cup with the Police team. A year later he was given the opportunity to coach four government units: the Police, the Military, the Vigilante Corps and the Special Constabulary. Absenteeism amongst players and internal wrangles involving administrators appeared to blight the progress of football. From 1973 Choo's name was linked with coaching attachments in Hong Kong, which he declined, West Irian, and then Tampines Rovers.

The year 1977 proved to be dramatic and climactic for Choo. Returning as the national coach, and with the help of the fabled "Kallang Roar", he led Singapore to an emotional victory in the final of the Malaysia Cup. The journey had been a painful one, then made worse by a player boycott, diabetes, and a serious foot infection. In September 1977 after gangrene had set in, his leg was amputated.

Choo Seng Quee was honoured with the Coach of the Year award in 1977. The following year he was awarded the Public Service Medal. Despite his physical condition, Uncle Choo remained committed to football. He coached the Johor team until January 1981. Choo passed away on 30 June 1983.

Choo Yeang Keat, Jimmy

(周仰杰, Zhou Yangjie, 1952–)
Designer, business figure, Malaysia

Jimmy Choo, the world famous shoe designer also known as the "World King of Shoes", is one of the most prominent representative of the shoemaking industry. Choo a Malaysian of Hakka Chinese descent, was born in Penang in 1952 into a family of shoemakers. In his early years, he learned to make shoes under the guidance of his father. After many years of hard work, he is now one of the world's most well known professional shoe designers. Even the former prime minister of Malaysia, Tun Mahathir Mohamad, always quoted him and considers him an example for all other Malaysians to follow.

His father, Choo Kee Yin, was a traditional shoemaker. Jimmy Choo is married to Rebecca Lee from Hong Kong and they have a son and a daughter. The Choos presently reside in London.

Choo only managed to complete his studies up to Primary Year 6 in Shih Chung Primary School due to financial constraints and then followed in his father's footsteps and started making shoes. He made his first shoe when he was eleven years old. Subsequently he became apprentice under the then "Penang Shoe King", Huang San Cai (黄三才) and another shoemaker Master Jin (金师傅). The skills he managed to acquire made him fall in love with the shoemaking business and in 1979 he enrolled in the Cordwainers's Technical College in London from which he graduated in 1983. The college is now part of the London College of Fashion. Choo has acknowledged that he worked part-time in restaurants and as a toilet cleaner at a shoe factory to help fund his college education.

Choo's humble beginnings can be traced back to his workshop in Hackney, East London, which he opened in 1986 by renting an old hospital building. He restricted himself to only handmade shoes. But he was not known then and life was difficult. He had no capital and did not have enough money even to buy materials. There were no banks that would give this struggling shoemaker any loans. He only managed to continue to struggle in the shoe business with help from some friends. However in these difficult years he managed to gain valuable experience.

His craftsmanship and designs soon became famous and he came to the limelight of international fame when his creations were featured in a record eight pages in Vogue magazine in 1988. Patronage from the late Princess Diana, Princess of Wales, from 1990 onward further boosted Choo's image. His shoes were favoured by the Princess of Wales, who would buy one style in several colours for evening wear and to blend with her day suits. Jimmy Choo has lost count of the number of shoes he made for Princess Diana. This made him well known among the rich and famous and his shoes became synonymous with the footwear of Oscar's winners and famous actresses. Choo's clients include royalty, film stars, pop stars, and many other celebrities.

Choo is no longer directly associated with the Jimmy Choo ready-to-wear design house which he founded in 1996. He now concentrates his efforts on Jimmy Choo couture, which produces limited edition of high-class handmade shoes. He is also the adviser of London famous restaurant, Awana, which promotes Malaysian cuisine.

With such a stellar career, he has been the recipient of many Malaysian and International awards. In 2000, he was bestowed a state award carrying the title Dato by the Sultan of Pahang for his achievements. The following year he was conferred an Order of British Empire (OBE) by the queen of England, Queen Elizabeth II, in recognition of his services to the shoe and fashion industry in the United Kingdom. In addition, in 2004 he was also awarded the Darjah Setia Pangkuan Negeri honour by the Yang di-Pertua Negeri of his home state of Penang, which also carries the title of "Dato". In 2007, the Ministry of Culture, Art and Heritage, Malaysia, awarded him a special certificate for his contribution in promoting Malaysia internationally.

In recognition of his contributions he was awarded a fellowship by the University of the Arts London, which conferred him the use of the title "professor". Today, Choo is a spokesman for the British Council, the ambassador for footwear education, and a visiting professor at the London College of Fashion. He is also the third person after Tunku Abdul Rahman and Selangor Sultan Sharafuddin Idris Syah, to be awarded the title of "Freedom of the City of London" by Queen Elizabeth II in 2006.

In life his mottos were: "Hard work", "Be meticulous", "Patience", "Dare to dream", "Never easily to be defeated", "Don't be calculative", and "Anger control". He always follows the philosophy "Ask if you do not know". According to him, his success is due to his willingness to accept other people's criticisms. He believes that there are others better than him and stresses that one should not stop learning even up to old age. He is passionate in his work. "If you dare to dream and [are] willing to put in efforts, then success is on the way. Love your job passionately and don't be calculative." He is not afraid of being taken advantage of by others because to him, it is a learning process. "If you don't give, you are not able to receive. Whatever you do, don't let fears control you. [You] Must be far-sighted and adventurous". These are some of his famous quotes.

His shoemaking secret has always been that a pair of good shoes must fit the owner's feet. His perfectionist craftsmanship is displayed in every simple detail, which is never overtly fashionable, yet elegant. Jimmy Choo has managed to grasp the importance of comfort in footwear and, with his numerous strengths, he has made his mark in the international shoe designing industry, on par with the Versaces and Armanis of the fashion world.

Choong Ewe Beng, Eddy

(庄友明, Zhuang Youming, 1931–)
World badminton player, businessman, Malaysia

Eddy Choong Ewe Beng won over 300 national and international badminton titles between 1950 and 1966. He also partnered his brother, David Choong, to win several badminton men's doubles titles, including the prestigious All-England Badminton Tournament. Eddy was captain of the Malayan team that retained the Thomas Cup in 1955. But in 1958 Malaya lost the cup to Indonesia.

He was born on 29 May 1931 in Penang. He comes from the family of Datuk Choong Lye Hock who owned oil and rice mills in Alor Star. As one of the pioneering and most prominent millers in the country, the family has extensive business in Kedah's rice trade that goes back to the late 19th century. Among its businesses are the Ban Hock Bee Rice Mill and the Ban Heng Bee Rice Mill. Choong Lye Hock's son, Datuk Choong Eng Hye, who succeeded him, bought properties in the Jesselton area on Penang island. Eddy Choong is the third son of Choong Eng Hye.

It was this background of family wealth that allowed Choong the time and resources to train as a world class badminton player and later to support the development of the game in Penang and Malaysia.

Choong completed his secondary education at the Penang Free School. He picked up badminton at the age of seven in 1937, and won his first title at fifteen. He followed that up with the Penang state title two years later. At nineteen, Choong won the national mixed doubles title. In 1950 he left to study law at the Middle Temple.

He played in the All-England championships between 1951 and 1957, and in all qualified for twelve All-England finals. The All-England tournament was considered a world championship event then. Choong won the singles title in 1953, 1954, 1957 and the doubles with his brother David in 1951, 1952, and 1953. He won titles in the Denmark Open, the French Open, the US Open, the Dutch Open, the Scottish Open, the Irish International, and the Malayan Open. Together he and elder brother David, a fine tactician with whom he won three All-England doubles titles, were described as enlivening a rather moribund post-war London badminton scene.

Choong was in the 1955 Malayan Thomas Cup team which retained the world championship. He captained the Malayan team which lost the Thomas Cup to Indonesia in 1958. Choong lost both his singles matches and was blamed by the president of the Badminton Association of Malaya, Heah Joo Seang, for the defeat. At the official dinner after the tie, BAM president Heah Joo Seang launched a bitter attack on the Malayan team, accusing the members of not training hard enough. Choong claimed that he was suffering from indigestion before his matches and had played on an empty stomach.

Standing at 1.62 metre (5 ft 4 ins), Choong compensated for his lack of height by his speed, power, and accuracy. He had fluent strokes, high lobs, and accurate placement of the shuttle. He could lift himself to remarkable heights and unleash powerful smashes. His footwork allowed him to retrieve brilliantly and return difficult shots.

He continued in competitive badminton, winning the Malayan Open singles in 1960 and in 1966, at the age of thirty-six, captured the doubles title with Tan Aik Huang as partner. He remains active in developing local and international interest in badminton, and he sits on various badminton committees.

Choong also masterminded compatriot Tan Aik Huang's success over Erland Kops in 1966 and became the coach to the successful Malaysian national team that regained the Thomas Cup from Indonesia. He was also invited to be the team manager and coach for the national All-England team and the national All-Danish team.

Frank with his opinions, Choong was a respected critic of the way badminton affairs were organized in Penang. In the Badminton Association of Malaysia (BAM), he served as technical and tactical adviser, and was also on its Planning and Development Committee and its Coaching and Training Committee.

He was vice-president of BAM, Penang, and was in the state's coaching and training committee.

In 1986 Choong was honoured by the International Badminton Federation with the meritorious service award, in recognition for his service to the development of the game in Malaysia. In 1997 Eddy Choong was inducted into the Badminton Hall of Fame. He was further honoured by the Badminton World Federation, which named the "Best Player of the Year" award after him.

Choong has written three books including, The Phoenix Book on Badminton, Badminton — For Beginners, and Badminton, published by W.G. Foyle, London, in 1955. Badminton recounts his own experiences when competing against world-class players. In 1987 he contributed regularly to a column on badminton in the Star newspaper.

He regards Wong Peng Soon as one of the greatest players in badminton, "If ever there was, or will be, a player who at the age of 37 could still win the world's most coveted title [the All-England], I will take my hat off to him." He added that Peng Soon taught him deception in the game. Wong defeated Choong at the 1955 All-England final to prevent the latter from winning the title thrice in a row.

Choong took to go-kart racing in the late 1960s and the 1970s when he ended his badminton playing days. In the 1960s, he was Malaysia's go-kart, hill climb, and grass-track champion. Quite amazingly he only started his motor-racing hobby when he was thirty-three years old. "One is never too old to start anything," says Choong who gave up motor-racing at the age of forty-seven after collecting more than 1,000 trophies. Although he has shelves of trophies to showcase his success in go-karting, these do not bring him the same satisfaction as those he won in badminton.

In September 1994 he became the first Asian to receive the Herbert Scheele Trophy for his contribution to the development of badminton.

He was listed among the "1,000 makers of sport in the millennium" in the Sunday Times, London, in 1996 and was the only Malaysian to make the list. "Labelled as 'mighty midget' and 'pocket rocket' ", Eddy Choong helped transform the badminton world in the 1950s as part of a new Asian wave in a previously European dominated sport.

The Olympic Council of Malaysia nominated Eddy Choong as one of the Famous Five Athletes of the twentieth century.

Choong lists himself as a property developer. He is chairman of Choongs Sdn. Bhd., Hock Hin Brothers Sdn. Bhd., Belle Isle and Co. Sdn. Bhd., Choong Lim Lim Sdn. Bhd., and Ho Kuat Sdn. Bhd.

He also served as chairman of the Penang Rate-payers Association, the Penang Housing Developers' Association between 1993 and 1995, and was the vice-chairman of the Malaysian Kennel Association. Choong holds strong views on heritage conservation and development. He was quoted in 1995 as being critical of the Penang Municipal Council for "designating private properties as heritage buildings at its whims and fancies". Eddy Choong claimed that many such buildings were underutilized and sitting on large tracts of prime land. "We cannot just look at beauty which is subjective but also the economic viability and social needs. If developed the land will house many more families and resolve the housing shortage in the state."

A wealthy man through his family business, Choong maintained his own badminton hall in Green Lane where facilities for training young players are offered. A number of overseas players spent time training in Penang with him. In 1992 together with the Choong family, he built a nine-court badminton hall at Bukit Dunbar costing RM1.5 million. Named Badminton International Penang, the hall is open to the public.

His family comprises wife Maggie Thean Sun Lin and children Finn Choong, Lionel Choong, Jorgen Choong and Antonio Choong.

Choy Su-Mei, Elizabeth

(née Elizabeth Yong, 蔡杨素梅, Cai Yang Sumei, 1910–2006)
War heroine, teacher, Singapore

Celebrated Second World War heroine, Elizabeth Choy was the first woman in Singapore's Legislative Council and the only female member there in 1951. She was also the first principal as well as teacher at the Singapore School for the Blind. She is best remembered as a multifaceted woman of spirit who was imprisoned for 200 days by the conquering Japanese forces in Singapore in 1943 for allegedly helping British internees. Her fortitude, courage, and indomitable spirit that caught the imagination of the world when she was declared a war heroine had their roots in her formative years and becoming a war heroine never went to her head.

Born to progressive thinking parents in Kudat, British North Borneo (modern day Sabah) on 29 November 1910, Elizabeth was influenced by the missionary work conducted by her great-grandparents, and strove to be of use to others throughout her life. After completing her education with her paternal grandfather at the Kudat village school, she furthered her education in 1921–29 at St Monica's School in Sandakan. She was a very adept pupil, and by 1927, was teaching the lower classes whilst studying. In December 1929, she came to Singapore to further her studies at the Convent of the Holy Infant Jesus in Victoria Street. Once again, she performed well academically and obtained the Prize of Honour in her first year of school in December 1930. However, her academic life was not to last, for the death of her mother in 1931 and the onset of the Great Depression meant that she had to leave school to raise her six younger siblings. Thus, she gave up the possibility of a college education (and a scholarship) so she could work to see her younger siblings through school. This selfless act was indicative of Choy's giving and kind nature, as well as her tenacious attitude towards life.

These were the same traits that would result in her capture by the Japanese forces, but also in her recovery upon her release. She came to the notice of the Japanese forces during the Occupation when she worked as a canteen operator with her husband at the Mental Hospital, then known as Miyako Hospital and the precursor to Woodbridge Hospital. As most of the patients there were British soldiers, Elizabeth and her husband secretly brought food, medicine, money, messages, and even radios for them. Her husband was caught on 29 October 1943 by the Japanese, and she was arrested on 15 November. Despite severe torture, electric shocks, starvation, and interrogation by the Japanese Secret Police (the Kempeitai), she never admitted to being a British sympathiser and would not reveal anything. It was not until 200 days had passed that she was released.

Her fortitude and courage ensured that she did not emerge from the torture and confinement a broken woman. She successfully rallied and was invited to England as a war heroine for being the only local woman to have been incarcerated for such an extended period. In her four years there, she took the opportunity to meet Queen Elizabeth, study domestic science at Northern Polytechnic, take up teaching at a London Council school, as well as pose for art students and artists including the sculptress, Dora Gordine. She also conducted a lecture tour on Malaya in the United States and Canada at the request of the Foreign Office in London for which she disregarded fear of the Emergency in the Malay Peninsula and first went on a tour of the country so as to understand it better.

When she finally returned to Singapore in December 1949, her past as a war heroine and her natural gentility led several people to persuade her to stand for elections in December 1950 for the West Ward or Cairnhill constituency. She did so under the Labour Party, founded in 1948 by V. J. Mendis. Despite her electoral loss in the 1951 City Council elections to the Progressive Party representative, Soh Ghee Soon, she was nominated into the Legislative Council in 1951. This move made her the only female member to sit in the Legislative Council, and she remained in that position for five years. During this time, she represented Singapore at the coronation of Queen Elizabeth II in June 1953. After her failure at the Queenstown constituency in an election in the mid-1950s, she resigned from politics and dedicated herself to teaching. Her rationale was that she could touch more lives and contribute much more to society as a teacher rather than a politician.

Indeed, her unflagging spirit, fortitude, and constance continually shone through when she joined the women's auxiliary of the Singapore Volunteers Corps, and expanded the organization by recruiting many of her friends and colleagues. As a teacher, she tried to imbue her students at the Singapore School for the Blind (1956–60) with her verve for life and unshakeable fortitude. Following her tenure at the School for the Blind, she moved to Saint Andrew's Junior School in 1960 and was promoted to deputy principal in 1964. Sadly, she succumbed to pancreatic cancer and died on 14 September 2006 soon after she was diagnosed. Despite her illness, she never lost her spirit and refused treatment, preferring instead to let nature take its course.

Elizabeth Choy's courage and fortitude in adversity make her an ideal role model in today's world in which we are constantly besieged with threats from within and without our societies. She should provide us with the inspiration to remain true to ourselves and loyal to worthy causes to improve society in an every changing world.

Chua, Antonio Roxas

(蔡文华, Cai Wenhua, 1913–78)
Sugar king, banker, community leader, Philippines

Antonio Roxas Chua is recognized as the Philippine Sugar King an ethnic Chinese leader who pushed for the jus soli principle for citizenship, business leader, and the promoter of building Operation Barrio Schools in remote areas for the indigenous population.

Born on 13 November 1913 in Jinjiang, Fujian, China, Chua was only eight years old when he migrated to the Philippines with his uncle, Chua Yu (founder of the renowned Kim Kee Chua Yu Company). The senior Chua owned a small business buying and selling sugar and rice and the young Roxas worked as a labourer for him carrying sacks of sugar on his back, and gradually learning the ropes of the business until he was appointed general manager of the company. Later in his life, Roxas Chua would recall those days with great fondness and boast how he could carry a 100-lb sack of sugar effortlessly.

Chua's uncle enrolled him at the Anglo-Chinese School (now the Philippine Tiong Se Academy) in Manila, and later, sensing his strong potential in business, encouraged him to pursue a degree in commerce at the Jose Rizal College.

Dubbed the sugar king of the Philippines, Chua was the leader in sugar manufacturing and trading in the country with his ARCA sugar. He was also elected president of the Philippine Sugar Industry Association and helped stabilize the price of sugar by seeing to it that the Philippines continued to get preferential treatment in the export of sugar even after the expiration of the Laurel-Langley Agreement, which gave preferential tariffs for Philippine sugar exports to the United States, in 1974. Aside from sugar, he also continued the rice trading business started by his uncle and was elected to head the Rice Traders Association as well.

Chua was also known for his venture into commercial banking, a relatively unknown and challenging field to get into in the 1950s. In 1955, together with his partner, Chester Babst, he established the Pacific Banking Corporation. The first day the bank opened its business, it received close to 3 million pesos in unsolicited deposits, a testimony of the trust of the business community towards Roxas Chua. Ranking 16th when it first started its operations, the bank had, by 1972, become seventh among commercial banks in the country. The investment arm of the bank was a pioneer and a leader at the time and the bank played a crucial role in supporting the growth of business and industry in the country.

Besides being recognized as a sharp businessman, Chua was also well respected in the Chinese-Filipino community for his leadership of the Federation of Filipino-Chinese Chamber of Commerce and Industry Inc. from the 1970–74, especially in 1972 when President Ferdinand E. Marcos declared martial law. As president of the federation, Chua advocated two highly important programmes. One was the further integration of the Chinese in mainstream society — which he considered as the most important work, and highest ideal of the federation. The second was the continued growth and development of the next generation of Chinese Filipinos.

To push forward the concept of integration during his term, the federation would invite Filipino guests from other chambers of commerce and civic organizations to take part in discussions and dialogues. And, to break down barriers further all meetings were conducted in English, a practice considered a breakthrough in gatherings among members of the ethnic Chinese community.

Also, to strengthen friendship with Filipinos, Chua strongly pushed for the expansion of Operation Barrio Schools, a project started in 1960 involving the donation of two-classroom buildings in areas where classrooms are most needed. During his term, a then record-breaking seventy-eight schools were built. As the federation's flagship project, Operation Barrio Schools is the longest running and biggest private sector-led development programme focused on educational infrastructure in the country. It has built about 3,000 classrooms all over the Philippines as of 2010.

During his term Chua also established the Youth Integration Committee (青合组), reasoning, "If the next generation is apathetic to the Chinese-Filipino community, what hope is there?". It was patterned after the Jaycees (Junior Chamber of Commerce) and set up to prepare the young generation to take over the helm from the first-generation leaders of the federation.

Less known to the public was Chua's role in the establishment of the federation itself back in 1954. It was a tribute to Chua's youthful dynamism and dedication that he was chosen (he was just forty years old then) to head the organizational committee (各途商会理事长联谊会) in 1953 that steered the different chambers of commerce and key personalities in the Chinese community through the turbulent and difficult months of settling differences to come up with a common agenda and purpose to organize the federation.

As president of the Rice Traders Association, Chua did his best to stabilize the price of rice, the basic staple of Filipino families. When the Philippines was faced with a severe rice shortage in April 1971, he assisted the government in securing a loan from Taiwan of 900,000 cavans of rice (50 kg per cavan), payable in rice at 7.5 per cent, over a period of ten years. Not only did the shipment avert a severe rice crisis, but it also helped cement the long-standing relationship between the Philippines and Taiwan (at the time still recognized as the Republic of China by the Philippine Government). On 2 August 1968, a 7.3 magnitude earthquake hit the Philippines and caused the collapse of the six-storey Ruby Tower in Binondo, where more than 500, mostly Chinese, were either killed or injured. Chua, as executive vice-president of the federation, headed the rescue and relief committee for the victims.

In June 1971, the Constitutional Convention was convened to revise, amend, and basically redraft the Philippine Constitution that was drawn up back in 1935. The government realized the urgent need to have a new constitution that would respond to the challenges of the times because the conditions of the country before the war and under the colonial administration had drastically changed. One of the urgent constitutional provisions that needed to be revised was Article III on citizenship. The old constitution provided for the jus sanguinis principle in acquiring Filipino citizenship where children, even if they were born and grew up in the Philippines, could only have the citizenship of their fathers.

The Federation of the Filipino-Chinese Chambers of Commerce, under Chua's leadership, set up a major constitutional convention committee (法规委员会) to lobby staunchly for the jus soli principle of citizenship to enable those born, bred, and educated in the country to become Filipino citizens automatically. Chua was invited to be a resource person in the convention hearings and, in his speech titled, "Assimilation for Posterity", given before the committee on citizenship of the Constitutional Convention on 24 November 1971, stressed that integrating the local Chinese into mainstream society was the best way to tap their full potential in nation building, and that the best way to make the Chinese feel they belong is through the principle of jus soli where Chinese born on Philippine soil are considered Filipino citizens.

Although the new 1971 Constitution failed to adopt the jus soli principle of citizenship, the debates and arguments for easy access to citizenship set the stage for those who were born, raised and educated in, and knew no other country except the Philippines.

In 1975, to prepare for diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China, then President Marcos, through a presidential decree, allowed for easy access to citizenship by administrative means (in contrast to the long, tedious, and expensive judicial process).

Chua passed away on 31 October 1978. He was survived by his wife and seven children. In 2008, a hall of dedication was named in honor of Antonio Roxas Chua at the Kaisa Heritage Center. His life may best be summed up in his own words — "There are just too many wealthy people in this society, yet knowing how to make money does not make you a success and does not make you capable. It is only the person who knows how to use his wealth wisely, how to use his money meaningfully [that] can be considered as capable and as successful."

Chua Ek Kay

(蔡逸溪, Cai Yixi, 1947–2008)

Artist, art educator, Singapore

Chua Ek Kay was one of the most respected and sought after Singapore artists who successfully bridged the gap between Chinese tradition and Western art. He was the first Chinese ink painter to win the United Overseas Bank Painting of the Year Award in 1991. He began his art education under leading master ink painter Fang Chang Tien of the Shanghai School, but later developed a keen interest in Western art. The ability to blend traditional Chinese art forms with Western theories and techniques eventually resulted in Chua's paintings being recognized as uniquely individualistic and he acquired a prominent place in the arts scene. He received the Cultural Medallion Award in 1999.

Chua Ek Kay was born on 21 November 1947 in Chenghai, a Chaozhou county east of Shantou in Guangzhou Province, China. He was the eldest of seven children and grew up in China, later joining his family in Singapore at the age of seven in 1953. His father was a bookkeeper in the import and export business, and they lived in Liang Seah Street off Beach Road. His childhood memories of the area had a deep influence in his work and he made the district's street scenes and old shophouses a regular subject of his paintings.The year he won the United Overseas Bank (UOB) Painting of the Year Award, the annual competition was in its tenth year and it was Chua's brush painting of old buildings in Liang Seah Street, entitled, My Haunt, that won him the prize. Chua's fascination with old shophouses lies in their architectural beauty, which he claims does not fade with time. His Singapore Street Scenes series of paintings has not only become a trademark of his paintings, but is also a major body of works that evokes nostalgia and captures part of Singapore's history.

Chua was exposed to Chinese cultural influences and art from early childhood. Soon after he arrived in Singapore, he began calligraphy lessons under his father Chua Ming Tiang, as a form of basic literacy building and character development. Later he was placed under the tutelage of Chua Tim Huang, a calligrapher well known in the Chua clan. By then, he was attending Kong Yong Primary School. His interest in calligraphy continued to grow during his Catholic High School days. Under the influence of sculptor Shui Tit Sing, calligrapher, poet, and classical scholar Li Huai Qiong, and classical scholar and poet Ma Zhong Siang, he cultivated an interest in classical Chinese poetry writing, Chinese literature, and the aesthetics of calligraphy. Often, he would transform his own poems into calligraphic script and paintings, adhering to the Chinese literati tradition of showcasing a combination of poetry, calligraphy, and painting, which has prevailed since the Sung Dynasty (960–1279 A.D).

After graduating from Catholic High School in 1967, Chua continued to pursue his interest in calligraphy and was active in poetry circles. In 1975 he began traditional Chinese ink painting and seal-carving under the tutelage of Fan Chang Tien, a master who could trace his artistic heritage to the Shanghai School. For a period of almost eleven years, until Chua left for Hong Kong for business opportunities, Fan's influence on him was marked. He not only imparted to Chua strong fundamentals of ink and brush, but also an aesthetic principle that emphasized the personal cultivation of the mind and the spirit.

During the same period, Chua was an active member of the Hwa Hun Art Society which was founded in 1973 by Fan's students. Members of the group met regularly at Chua's residence between 1977 and 1985 to hone their techniques in ink painting and share their experiences. Through Fan, he was also introduced to other pioneer artists such as poet and calligrapher Pan Shou.

By the early 1980s, Chua began showing his work in group exhibitions and participated regularly in the annual National Day Art Exhibitions. In 1985 at the age of thirty-eight, after taking on a variety of jobs for seventeen years that included running a restaurant, he quit his last position as a manager of a garment factory to become a full-time artist. He supplemented his income by teaching private students at the National University of Singapore's Extra-Mural Studies Department. In 1988 he held his first solo exhibition in Chinese ink painting and calligraphy at the Chinese Chamber of Commerce. This humble success inspired him to further his art though formal art education. In 1989, he decided to enrol in the Advanced Diploma course in LaSalle College of the Arts. The time he spent in LaSalle was significant because Chua was able to incorporate new compositional strategies and creative impulses to his already proficient traditional Chinese ink painting skills. In 1991, one year after he graduated, Chua won the grand prize in the UOB Painting of the Year Competition. The winning entry, My Haunt, was an ink composition of shophouses and an alley in Seah Street, signifying a switch from mountains and lakes to his own local environment in his paintings while retaining the vivid expressiveness of the bold ink and brush free style of the Shanghai School. In the solo exhibition, Duality and Tension, in 1992, Chua continued to forge his own artistic identity by reinventing in the ink medium and embracing Singapore street scenes as the core subject, together with a small selection of works inspired by visits to Central Java and Spain.

Feeling that he had not reached the end of his learning process, Chua proceeded to pursue a Bachelor of Fine Arts degree at the University of Tasmania on a study grant from the National Arts Council in 1993. Though he only took one year to complete the programme, the short one-year period not only allowed him to deepen his understanding of contemporary art forms and theories, but also provided him with the space to reassess his ink practice. By then, he was ready to pursue a Master degree in Fine Arts at the University of Western Sydney. For the next eighteen months, with encouragement from a Sydney-based, Singapore-born faculty member, Cheo Chai Hiang, he continued to focus on the medium of ink-and-brush and explored strategies of making ink more contemporary. For the final assessment, he produced fifteen works, including two landmark works, Lotus Pond-Becoming and Being and Song of Cicada.

After completing his studies in Australia in 1996, he returned to Singapore and held his third solo exhibition the following year, sharing the new artistic directions taken in his studies and revisiting the familiar Singapore street scenes he had put aside for three years. Interestingly, the old shophouses and Singapore street scenes constantly occupied a main part of his body of creative work. The first series was produced in 1985 and he revisited the theme time and again with renewed insights and fresh approaches. As seen in his solo exhibitions Street Scenes Revisited (2001) and Chua Ek Kay Singapore Street Scenes-Evoking Memories (2007), the subject matter of his paintings do not appear to vary much from those before, but each revisit was a re-examination of his artistic growth, in terms of his thinking on art, his grasp of technique, or his evolving new approach. In fact, these artistic characteristics are equally evident in his other chosen subject matters or elements which inspired him. The Archipelago series (1999), the Reflections series (1998–2006) and the Chao series (2007), are, perhaps, examples of how he transformed his imagination to new conceptual dimensions, reducing the details with increasing levels of simplification and symbolization. Despite this, he never lost the fundamentals of Chinese ink and brush painting he had studied in his early days, even as his artistic style continued to evolve.

In addition to the 1991 UOB 10th Painting of the Year Award Grand Prize, Chua was the Juror's Choice of the Philip Morris Group of Companies ASEAN Art Awards in 1998. The following year, he was conferred the prestigious Cultural Medallion award by the Singapore Government in recognition of his artistic refinement as an artist and his contribution to Singapore Art.

Chua was married with one child. He died in Singapore in 2008.

Chua, Gerry

(蔡自强, Cai Ziqiang, 1962–)

Entrepreneur, pastry king, Philippines

The success of the simple pastry snack, hopia, is largely due to the innovativeness of Gerry Chua, now known as the "hopia king". Made with a local ingredient, the hopia was propelled to snack stardom and is now sought after by Filipinos all over the world.

Hopia (好饼), a Chinese term that literally means "good pastry", has been a part of Filipino children's growing up years before the advent of the hamburger and cake shops. Comprising a flaky crust with a traditional mung bean filling, this lowly snack food has now evolved into a household word and a favourite gift for Filipinos abroad hankering after Philippine food. Chua, who was born on 1 March 1962, recalls that when he first took over the family business, Eng Bee Tin, in 1987, its hopia was a little too tough to eat and there was not much filling inside. Because of this, customers and suppliers were put off. Everyday, Eng Bee Tin's cheques would bounce and they had many debts.

"However, I was filled with hope and determination that one day our business would grow," Chua recounts. That day came at a time of sweltering heat in the metropolis. Needing some fresh coolers, he opted for the most common way — ice cream. He made his way to the local supermarket and talked to one of the sales ladies. Asked for her favorite flavour, she replied, "Ube (purple yam)."

That very short conversation sparked Chua's innovation — the ube-flavoured hopia. From baking to packaging it and then selling it in the provinces, Chua never once thought of giving up. Having no money to buy the sugar or flour and no helper to assist him did not see him crumble from the frustration he sometimes felt. Even his friends were telling him that his hopia ube would not click with customers, but all Chua said was, "Let's see."

After buying six jars of ube, Chua travelled to Pampanga (approximately 70 km from Manila City) to get a better grasp of ube making under the tutelage of the best ube makers in the industry. He then attempted to market his ube-hopia abroad, but the response was not enthusiastic. Eng Bee Tin still did not flourish.

The hopia has been around since 1912 and has always been known as a tough cookie to eat — hard from the crust to the centre — and that was why it did not gain popularity with customers. Chua would recount in numerous interviews that throwing the pastry against the wall would not make a dent in the rock hard hopia.

Chua experimented with different ways of grinding the root crop and incorporating it into the hopia pastry. Then, he experimented on various ways of making the hopia's texture more creamy. The end product is a flaky crust with a very sweet and creamy centre.

Eng Bee Tin's sales figures are currently a staggering 4,000–5,000 packs of hopia a day just in two flavours — hopia mongo (with mung bean) and hopia ube. The rest of the ten flavours' combined sales also average 3,000 packs a day. Added to those numbers is the figure from year-round sale of tikoy (年糕 a sweet rice cake normally eaten only during the lunar new year) and Chua's innovation — sugar-free flavoured tikoy (corn, strawberry, and ube flavoured).

Today, hopia ube is a star. It is a regular snack food, and for a nation that values morning and afternoon snacks, this is an exalted position indeed.

Eng Bee Tin's tikoy is also fast becoming popular. Though it is traditionally made and eaten only during the lunar new year, Chua decided to make the Chinese rice cake available all year round, and in a variety of flavours. As with the hopia, tikoy has gone beyond the confines of Chinatown and is now accepted and looked for within the mainstream community all year round. Even overseas Filipino workers can be seen with boxes of hopia and tikoy as they head for work abroad.

With several Eng Bee Tin outlets all over the metropolis, with their tikoy, bread and cakes, Filipino treats that have evolved in different scrumptious flavours, plus his processed seafood and frozen products, Chua can count on his business continuing to soar. His influence in Philippine gastronomic delights through his business has made Eng Bee Tin a household name directly associated with hopia.

Chua feels extremely proud for using a traditional Filipino ingredient to make something Filipinos have liked for years. No other nation has come out with a delicacy such as this. Only the Filipinos have hopia ube to be proud of. The product is truly a blend of the best of the worlds of the Chinese and the Filipino.

Chua has been a volunteer firefighter since he was sixteen. (The Chinese-Filipino community established a network of volunteer fire fighters in the 1960s to respond to fire alarms because government fire fighters were not enough.) He was president of the Association of Philippine Volunteer Fire Brigades (APVFB) from 2005 to 2007. He also set up Café Mezzanine, with its proceeds donated to fire fighters.

"It's all for public service and besides, we can't bring our money with us when we die," he says.

His godfather encouraged him to become a fire fighter when he turned sixteen. Just like his hopia business with its ups and downs, his experience as a volunteer fireman is no different. One of his fingers was ripped off on his second day in this role!

He had rushed into a fire without any formal preparation. All he had with him was his suit. After the incident, he decided to be more careful with his actions and made sure that other fire volunteers attend workshops, seminars, or briefings on being properly equipped.

After he stepped down from his presidency of the APVFB, he continued working for the welfare of fire volunteers.

With the APVFB, Chua conceptualized and popularized the first nationwide fire alert communication system. Known as "Text Fire", the system allows members to give an alert immediately when a fire occurs, and after verification, this information is again disseminated to all members — and everything is done through "texting" or SMS. The system enables firemen to respond immediately and help put out fires more promptly. It also enables Text Fire members to avoid passing through places where a fire is currently raging. Membership to Text Fire is free for anyone and membership recruitment is done simply by registering a mobile phone number with Text Fire.

All these successes stem from his upbringing. He and his siblings all grew up without nannies or house helpers, as is common in Chinese-Filipino households. They have to be responsible enough for themselves to face life's adversities. It was his mother who taught him the rudiments of cooking — things that he can still apply now in his own hopia kitchen. Eng Bee Tin hopia is now a legend in the Philippine food scene.

Chua Kaw Bing

(蔡求明, Cai Qiuming, 1953–)

Paediatrician, virologist, Malaysia

Chua is the fourth in a family of six children. He was born on 13 August 1953 to a rubber-tapper family in Bertam Ulu, a small remote village in Malacca. His mother imparted to him and all his siblings the values of Christian faith — hard work and integrity. As the family was poor, Chua spent most of his childhood supplementing the family income by helping out on the farm, carrying water from the communal well, and collecting branches of dried rubber trees for cooking. Despite these hardships, he regards his childhood as interesting and carefree. He attributes his love of science to the Christian value of serving humanity, and to the fact that he grew up in an environment surrounded by nature.

Chua received his primary school education in the Bertam Ulu village school. As the village was small and remote, the school was run by three teachers and a headmaster. Due to the poverty of the villagers, many children did not pursue education beyond primary school, so as to assist their parents on the farms or in tapping rubber trees. Chua would have had the same fate as these children had not the headmaster of the village school convinced Chua's mother to allow him to continue secondary school education in Malacca town, a considerable distance from Bertam Ulu. The young Chua had to wake up at 5:00 am during school days to walk or cycle 2.5 miles of laterite road before catching a bus.

Chua has fond memories of the Malacca Chinese High School, especially the fishing experience during breaks at one of the many paddy fields surrounding the school. He attended Form Six (pre-university) classes in Melaka High School, where he was oblivious to the lessons in class and frequently indulged in sports and outdoor games. This did not hinder him from obtaining excellent results in the Cambridge Higher School Certificate examination though, and he was given the school's highest award, the Dr Thambipillay All-Rounder Award, and a recommendation to read Medicine at the University of Malaya.

Chua graduated with bachelor of medicine and bachelor of surgery (MBBS) degrees from the University of Malaya in 1979, after which he worked as a house officer and medical officer at the University of Malaya teaching-hospital. He obtained his Paediatric Specialist Certification from the Royal College of Medicine in the United Kingdom in 1983. The following year, he obtained his master of medicine degree from the National University of Singapore, and worked as a paediatrician at the Chinese Maternity Hospital. The University of Malaya awarded him the doctor of medicine degree in 1998. Consequently he became a member of the Royal College of Pathologists in 1999, and earned a Doctor of Philosophy degree with distinction from the University of Malaya in 2002.

Chua also served at the Lady Templer Specialist Centre and the Pertama Specialist Centre from 1986 to 1994, but his zeal for learning and research meant that he was not content with private practice, lucrative though it was. Instead, he returned to the Faculty of Medicine at the University of Malaya where he served as a lecturer in the Department of Medical Microbiology. His numerous discoveries brought him and his work much attention and he was subsequently appointed clinical virologist in 1996 and associate professor in 1999. In 2001 he was appointed professor of Paediatrics and Medical Microbiology at the International Medical University. In 2003 he accepted an invitation from the Malaysian Ministry of Health to serve as a consultant clinical virologist at the National Public Health Laboratory (NPHL). His primary role was to set up a world-class diagnostic virology laboratory and a diagnostic Biosafety Level 3 laboratory complex, where he established a high-capacity national cell-line bank and instituted molecular virology to support infectious disease surveillance and outbreak investigation, and was involved in the innovative Jui Meng (JM) cell culture tube project for diagnostic virology, which reduced the cost and enhanced the biosafety of virus isolation.

Fuelled by his interest in the zoonotic transmission of infectious agents to humans, Chua systematically studied the microbial flora in bat urine. This led to his discovery of the Tioman virus, which is closely related to the Menangle virus that is the culprit causing abortion and stillbirths in pigs and influenza-like illnesses in humans. Chua also sequenced the Tioman virus genome, enhancing the knowledge of paramyxovirus molecular genetics. He also isolated the Pulau virus and shed new light on the reservoir host of the Nelson Bay virus, a closely related reovirus isolated in Australia in the 1960s.

The outbreak of Nipah virus encephalitis in 1999 was a tragic event for Malaysia and Singapore as there were nearly 300 victims and more than a hundred deaths. Equally disastrous were the economic repercussions from the near collapse of the pig farming and export industry. Chua's discovery of the Nipah virus was pivotal as it led to the adoption of effective control strategies to end the outbreak. The isolation of the virus from patients' excretions led to health care and public health workers taking strict precautions when they looked after patients. In turn, this averted a potential secondary outbreak among the health care workers and the workers responsible for cleaning the environment. As Pteropid fruit bats were suspected of carrying the Nipah virus, Chua personally collected urine samples and partially eaten fruits from the bats so that he could isolate the virus. These studies, performed at great personal risk, proved that the virus was carried by the bats. They also helped scientists to understand the way in which the virus was transmitted from bats to pigs and then to farmers. This knowledge was applied in the investigation to help Bangladesh when it experienced recurrent Nipah virus encephalitis outbreaks in 2001.

Chua's novel way of collecting urine from the bats has been adopted by many researchers elsewhere, including scientists in Cambodia, China, Bangladesh, and Thailand. Not only did this lead to the isolation of the Nipah virus, but it also indirectly contributed to Chinese and Australian scientists discovering that bats were the natural reservoir hosts of the SARS-Co virus as well. His method of collecting bat urine is good for wildlife conservation as it does not kill the bats. Chua was the first to work out the complex interplay of events resulting in the transmission of the Nipah virus from bats to pigs and then to humans. The United States' National Institutes of Health (NIH) heeded his postulation that ecological destruction had led to the emergence of the new pathogen. As a result, the NIH provided him with a grant of US$1.4 million to study the ecology and natural reservoirs of the Nipah virus.

In addition to isolating the Nipah virus, Chua in 1996, was also the first Malaysian person to isolate the Human Herpesvirus 6 and 7 (HHV-6, HHV-7) from children who had exanthema subitum or sudden rash, and his discovery enabled clinicians to diagnose the infection early to administer treatment.

In 1997 Hand, Foot and Mouth Disease (HFMD) broke out among children in Sarawak and Peninsular Malaysia and resulted in many deaths. Chua overturned previous belief and positively identified the EV71 virus as the cause of acute encephalomyelitis. In the 2000 outbreak, new causes were found in the following two years, which dissipated the public pressure to shut down a petroleum refinery plant, believed to be causing conjunctivitis by air pollution.

In 1999 Chua identified the Chikungunya virus as the cause of an outbreak of febrile arthritis in Port Klang, and identified it to be responsible for the 2006 outbreak in Bagan Panchur, Perak, while proving the genetical link between the two.

Chua also isolated the Melaka virus and the Kampar virus from patients with influenza-like illnesses in 2007, and discovered that they were orthoreoviruses.

In the course of the viral studies, Chua observed an intracellular microbe in tissue culture cells. This led to his discovery of a novel bacterium, Waddlia malaysiensis. This finding helped to shed light on the transmission of Waddlia chondrophila, a bacterium causing abortion in cattle.

Chua is the main driving force of the ASEAN+3 Emerging Infectious Disease Programme's laboratory component, in which Malaysia is the coordinating country. He is a regular speaker on emerging viral infection at regional scientific conferences, and frequently serves as adviser for the World Health Organization (WHO) on emerging infectious disease outbreaks in the region.

He has four children with his wife, Loh Kwee Fong, a schoolteacher.

Chua Mia Tee

(蔡明智, Cai Mingzhi, 1931–)
Artist, Singapore

Chua Mia Tee is one of Singapore's most famous and skilled realistic artists and is known for his vivid renditions of significant events in Singapore history. He is best known for his oil paintings, which depict the traditional urban landscapes of Singapore. Two of his widely discussed works among local practitioners and students of visual arts are "National Language Class" (1959) and "Workers in the Canteen" (1974).

Chua is also renowned for his mastery of portrait painting. Over the decades, he has captured on canvas a large number of prominent faces in the Singapore scene, including businessmen, politicians, past and present presidents, and prime ministers. He has also had a hand in the design of the local currency. His portrait of the late President Yusof bin Ishak can be found on Singapore currency notes, and his creativity and artistic talent can also be seen on the fifty-dollar commemorative banknote that celebrates Singapore's 25th year of independence. He was also commissioned to design a limited edition one-million-dollar commemorative note that marks the historic handover of Hong Kong to China.

Chua was born in Shantou, Guangdong Province, China, in 1931. When he was six years old, his family relocated to Singapore to escape the turmoil of the Sino-Japanese War. In later years, his childhood experiences, such as playing along the banks of the Singapore River, influenced him in his choice of themes and subjects. From an early age, Chua was interested in art, painting, and sketching, an inclination that was strongly supported by his father, an artist.

Chua's early education took place at Shuqun School, followed by Tuan Mong School. In 1947, he enrolled in Chung Cheng High School, but was not there for long — moving on instead to embark on a formal arts education at the Nanyang Academy of Fine Arts (NAFA). At NAFA, Chua honed his fundamental skills under the guidance of NAFA director Lim Hak Tai and artists Cheong Soo Pieng, Koh Tong Leong, and See Hiang To. He received formal training in drawing, sketching with watercolours and painting, both with oils on canvas and with Chinese ink and colours on paper. He also dabbled in modelling with plasticine and plaster of Paris.

Chua's talent as an artist was evident even during these early days. While still a NAFA student, he was asked to teach part-time, and continued to teach at NAFA as a full-time staff member after he graduated in 1952. Two years later, Chua resumed his secondary school studies at Chung Cheng High before returning to NAFA to teach from 1956 to 1957.

In the 1953 Chinese High School Arts Association catalogue, one will find oils, woodcuts, and drawings by Chua Mia Tee, and other artists including Lim Yew Kuan, Lee Boon Wang, and Lai Kui Fang. In later years, these artists, as members of the Equator Art Society, would come together to oppose actively the formalist and newer "western" trends in art that were regarded as detrimental to the development of a national identity in art.

After leaving NAFA, Chua worked in the commercial art industry for a number of years. He joined the Shanghai Book Company in 1957, where he worked as a book illustrator. In 1960, he moved on to Grant Advertising International as a designer and illustrator, creating figure drawings for advertisements and comic strips. In 1965, he worked with Federal Publications (part of the Times Publishing Group) as an illustrator and designer of books and remained there for close to a decade.

It was not until 1974 that Chua began to make more waves among local artists. That year, he staged his first solo exhibition at the Rising Art Gallery, which was met with widespread acclaim. This set the stage for his subsequent decision to become a full-time artist, drawing inspiration and subjects from the sights and scenes that surround him.

Many of Chua's early works depict traditional scenes of life in Singapore that were under threat from the onslaught of urban redevelopment. Chua paints in a realistic style that not only captured the essence of places, but also the spirit of the people associated with these places. Chua once said that as an artist, he saw the urgency to capture these scenes before they were lost from Singapore's cityscape forever. Such scenes include "Road Construction Worker" (1955) and "Singapore River" (1983). Chua also captured the political and social climate during Singapore's road to independence in the 1950s and 1960s, as seen in paintings such as "Epic of Life in Malaya" (1955) and "National Language Class" (1959).

Since the late 1970s, Chua has travelled all over the world, with sojourns in Hong Kong, Bali, Java, Spain, and Italy to draw inspiration for his work. Some of the artists Chua admires are Leonardo da Vinci, Rembrandt, Velazquez, Goya, and Yefimovich Repin. He works largely with oil on canvas and usually begins by painting on location before proceeding to refine and complete the process. To Chua, the purpose of realistic art is to help the audience to understand and identify with the work, and to interpret the essence of a subject in a manner that others will be able to appreciate.

Chua also paints depictions of Singaporean places and people based on his visual recollections. Occasionally, he relies on photographic aids to recall details or to serve as a substitute for clients who are unable to turn up for portrait sittings. He also works with other media such as acrylic, mixed media, watercolours, bronze, and relief. One of his best known sculptures is a portrait bust of Zubir Said or "Mr Majulah Singapura", who composed Singapore's national anthem.

Over the decades, Chua has had a hand in capturing some of Singapore's most historic moments for posterity. He painted former Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew's return from London after the Merdeka Talks; the swearing-in ceremony of then Prime Minister Goh Chok Tong, cabinet ministers and Members of Parliament. In 2004, he painted the portrait of President S. R. Nathan for his 80th birthday.

Chua is well known for his works not just locally, but in the international art scene as well. He has staged exhibitions in various countries including Australia, Belgium, Germany, Indonesia, New Zealand, and Thailand. His solo shows include a 1988 exhibition at the National Museum of Singapore, a 1985 exhibition at the Lone Pine Gallery, and the British Council Art Gallery, Singapore, in 1974 and 1982. He has also taken part in group exhibitions at the Chinese Chamber of Commerce (1980) and the National Museum Art Gallery, Brunei (1989).

His works are also in high demand among discerning private collectors and the corporate world. Organizations that have acquired his works include the American Embassy, IBM Corporation, DBS Bank, Credit Suisse, Hong Leong Organization, and the Singapore Island Country Club. In August 2005, the Singapore Art Museum received a donation of 95 artworks from Times Publishing Limited which included Chua's works and those of other notable Singapore artists such as Cheong Soo Pieng, Choo Keng Kwang, Shi Xiangtuo, Ng Eng Teng, Seah Kim Joo and Lee Boon Wang. His works are also displayed in public collections at the National Museum, Ministry of Community Development, Youth and Sports, and the Urban Redevelopment Authority.

Chua has also contributed to the arts community in Singapore, sharing his vast experience with the next generation of visual artists and arts management professionals. The portfolios he has held include that of professional consultant to the NAFA Alumni Association, chairman of the editorial board of Nanyang Arts, chairman of the selection board for creative artists contributed by the Association, and life member of the Singapore Arts Society and the NAFA Alumni Association.

Chua Soo Bin

(蔡斯民, Cai Simin, 1932–)

Photographer, artist, art dealer, gallerist, Singapore

Chua Soo Bin is a renowned Singapore photographer and gallerist. In 1988 he received Singapore's highest artistic accolades, the Cultural Medallion, for his much-lauded photography series, "Liuzhen: Portraits of Excellence" (留真) in which he shot portraits of some of the leading Chinese ink artists of the twentieth century. He is also widely regarded today as having been one of the most important art dealers in the Chinese contemporary art market; a pioneer in surfacing and bringing onto the market works of some of the current crop of important Chinese contemporary artists such as Yue Minjun, Mao Tongqiang, and Liu Wei. His profile as a photographer, and then later as a gallerist, has earned him a place of considerable and continued importance in the visual and photographic circles in Singapore, Southeast Asia, and China.

Chua was born in Singapore in 1932 to humble beginnings. Living with his extended family in Aliwal Street, he attended Chong Zhen Primary School. His earliest exposure to art came when he studied under Singapore pioneer modern artist Cheong Soo Pieng in night art classes at the Nanyang Academy of Fine Arts. After completing his primary school education, he became an apprentice at Papineau, a small advertising firm in Singapore, working as an illustrator before moving on to a number of other advertising firms in Singapore. His interest in photography developed in the early 1950s when he acquired his first camera, a Rolliflex, and built his own darkroom at home.

During the 1950s, he deepened his understanding of photography by shooting and exhibiting in salon photography exhibitions. Throughout that decade, he was an active member of the Singapore Camera Club — later known as the Photographic Society of Singapore — organizing exhibitions and judging at various open-call competitions. In 1955, he made his first mark as a photographer by obtaining a silver medal for a work submitted to the Singapore Camera Club's 3rd Pan-Malayan Photographic Exhibition. The same year, he became the youngest person in Singapore to be awarded the Associate of the Royal Photographic Society of Great Britain (A.R.P.S.). The following year, he participated further in competitions and was a gold and bronze medals winner at the 4th Pan-Malayan Photographic Exhibition. In this early part of his career, Chua thought of his own photographic practice as "chasing shadow and light". In particular, he liked to shoot against the dominant source of light to achieve an atmospheric effect in his works.

In the 1960s, as he continued salon photography alongside work as an art director in various advertising firms, he also began to take on commercial photography projects. Photographers who have come to the fore today, such as Wee Khim and John Clang, have been apprentices under Chua Soo Bin. By the 1970s, he had set up his own photographic studio, taking on freelance assignments from leading advertising companies and art directors in and outside of Singapore. His studio was situated out of his home at 16E Fort Road. Corporate clients included Singapore Airlines and other airlines, tourism bodies, and companies both local and international, such as Isetan and Female. Some of his most significant works from the period were in portraiture photography, where his strength of being able to draw out the essence of his subject matter's soul and personality stood out the clearest. Some of the most enduring images of the world famous Singapore Airlines' Singapore Girl were shot by him in the 1980s. In 1985, the images he shot for Singapore Airlines won a top prize at the Pacific Asia Travel Association (PATA) Award and this was quickly followed by a Singapore Creativity Award in 1986.

As with many works of art of significance, the origin of Chua Soo Bin's "Liuzhen" (留真) series of portraits was most fortituous. He was on a Singapore Airlines photographic assignment in China in 1984 when he noticed a dearth of pictorial documentation on senior Chinese artists. Personally appreciative of their works, Chua lamented the lack of interest and coverage of their works and lives and decided to embark on a photography project with the artists as subject matters, essentially to record a part of their artistic personas and legacies. With assistance from his friends and fellow artists, Li Xingjian and Huang Miaozi, he made a shortlist of artists to photograph and was introduced to some of them. Over the next five years, he set off on a self-funded project that took him five years to complete and involved his flying to China, Hong Kong, Taiwan, Japan, New York, and Europe many times to interview and photograph the selected artists and to negotiate the publication of the book of his photographs.

These photographs were compiled with notes on the artists and culminated in "Liuzhen: Portraits of Excellence", a critically acclaimed landmark photographic exhibition on fourteen modern Chinese ink painters, including Li Keran, Wu Zuoren, and Guan Shanyue, held at the Singapore National Museum. The prints revealed poignant moments in the artists' personal lives, recording them both as individuals and as artists. The exhibition of the prints was opened by then Brigadier-General Lee Hsien Loong and presented by the Singapore Art Society, the Photographic Society of Singapore, and the San Yi Finger Painting Society. In conjunction with the publication of a photo book, the show later travelled to major Chinese cities such as Hong Kong, Taipei, Beijing, Shanghai, Shenyang, Hangzhou, Xi'an, and Guangzhou. Eighteen photographs from the series were subsequently donated to the Singapore Art Museum in 2006.

After "Liuzhen", Chua continued to photograph important figures in the Chinese and Singapore artworld, including the likes of Wu Guanzhong, Pan Shou, Zhou Sicong, Wu Tsai Yen, and Liu Kang. In particular, his portraits of Wu Guanzhong have been regarded as the best done of the artist by any photographer. In August 2011, he exhibited the latest installation of "Liuzhen" at the Zhejiang Art Museum in Hangzhou, China, adding yet another venue to the widely-travelled photographic exhibition. In conjunction with the exhibition, he also published the revised second edition of the "Liuzhen" catalogue.

In 1990, he founded Soo Bin Art Gallery (读画楼), known today as Soo Bin Art International. The gallery initially focused on the works of Chinese ink painters Wu Guanzhong, Chu Teh-Chun, and Chen Wen Hsi, and Singapore artists, although the latter did not sell as well as the former. In 1997, the noted Chinese art curator, Li Xianting, curated the exhibition "Red/Grey" in Chua's gallery. It was with that exhibition that he began exhibiting emerging avant-garde Chinese artists of the 1980s, such as Wang Guangyi, Yue Minjun, Liu Wei, and Zhou Chunya. Over the years, he mounted solo exhibitions of many of these artists, playing a key role in introducing them to Singaporeans and regional art collectors alike. Indeed, Chua can be regarded as the key figure in generating the earliest interest in Chinese contemporary art in the Southeast Asian region from the late 1990s onwards.

From its beginning until today, Chua Soo Bin's gallery has mounted about 150 exhibitions. Over the years, he has built a good reputation championing local artists and cultivating the interests of collectors and other gallerists alike. Oftentimes, his taste and discernment are cited as key reasons for his success as a dealer. He is also known for his regard for the views of artists he works with, supporting them with his friendship and generosity. As a leading gallerist in Asia, Chua has been the chairperson of the Singapore Gallery Association and also guided the first instalments of the Singapore-based art fair, ART Singapore, from 2000 to 2004 as its chairperson.

Chua is married to Liew Choo Hsien and they have three sons — Chua Cher Wei, Chua Cher Tzien, and Chua Cher Him. He is presently based out of Singapore and shuttles between Singapore and China regularly.

Chua, William T.

(丁克铭, Ding Keming, 1955–2004)
Human rights lawyer, Philippines

Throughout his life, William Chua made a difference by consistently and wholeheartedly striving for the restoration of democracy, the protection and vindication of human rights, and the protection of human dignity. His tireless pursuit of justice has not only resulted in court victories, but also opened the nation's eyes to the plight of victims, and the imperfections in the Philippine justice system.

Chua's baptism of fire as an activist began during his years in university, when martial law was declared by President Ferdinand Marcos. He often recounted his "adventure" in the trunk of his professor's car as his teacher spirited him away from the university's campus as the military police went in.

"He got more and more involved in the anti-Marcos movement in our latter years in La Salle," his university friend, Jeff Yao, recalls. "Looking back, [one realizes] it would be the turning point in his life as he would decide to take law after college and then start off his law career helping those less fortunate than us."

Chua's parents, Martin and Songo, arrived in the Philippines from Jinjiang in Fujian, China, during the late 1940s when war was ravaging the mainland, causing much poverty and misery. Years earlier, Songo was sold by her mother to a wealthy family, where the head of the household was a gambler and an opium addict. She was barely sixteen when she and her husband decided to make a new life for themselves and left China. This new life was tough though, as they were very poor and had to do odd jobs to make ends meet. They had four sons and when the kids got sick, she would wait for hours in a rich relative's house just to borrow money for their medical fees. Too poor to give birth in hospital, Songo gave birth to Chua on 6 October 1955 in a small rented house in Manila. Life was not easy, but Songo never became bitter. Instead, she worked hard to give her children the best education possible. Despite the hardships, she borrowed money to send all the boys to Xavier, an exclusive Chinese-Filipino school in San Juan. Chua always said that it was difficult being a poor boy in a rich man's school, but he and his siblings valued their mother's efforts and sacrifices. Eventually, things got better and Songo was able to send the boys either to the De La Salle or Ateneo de Manila universities. The boys were successful in their mother's eyes. Robert, the eldest, is a businessman; George is a corporate executive; William became a lawyer, and Peter, a businessman.

Chua was greatly inspired by his mother, who always helped others in need despite her own financial difficulties. As Chua's wife, Betty, revealed: "From her, he learned the value of hard work, perseverance, drive to succeed and generosity despite hardship." During the Marcos era, Chua satirized the excesses of the dictatorship by publishing and editing an occasional opposition publication called Sick of the Times. Later, as a member of the Movement of Attorneys for Brotherhood, Integrity, Nationalism Inc., he became active in human rights work and advocacy, especially during the martial law years, which extended beyond the end of the dictatorship, when many problems still remained.

In the early 1990s, the country was beset with a spate of kidnappings of mostly Chinese-Filipinos. At the height of the crime spree, there would be a kidnapping incident every other day. Chua became a lawyer for the Citizens Action Against Crime and Movement for Restoration of Peace and Order (MRPO). He prosecuted more than twenty kidnapping cases, mostly pro bono. His efforts resulted in a 100-per cent conviction rate. Teresita Ang-See, spokesperson of the MRPO, related how Chua helped convince victims not to be cowards like their abductors, but to start fighting back rather than taking flight. "He stood as our counsel during the long, dreary, tedious and difficult fight for justice," she says. He mobilized his staff at the Arroyo Chua Caedo and Coronel Law Office (formerly the Azcuna Yorac Sarmiento Arroyo and Chua) to do research and help in painstaking preparations to convict the kidnappers. "There are lawyers and lawyers and lawyers, but there was only one Chua who fought the kidnap-for-ransom groups as if he himself were the victim." In 1992, Chua acted as counsel for then Makati Congressman Joker P. Arroyo, and exposed a syndicate existing inside the House of Representatives Electoral Tribunal (HRET) that manipulated and corrupted results of electoral protests. His complaint led to the dismissal of several officials of the HRET, including the tribunal's clerk. The same year, he assisted the government's peace efforts by acting as the personal and confidential liaison between then National Unification Commission chairperson Haydee Yorac and leftist insurgents.

Chua's tireless pursuit of justice earned him court victories, and also revealed the plight of victims and the imperfections in the Philippine justice system. In the process, he dared powerful forces to silence his defiance. As Chua's friend, Maris I. Diokno, explained, "What impressed me was that he kept on going despite the setbacks. Each defeat he took with righteous anger, not grief; and every victory, no matter how small, he relished with gusto." A friend, Robin Tong, added that Chua not only was a man for others, but he also chose to do very difficult things, sacrificed a lot personally, and often put himself in harm's way — so that others would gain courage, and the real cowards would be unmasked for who and what they were.

Chua also provided legal services to the Foundation for Worldwide People Power Inc. and the Philippine Center for Investigative Journalism (PCIJ). Sheila S. Coronel from the latter affirmed that although they never paid him any fees, they could call on him on weekends or late at night without having to feel like they were imposing on him. Chua took his law practice seriously. To him, it was more than just a job. It was a calling. And through all the twists and turns of his quite successful professional career, he never lost sight of the ideals that made him pursue law in the first place: right the wrong — the fundamental belief was about justice and compassion. The PCIJ's exposés on presidential excesses helped open investigations and, later on, the impeachment against President Joseph Estrada. Chua was instrumental in making sure that the exposés stuck to the truth, that journalistic integrity was not compromised, and that all claims were backed by evidence.

Chua passed away on 13 December 2004, at the age of forty-nine, after a six-month battle with pancreatic cancer. A year before his death, he was awarded 2003 Dr Jose P. Rizal Awards for Excellence, organized by the Manila Times and Kaisa Para sa Kaunlaran. President Gloria M. Arroyo, Chinese Ambassador Wang Chungui (王春贵), and officers of the Filipino Chinese Chamber of Commerce and Industries were on hand to present the award to celebrate Filipino-Chinese Friendship Day. The awards are given to Outstanding Chinese Filipinos who have made significant contributions to different fields in the Philippine society. His name has since been added to the Wall of Remembrance at the Bantayog ng mga Bayani (Monument of Heroes) in Quezon City. The structures at the Bantayog complex are dedicated to "the nation's modern-day martyrs and heroes who fought against all odds to help regain freedom, peace, justice, truth and democracy in the country".

Chua's son, Derek, asserted during his eulogy for his father that, "If in the past, people thought that his work was trivialised because of lack of recognition or because he did not receive much in return, now I can see that his work really meant something. His work was anything BUT trivial," he expounded, thanking everyone who came to pay their last respects. "By being here, you have all given him the best reward and recognition, far greater than what he could have received when he was still alive – you are all giving him back love, respect and honor. I'm sure he could ask for nothing more."

Chuan Likphai

(吕基文, Lü Jiwen, 1938–)
Leading politician, Thailand

Former Thai Prime Minister Chuan Likphai was born in Trang, a commercial centre on the west coast of southern Thailand. His roots lay in the predominantly Hokkien and Cantonese community that emerged in the final decades of the nineteenth century in the vicinity of Thap Thiang, to which Trang's provincial administration moved at the time of the First World War. Until the take-off of the southern Thai rubber sector during the second and third decades of the twentieth century, the primary economic activity of this community was the cultivation of black pepper. It exported that commodity, along with a range of other goods, to Penang, to which Trang Chinese society was closely connected for many decades and to which it sent many of its sons for their educations.

Chuan was born in Thai Phru Subdistrict on the outskirts of Trang town on 28 July 1938. He was the third of nine children of Siam-born Hokkien parents, the schoolteacher Eng Huat or Niyom, and the wholesale fish trader and clay shingle maker Kim Thuan (popularly known simply as "Mae Thuan" or "Mother Thuan"). Chuan's father taught at the municipal school at Wat Khuan Wiset and also at the Chinese Sin Wa School. His mother traded in markets across Trang Province, including those serving the mines of the province's interior. Having begun his education at the municipal primary and secondary schools at Wat Khuan Wiset and having studied Chinese after school, Chuan enrolled as a member of the first class of students to attend the Thai-medium Trang Witthaya School. This secondary school operated under the auspices of Trang's most significant Chinese voluntary organization, the Association for the Promotion of Education, chaired by the renowned Trang Chinese leader, the Hakka Man Sinchai. As a young man, Chuan was known as "Ko Wun" in Trang Chinese circles, in which virtually all men go by a nickname preceded by "ko".

After Chuan completed Matthayom 6 at Trang Witthaya School in 1956, Niyom Likphai wanted him to continue his studies in Penang. The family's means did not permit this, however. Following in his older brother's footsteps, Chuan thus moved to Bangkok to pursue his education on a provincial teaching scholarship. He enrolled in the painting, drawing, and sculpture section of the preparatory school for Thailand's fine arts university, Sinlapakorn University, and also arranged to live at Wat Amarintharam on the Thonburi side of the Chao Phraya River opposite Sinlapakorn and Thammasat Universities. He would lodge at the temple for eight years, through his graduation from the Faculty of Law at Thammasat University in 1962 and his admission as a full member of the Thai Bar after further study.

Chuan practised law in Chonburi Province for two years before deciding to enter politics. He won his first campaign for parliament as a member for Trang in the watershed Thai elections of 1969. Representing his native province in parliament ever since that first victory, he gained a reputation as a tough and skilled debater, a man whom supporters credited with attachment to principle and whom critics accused of inordinate and self-righteous legalism.

Thailand's 1969 elections saw an unprecedented number of candidates, including many provincial Chinese with commercial backgrounds, winning seats alongside candidates from bureaucratic backgrounds of the sort that had previously dominated the Thai parliament. Having run as a member of the Democrat Party, Chuan would emerge quickly as a leading young star of that party's southern wing, which at the time counted as its informal leader the influential Nakhon Si Thammarat journalist and politician, Surin Matsadit.

Entering the Thai cabinet for the first time in February 1975, less than two years after the events of 14 October 1973 had brought a temporary end to military government in Thailand, Chuan served as deputy minister of justice in the government of Democrat Party leader and Prime Minister Seni Pramot. He was named minister of justice in 1976. As the political tensions of that year escalated towards their violent climax on 6 October, Chuan and fellow "progressive" Democrat ministers Surin Matsadit and Damrong Latthaphiphat faced a thuggish campaign of criticism and intimidation in the print and broadcast media and on the streets. Elements in the military, right-wing politicians, and members of the Village Scouts accused them of leftist sympathies and even of communism.

Chuan was named minister of justice again in 1980, as a member of General Prem Tinasulanon's first government. In subsequent Prem cabinets he held the commerce, agriculture and cooperatives, and education portfolios. He served as speaker of the lower house of the Thai parliament during 1986–88 and in the latter year joined the first cabinet of Prime Minister Chatchai Chunhawan as minister of public health.

By the end of the 1980s, Chuan had become a southern Thai Democrat Party heavyweight, even as he retained a reputation for probity in the often corrupt world of Thai politics. His personal popularity in the mid-South would work increasingly to solidify electoral support for his party there. In 1991 he succeeded the prominent Hong Kong-educated Bangkok Chinese business leader, Phichai Rattakun to become the first leader of the Democrat Party from a provincial background. He would lead the party until 2003. Chuan captained the Democrats in Thailand's March 1992 elections in a campaign that saw him introduce to the electorate his young protégé, the future Democrat leader and prime minister, Abhisit Vejjajiva. Following those elections, Chuan and the Democrats played an active but cautious role in opposing the premiership of General Suchinda Kraprayun, the mastermind of the 1991 Thai coup. Ceding to Chamlong Srimuang and a group of political activists the leading role in organizing the demonstrations that drove Suchinda from power in the urban violence of May 1992, the Democrats nevertheless fought the September 1992 polls as one of the anti-military "Angel parties".

The Democrats won the largest number of seats in the September 1992 elections, and Chuan began his first premiership, which lasted until the general elections of July 1995. Democrat politicians' involvement in a serious land reform scandal precipitated those latter polls. During both the 1992–95 period and the period of his second premiership, Chuan and his party very much depended on the political skills of Democrat secretary general Major General Sanan Khachonprasat, a master of Thailand's money politics, for their success.

Following two years as leader of the parliamentary opposition, Chuan again became premier in the immediate aftermath of a national crisis. He was returned to the Thai premiership by a vote of parliament rather than through fresh elections in November 1997, as the country sought to come to grips with its economic collapse in the Asian Financial Crisis. Though a lifelong civilian, he also took the defence portfolio.

Thailand's efforts to cope with the fallout of the crisis defined Chuan's second premiership. With his minister of finance, Tharin Nimmanhaemin, Chuan faced criticism that the government caved in to the demands of the International Monetary Fund and catered to foreign at the expense of Thai interests. Such sentiments doomed the Democrats to defeat at the hands of Thaksin Shinawatra's Thai Rak Thai Pary in 2001.

In 2003 Chuan relinquished the leadership of his party. He remained chairman of its advisory board, an influential party strategist, and political patron of Abhisit. As an important behind-the-scenes player in his party's approach to the deep and critical divide between "red" and "yellow" that characterized Thai politics after 2006, he adopted an uncompromisingly legalist stance that belied his earlier reputation for progressive politics. It was a stance that reinforced the image of Chuan as both a man with little sympathy for his country's poor that he had acquired during his second premiership and as a southern regionalist with little interest in the North and the North-east of the country.

In 1987 Chuan's only child, a son named Surabot Likphai, was born to Phakdiphon Sucharitkun. Even as prime minister, Chuan maintained a famously modest lifestyle, residing deep down a soi in a rather poor part of Bangkok. Despite the money-driven and often scandal-plagued political arena in which he spent decades, he also maintained a reputation for incorruptibility. His long service as a member of parliament for Trang resulted in very little of the sort of lavish state spending on infrastructure there that former Prime Minister Banharn Silpa-archa directed towards his own native province of Suphanburi. Despite his attachment to principle and procedure, Chuan was rarely identified with any defining political vision for his country and society.

Chuan Tanthana

(Tan Kenchuan, 陈景川, Chen Jingchuan, 1900–47)

Community leader, Thailand

Chuan Tanthana was a Chinese community leader in Thailand during the 1930s and 1940s. He initiated the founding of the Teochew Association of Thailand in 1936 and was a member of the executive committee of the Thai Chinese Chamber of Commerce. He was highly regarded by the Nationalist government in China. After World War Two had ended, he was selected as the representative of the ethnic Chinese in Thailand and attended the National Assembly (国民大会), organized by the Nationalist government, where his suggestions were heeded, twice.

Chuan's ancestry can be traced to Xiyang Village (which is now affiliated to Chenghai City), Longdu Town, in Raoping County of Guangdong Province. He was born on 13 March 1901 in Bangkok, the second son of a rich Chinese merchant. From young, he received a good education and was able to understand the Chinese, English, and Thai languages. His father, Chen Ningsi (陈宁思), first made his fortune in Thailand by trading, after which he entered the entertainment business. The famous "Tian Wai Tian Theater" (天外天戏院) in the downtown area of Bangkok was founded by him. Chuan, as the second child of Chen Ningsi, was known as "Er She" (二舍), meaning young master.

Chen Ningsi laid the business foundation for his family, which expanded out of Thailand to Hong Kong and Shantou. He was the major shareholder of Siam Remittance Bank (暹罗汇商银行) and took the position of general manager of the bank in his twilight years. Chuan inherited the position after his father's death, and, with his brothers, managed the family enterprises and properties, which then included the Tian Wai Tian Building, Tai Yu Alcohol Store, Thai Feng Yu, Thai Cheng Feng, Feng Tai Yu, Tai Jing Feng Pawnshop, Tian Wai Tian Remittance Organization, Tian Wai Tian Gold Store, Tai Yuan Feng Rice Mill, Thai He Feng Sugar Confectionery, Siam Chinese Businessman Insurance Co. Ltd., Siam Real Estate Co. Ltd., and others. The businesses continued to prosper. Hence, Chuan made a name for himself as a successful young businessman who was established and influential in business.

When Japan invaded Manchuria in 1931, Chuan joined the rest of the ethnic Chinese community in Thailand in various underground anti-Japanese activities. His contributions to anti-Japanese movements were focused in three major areas. Firstly, together with many other community leaders such as Hiaguang-iam Iamsuri, he worked as a vice-chairperson in the Association for Promotion of the Sale of Municipal Bonds, Siam Branch (全国劝募公债暹罗分会), while Seow Houtseng Sibunrueang was the chairman of the association. Donations from Thailand were as much as 600,000 yuan in October 1937, and 2.4 million yuan during the half-year from November 1938 to April 1939.

Secondly, Chuan proposed the setting up of the Teochew Association of Thailand in 1936. He was joined by Hiaguang-iam Iamsuri, Luangsit Suropakon, and many other Chinese businessmen of Chaozhou origin in the founding of the association. The Teochew Association of Thailand was established on 14 February 1938, and Chuan was elected its first chairperson. Under his leadership, the association played several important roles, one of which was the setting up of a rice exporting company to prevent steep inflation in the price of rice in Chaoshan District. When the association was newly founded, inflation in the price of rice in Chaoshan District was very high. The first thing on the agenda of the Teochew Association of Thailand was to set up a company to lower the rice price in Chaoshan Disrict by selling cheap rice.

Thirdly, he established two newspapers, namely the Chinese Daily (《中原报》) and China Daily (《中国报》) with his fellow Thai-Chinese businessmen, and hired Li Qixiong (李其雄) as the founding editor. These newspapers contributed to the anti-Japanese effort by publishing many Chinese nationalist propaganda articles during the war and propagating anti-Japanese ideas to their readers.

At the end of 1941, the southern advance of the Japanese army in Southeast Asia forced Chuan and his fellow anti-Japanese activists into hiding. They tried to escape to Yunnan via Chiangmai, but Japanese military forces controlled the route leading from Thailand to Yunnan. They thus attempted to escape back to Bangkok, but were unsuccessful. Chuan was arrested by Japanese forces on 8 February 1942. Thereafter, he was imprisoned at Bang Khwang Central Prison for more than three years with many other anti-Japanese activists, and was freed on 12 September 1945 after Japan surrendered. After he was freed, the Teochew Association of Thailand presented him a plaque with the words, "Integrity of the Nation" (民族气节), inscribed on it to praise his patriotism towards China.

Chuan served the Thai-Chinese community by taking numerous posts in various associations. He was a member of the executive committee of the Thai Chinese Chamber of Commerce, the chairperson and a member of the executive committee of the Teochew Association of Thailand, a member of the board of directors of the newspapers Chinese Daily and China Daily, and chairperson of the Xinmin School board.

He not only served the Thai-Chinese community, but also the Chinese Nationalist government. Chuan visited China twice after World War Two, representing the Chinese community in Thailand to attend the National Assembly, which was held by the Nationalist government. He appealed to the government to grant special amnesty for political criminals on New Year's Day of 1947, and to increase the number of overseas election supervision officers prescribed in the constitution. Both suggestions were approved at the meeting.

However his health deteriorated because of the torture he suffered from Japanese military forces during his imprisonment. Numerous duties in Chinese associations of Thailand and Nationalist government did not help his health, and he eventually died of hypertension in his residence on 22 October 1947, at the age of forty-seven.

Chuang Chu Lin

(庄竹林, Zhuang Zhulin, 1900–73)
Educator, Singapore

Chuang Chu Lin was a distinguished educator in Singapore. He was the founding principal of Chung Cheng High School (中正中学) and vice-chancellor of Nanyang University, both important institutions of Chinese education in Singapore.

Chuang was a native of Huian county (惠安) in the Fujian province (福建) of China. He received his basic education at missionary schools Yangyuan Primary School (养元小学) and Xunyuan High School (寻源中学) in Xiamen (厦门), and studied at the Fukien Christian University in Fuzhou (福州协和大学) where he graduated in 1925 with a bachelor of arts degree in social science.

In 1926 Chuang travelled to Singapore and worked at a local Chinese press, Nanyang Siang Pau (南洋商报) for a brief period before becoming a mathematic and science teacher at the Chinese High School (华侨中学). Later in 1929, Chuang went for further studies at Michigan University where he would later receive a master of science degree and subsequently, in 1933, a doctorate degree in municipal administration.

Chuang returned to Singapore in 1934 and married Xie Jinrui (谢锦蕊) while working in a real estate company owned by the latter's father. Although it appeared that Chuang would now be able to put the training he acquired at Michigan to good use, he decided to go back to China the following year to take up a professorship at the Sun Yat-Sen University (中山大学) in Guangzhou. However, not long after Chuang had started his academic career, the Sino-Japanese War intensified. By 1938, he was forced to seek refuge from the war elsewhere. Coincidentally, a group of Chinese community leaders in Singapore was then working on setting up a new Chinese high school. Chuang was recommended to them as a suitable candidate for the head master of the proposed school. This thus brought Chuang back to Singapore.

The school which Chuang was entrusted to build from scratch, opened in January 1939 in a rented building in Kim Yam Road with an enrolment of about 400 students. It was originally named the "Chiang Kai-Shek High School", but had its name changed to "Chung Cheng High School" in 1940. ("Chung Cheng" is in fact the zi (字) or courtesy name of Chiang Kai-shek 蒋介石.) The school made good progress under Chuang's leadership, but had to be closed down during the Japanese Occupation period. Moreover, because the students and teachers of Chung Cheng High School had been active participants in anti-Japanese movements, Chuang was arrested and detained twice by the Japanese authorities. Believing that Chuang may have known the whereabouts of certain anti-Japanese elements, they interrogated him for information using severe torture before releasing him. Ironically, after the war the British also detained Chuang on suspicion that he had collaborated with the Japanese. However he was subsequently released after investigation.

After the war, Chuang managed to rebuild Chung Cheng High School at tremendous speed. Because of his foresight, in 1947, when the colony had still not fully recovered from the devastation of war, the school bought a fourteen-acre piece of land in Goodman Road at the price of $120,000 to build a permanent campus with high capacity. This had enabled it to grow by leaps and bounds as it could now meet the high demand for places in schools generated by the post-war baby boom. During Chuang's eighteen years of tenure as principal (1938–56), Chung Cheng grew from a humble beginning to having a total student body of more than 5,500 boys and girls, and became arguably the largest high school in Southeast Asia during the 1950s and 1960s. It established itself as a prestigious institution of Chinese education in the region, with a highly qualified teaching staff and distinguished alumni. Chuang had played a vital role in taking the school to these heights.

However, when he was at the prime of his career, an unexpected chapter in his life unfolded. On 26 October 1956, he was arrested and detained by the Labour Front government under the Banishment Ordinance. Curiously, it was until a year later, on 12 October 1957, that the Council of Ministers issued an order to deport him. But it appears that there had been no government statement on the exact reason for his arrest and detention. The deportation, moreover, was never carried out as Chuang remained in custody until he was formally released on 6 August 1958, when he was no longer regarded by the authorities as a "threat" that was "detrimental to the security of Singapore". Chuang had been detained for a total of 314 days. His misfortune was perhaps very much related to the political climate of the time.

In the 1950s, a historical period marked by heightened anti-colonialism, student life on the campuses of Chinese schools was highly politically charged. Their response to the call of the time led to waves of student movements. The particular incident that caused Chuang's adversity was the violent conflict between the government and Chinese schools' students which took place in late September 1956 and lasted until the following month. On 24 September 1956, the Singapore Chinese Middle Schools Students' Union, a registered student body, was given a "dissolution" order by the government because it was deemed by the authority as "nothing less than a Communist Front Organisation". Later, on 10 October 1956, the education minister of the Labour Front government, Chew Swee Kee, issued an order to expel a total of 142 students from the various Chinese high schools in Singapore. More than half of these students, seventy-six of them, were from Chung Cheng. Although Chuang was not formally charged in court, the authorities must have held him responsible for not exercising enough control over the students to curb the spread of leftist or communist ideology. To what extent could Chuang be said to have given his students a free hand to propagate their beliefs on campus is hard to ascertain. Nevertheless, in view of the fact that Chung Cheng had always been a foremost centre for student activism during the 1950s, it is probable that Chuang Chu Lin was at least sympathetic, if not supportive, of the students in their quest for idealism.

Although Chuang was released from detention, the education minister openly expressed his reservations for Chuang to resume his position at Chung Cheng. Nevertheless, on 11 January 1960 the chairman of the Nanyang University Council, Tan Lark Sye, appointed Chuang Chu Lin to be the vice-chancellor of the university. Tan revealed that since he assumed the chairmanship of the executive council for the university on 5 August 1959 (while concurrently being the chairman of the university council), Chuang had been assisting him on matters relating to the hiring of deans and professors of the university. He even mentioned that "the achievement of the university in the last four years had been due, in the main, to the planning and efforts of Dr Chuang". Chuang served as vice-chancellor of the Nanyang University (Nantah) until 2 July 1964 when he tendered his resignation on the grounds that "age has caught up" on him. And it was formally accepted by the University Council six days later. Although age could be a reason, the truth must be that Chuang was pressured to relinquish his position. That is because, about a month before this, the Central Government in Kuala Lumpur had issued a White Paper titled "Communism in the Nanyang University" and arrested fifty-one Nantah students accused of being involved in communist subversive activities. Later, the minister for education of the ruling People's Action Party in Singapore, Ong Pang Boon, commented that he did not believe that Chuang was a university administrator capable of "restoring discipline amongst the students and removing Communist influence", because he was a "former middle school vice-chancellor or principal who had submitted to previous communist intimidation".

Chuang had to leave Nantah for the same reason that had forced him to leave Chung Cheng a decade earlier. The role he had played in the fermentation of radical idealism in Chung Cheng High School and the Nanyang University campuses, as his accusers would believe, is perhaps a topic warrants more in-depth or careful study. Nevertheless, if what was said by Tan Lark Sye was indeed the truth, then Chuang must be remembered as a key figure who had made immense contributions to the Nanyang University at a time when it was most vulnerable. As one may aware, after the university started operating, it only had a formal chancellor Dr Lin Yu-Tang (林语堂), in office for barely six months (2 October 1954 to 3 April 1955). Lin's abrupt and resentful departure from the university had almost devastated the institution. In this regard, the substantial period of eight years (before and after 1960) of informal and formal service Chuang Chu Lin had rendered to Nantah during this critical moment of her history should be duly recognized.

Chuang retired after leaving the Nanyang University. He suffered from the Parkinson Disease and passed away on 4 January 1973.

Chuk Mor

(竺摩, Zhu Mo, 1913–2002)

Religious master, educationist, artist, Malaysia

Chuk Mor was an eminent Malaysian monk, educationist, and an artist specializing in Chinese painting and calligraphy. Most of the earlier migrant monks to Malaya such as Paik Wan (伯圆) and Kim Beng (金明) came from the Fujian Province, but Chuk Mor hailed from Zhejiang Province (浙江省). Chuk Mor arrived on Penang island in 1954 and lived in the Singapore-Malaysia region for most of his life, performing his religious duties until he passed away in Penang in 2002. Between 1958 and 1959 though, he went to Honolulu (Hawaii) for a year or so, and had also lived in Hong Kong-Macau for more than a decade in his younger days.

In 1959, Chuk Mor was elected to be the first president of the Malaysian Buddhist Association and remained as such until 1971. Under his leadership, the Malaysian Buddhist Association building in Penang was completed in 1970. Additionally, he took the post of principal of Malaysian Buddhist Institute. Other than this, he was also invited to Honolulu, San Francisco (California) in the U.S., Hong Kong, Australia, Vancouver in Canada and other countries to propagate Buddhism. Chuk Mor was one of the representative figures amongst the country's learned Malaysian monks. His contribution was mainly in promoting the modernization of Buddhism and writing books on his religious thoughts. Not only was his style of Chinese painting and calligraphy unique, his achievements in promoting Buddhist education and authoring religious works were extraordinary too. More importantly, he helped groom many educated youths and monks and was respectfully dubbed "The Father of Development in Malaysian Mahayana Buddhism".

Chuk Mor was born in 1913 into the Chen (陈) family, in He Xin Qiao village beneath the eastern mountain of Yan Dang (雁荡山) in Leqing County (乐清县), Zhejiang Province. His original name was De'an (德安). There were ten siblings in the family and he was the seventh child. Both his father, Chen Hongmei (陈红梅), and mother, Madam

Wang, were staunch Buddhists. Because of this, he was exposed to Buddhism at a tender age. Chuk Mor went to a private school when he was ten and proved to be a bright student. His mother passed away while he was eleven and his father became his caregiver. At age twelve, he followed his father to Shou Chang Temple (寿昌寺) at Huangtang (黄塘) to listen to Reverend Qin Han (钦汉法师) explain the Buddhist scripture. The master, noticing that Chuk Mor had an extraordinary poise which was very different from the other children, advised Chuk Mor's father to let him renounce the family and become an extraordinary monk. In 1924, Chuk Mor had his tonsure ceremony and became a monk with the religious name Mo Cheng (默诚) — he was also called Shou Zhi (守志) — under the Venerable Bai Yun (白云长老), abbot of the Shou Chang Temple.

Chuk Mor learned from famous masters when he was young. Master Tai Xu (太虚大师) who proposed Humanistic Buddhism and revolutionized Buddhist ideologies and institutions, probably had the most significant influence on Chuk Mor. In 1930, Chuk Mor followed Reverend Zhi Feng (芝峰法师) to Xiamen (厦门) and studied at the Min Nan Buddhist Institute (闽南佛学院) at Nan Pu Tuo Temple (南普陀寺). The principal at that time was Master Tai Xu. During his years of studying there, Chuk Mor was regarded highly by Master Tai Xu because of his extraordinary intelligence. At age twenty-one, he graduated from the institute and when Master Tai Xu went to Shantou (汕头) to give his lectures, Chuk Mor served as his personal assistant and note taker. Furthermore, in the autumn of 1936, Master Tai Xu wrote to Chuk Mor asking him to be his personal assistant and note taker when the master went to Hong Kong to propagate Buddhism. The name Chuk Mor or Zhu Mo was actually given by Master Tai Xu, after two famous monks, Master Zhu Fa Lan (竺法兰) and Master She Mo Teng (摄摩腾).

Other than the Mingnan Buddhist Institute, Chuk Mor had also studied at the School of Research at the Wuchang Buddhist Institute (武昌佛学院). At the same time, he started taking part in editing the Buddhist magazine, Hai Chao Yin (海潮音). In the spring of 1939, Chuk Mor started teaching Buddhist Studies classes in Gong De Lin (功德林), Macau, and became the chief editor of the Jue Yin monthly magazine (觉音月刊) which propagated Buddhist culture. This magazine, together with the Shi Zi Hou monthly magazine (狮子吼月刊), were two very significant and influential periodicals in Buddhist studies. In 1951 Chuk Mor also started the Wu Jin Deng (无尽灯) Buddhist magazine which was popular in Hong Kong, Macau, and overseas. Other than running Buddhist periodicals, Chuk Mor was also involved in editing the complete works of Master Tai Xu, which were published in Hong Kong.

In the spring of 1954, Chuk Mor officiated at the blessing ceremony of the pagoda containing Master Tai Xu's relics at the Long Hua Buddhist Society (龙华佛教社) in Bangkok, Thailand. After the ceremony, Chuk Mor stayed on to preach and to organize art exhibitions. Later, he was cordially invited to be the instructor at the Phor Tay Institution (菩提学院) in Penang and, at the same time, to conduct Buddhist courses at Phor Tay High School. From then on, Chuk Mor maintained an irrevocable bond with the Buddhist circle in Malaya and eventually left Hong Kong-Macau where he had lived for over a decade.

Chuk Mor became the abbot of The Buddhist Triple Wisdom Hall Temple (三慧讲堂) in 1965 and the principal of the Malaysian Buddhist Institute in 1970. The Buddhist Triple Wisdom Hall Temple's objective is to propagate the teaching of Buddha Dharma for the benefit of all sentient beings as well as cultivating talents. Under the leadership of Chuk Mor, the Dhamma Study Group, Dharma Sunday School, Triple Wisdom Hall Dharma Publications, Education Foundation were gradually established, forming a Buddhist organization that brings together religious practice, education and charity. Such a modernized concept among Singaporean and Malaysian Buddhist organizations in the 1960s was still uncommon. In 1970, Chuk Mor established the Malaysian Buddhist Institute (under the name of the Malaysian Buddhist Association) and was elected as Principal. The Malaysian Buddhist Institute hopes to inculcate the Dharma's talent for teaching in monks and laypersons through a systematic Buddhist education to pass on Buddha's wisdom. The Institute's motto, rules and regulations, courses and graduation song are all written by him. He was the Principal until he passes away in 2002. His selfless contributions clearly reflect his emphasis on Buddhist education. These two designations prompted him to nurture many educated monks and proficient Buddhist speakers in the process. Currently monks doing Buddhism work in Malaysia with the religious name ji (继) are all his disciples. He also had countless lay disciples. On 9 September 1973 when his disciples cerebrated his sixtieth birthday for him. Approximately 3,000 people came from all over Penang including distinguished personages, monks, and lay people. A feast lasting over three days catered to more than 800 people bringing him gifts which exceeded RM40,000. After deducting the expenses of a few thousand ringgit, the remaining sum of RM37,000 was donated to the Malaysian Buddhist Institute.

Chuk Mor was skilled in writing poetry and prose. His painting skills were splendid having been a disciple for three years of Gao Jianfu (高剑父), a great art master of the Ling Nan school (岭南派). Hence, Chuk Mor's contemporaries knew him not only as a monk profoundly cultivated in Buddhism, but also as an artist with extraordinary attainment in literary works, poetry, and calligraphic art. As such Chuk Mor was also dubbed the "Triple Genius in Poetry, Calligraphy, and Painting". After he passed away, in 2003 the Buddhist Triple Wisdom Hall compiled a ten-volume Buddhist work titled, Zhuan Xiang Huashi Wenji (篆香画室文集, A Collection of Zhumo's Works), in memory of him.

From a bird's eye view of the Malaysian Buddhist community or educational circle, Chuk Mor is not only an outstanding representative of the learned monks of Malaysia, but also a shining star in Chinese literary and educational circles. His contributions to Buddhist education, Malaysian Chinese thoughts, and the arts and culture of calligraphy and painting are rarely surpassed.

Chung Dụ Quang

(钟裕光, Zhong Yuguang, 1904–94)

Business and community leader, promoter of education, Vietnam

Chung Dụ Quang was a leader, administrator, and organizer. His knowledge of the world outside China and Vietnam, as well as his vast experience in managing diverse businesses, educational, political, and social organizations, made him a renowned versatile leader in his community. He was trained in hard science and the arts, excelling professionally as an engineer besides being an arts expert and educator. He often played the articulate spokesman for his community in the domestic and international arenas, and maintained his untiring charity efforts and assiduous leadership for key projects of the Chinese community of Saigon in the 1950s. With his pertinacious effort and uncompromising drive, he was remembered for his creative entrepreneurial talent and as a consequential figure in education.

Quang was born in 1904 in either Shaoxing county in Zhejiang province (浙江绍兴), China, or, according to another Chinese-language source published in Vietnam, Duji (诸暨) county in the same province. He studied at the Shanghai Law School (上海法学院) and the Université de Paris (法国巴黎大学) where he specialized in building and architectural studies. Before the war of resistance was waged against the Japanese in China, he was a professor at both the Arts College of the University of Peiping (北平大学艺术学院), later renamed Peking University, and the National Academy of Art in Hangzhou (国立艺术院) founded by the eminent scholar and educator, Cai Yuanpei (蔡元培), and led by Lin Fengmian (林风眠) as its first principal in 1928. Simultaneously Quang was a committee member in charge of designs on the Committee of Development of the Republic of China, and chief engineer at the principal bureau of the Salt Inspectorate (盐务稽核所) under the Ministry of Finance of the Chinese Nationalist Government.

In 1937, Quang came to Vietnam where he became actively involved in commercial and cultural affairs. He was appointed Chairman of the board of Directors of Trung Chính Hospital (Bệnh Viện Trung Chính 中正医院, or 中正西医院; see entry on Thái Thạch) for the fourth and fifth business terms of the hospital after its establishment in 1945. He also once served as the chief of the Sùng Chính Association (Hakka congregation 崇正总会) in Saigon and that of the Alumni for Graduates of Schools in China, France, Belgium, and Switzerland (留越中法比瑞同学会). He also sat on the committees of both the Kuomintang Main Branch in Vietnam (中国国民党越南总支部) and the Friendship Association of the Overseas Chinese (侨代联谊会) in addition to helming the Association of National Salvation and Anti-Communism of the Overseas Chinese of Vietnam (越南华侨反共救国会). On top of all these posts, he was managing director of Da Xia Ribao (大夏日报), one of the Chinese language newspapers circulating in Chợ Lớn during that era. He held almost every key leadership post relating to the affairs of the Chinese including Vice-chairman of the Committee for Assisting Overseas Chinese from North Vietnam (协助越北华侨南撤委员会), whose activities revolved around helping the Chinese who had left the northern region of Vietnam to settle in the south. He was also head of the Guild of Building and Construction and the Guild of Architecture and Decorations. The two guilds were among numerous ones established by and affiliated to the Chinese in Vietnam. In the international realm, Quang served as adviser to the Saigon Chapter of the International Rotary Club and was chairman of District Category 330 of the same club. The district included Indochinese states, Thailand, Singapore, and Malaysia. He also represented districts covering the Philippines, Hong Kong, Taiwan, and Macau.

With his steady gait, confidence, grace and pleasant countenance, Quang exuded an inimitable air of ease and calm. He had considerable influence as his passionate leadership in economic, social and political initiatives was renowned. In 1952–54, while serving as chairman of Trung Chinh Hospital, he personally donated an undisclosed, substantial sum to cover its operational costs. Collaboration with other directors on the board further helped him to raise a million piastres and Vietnamese dong to construct a laboratory and to enable the hospital to offer its medical services free of charge. The buildings for the Sùng Chính congregation, Sùng Chính School (崇正学校), and Sùng Chính Hospital (崇正医院) were established under his auspices as he personally donated 40,000 to 50,000 dong, and the night classes for the Vietnamese language at Sùng Chính School also went smoothly thanks to his donation of 100,000 dong. The Vietnamese language became a mandatory subject in Chinese-medium schools in the Republic of Vietnam in 1957, and there was widespread demand among the Chinese for improvement in their competence in the Vietnamese language. As an energetic promoter of education, Quang also donated generously to other schools. For example, amenities in the room for instruments were built at Trường Tư Do Thái Bình Dương (自由太平洋学校) located in Nguyễn Trãi Street (formerly Quang Trung and Harteman Street), with his contribution of 50,000 dong. Furthermore Quang introduced schemes such as workers' allowance, labour insurance, and scholarships while he was chairman of the Overseas Chinese Adjustment Fund (华侨商团越南都城调剂库), which benefited approximately 100,000 people.

While his interpersonal skills were notable, it was his managerial capability that was greatly admired. His entrepreneurial talent and acumen enabled him to attain a position of prominence in various businesses: he was chairman and managing director of Công ty Phúc Ninh (福宁公司), chief executive officer of Công ty In nhuộm Phúc Ninh (福宁印染公司), a printing and dying company, director of a textile plant, Máy dệt Việt Nam (越南蔴织厂), and managing director of Công ty Xây dựng Phúc Nạp (福纳建筑公司) which was his main business dealing in furnishing and civil projects located in De Lattre de Tassigny Street. As an ardent supporter of the affairs of the Chinese in his community, Quang participated in activities concerning Overseas Chinese organized in the Republic of China. He participated in the Overseas Chinese Economic Forum in 1957 and presented at the First Dialogue in Yangmingshan (阳明山) in 1961 where he impressed his overseas audience as a fervid orator. Thereafter, he assisted in facilitating trade deals between the Central Trust (中央信托局) of republican China and the Government of South Vietnam, as well as in promoting bilateral technological and trade cooperation.

As a member of the Chinese National Salvation Association (华侨救国联合总会), and while assuming the post of managing director at the strongly anti-Communist Chinese-language evening paper, Yuehua Wanbao (Báo Việt Hoa 越华晚报), Quang organized activities such as the anti-Communist demonstration of December 1955. The event drew the support of so many Chinese in Saigon that it was believed to have jolted the community and many others in Southeast Asia. Quang died of an illness in 1994.

Chung Tiong Tay

(庄长泰, Zhuang Changtai, 1919–)
Business leader, promoter of education, Philippines

Chung Tiong Tay is a leader of the tobacco industry in the Philippines. His La Suerte Cigar and Cigarette Manufacturing Company manufactures Philip Morris and Marlboro cigarettes for the Philip Morris Manufacturing Inc. It was the American company's first venture outside the United States. He had also been a director of the Philippine Bank of Communications since 1974 and subsequently rose to be chairman of the Board. Despite his heavy responsibilities in his business establishments, Chung is renowned for the support he gives to education, and for being a pioneer in promoting reforms in, and improving the teaching of the Chinese language in the Philippines — an advocacy for which he has spent considerable finance, time, and effort. He was chairman of the Board of Trustees of his alma mater, Philippine Cultural High School (PCHS), for thirty years. PCHS was the first Chinese-Filipino secondary school in the country and was established by the Philippine Chinese Educational Association in 1923.

Chung was born on 20 December 1919 into an educated family in Jinjiang, China. He studied first in his hometown in Jinjiang, then went to Anglo Chinese School (英华学院) in Gulangyu (鼓浪屿), Xiamen. Subsequently, he joined his father in the Philippines and finished his secondary education there at the Chinese High School (华侨中学), which is now known as Philippine Cultural College (菲律宾侨中学院).

He helped with his father's business after graduation, but at the outbreak of the Sino-Japanese war, Chung secretly packed up some belongings and went back to China to support its war effort. Taking the route from Annam, Vietnam he found his way to Sichuan, and joined the battlefront there and in Chongqing. He also took the opportunity to pursue his college education, finishing a course in banking at the Fudan University (复旦大学) in Sichuan in 1943. It was here that he became an outstanding student leader in 1945, a historical time in Chongqing, from which he returned to his own province where he taught at the Quanzhou Jianguo School of Commerce (泉州建国商校).

At his father's behest, Chung came back to the Philippines to help carry on his father's business. He built on the lucrative overseas remittances business to expand into finance. He also expanded the retail merchandising business into cigarette making. As the president of La Suerte Cigar and Cigarette Manufacturing Company, he expanded and modernized the factory. In 1955, American company Philip Morris Inc. (PMI) entered into an exclusive licensing agreement with La Suerte and introduced PMI products into the Philippine market for the first time. It was PMI's first such agreement outside of the United States; its flagship brands, Marlboro and Philip Morris, started to be produced at La Suerte's manufacturing plant. Chung was also Director of Continental Leaf Tobacco. Since 1974, when the Philippine Bank of Communications became fully Filipino-owned, Chung was a director. He rose to become vice-chairman, then chairman of the board from 1974 to 2005, and honorary chairman from 2005 to 2010.

Although Chung is a successful businessman, he is equally (if not more) renowned for his wholehearted support of education, especially his efforts to promote the excellence and viability of Chinese-language education. He remembers how he had to walk quite a distance just to be able to attend school in Quanzhou; he also recalls how his mother had to sell off some jewellery items in order to raise money for his tuition. Thus, he supported the building of barrio schools in rural areas in the Philippines under the auspices of the flagship project of the Federation of Filipino-Chinese Chambers of Commerce. Chung established the La Suerte Foundation and used it as a base to support education, including the establishment of scholarships to support indigent college, high school, and elementary students. In 1989, together with Cheng Kiat Bun, the La Suerte Foundation took the lead in building a high school, Pingshan High School (平山中学), in his hometown in San Guang Tian (三光天), Jinjiang. This school started as a junior high school, but in 1998, expanded to become a senior high school. The new school gave young students in his hometown easy access to a high school education, which many used to forego because of difficulties in commuting to or boarding in the high school in a nearby town. Chung refused to have his name engraved in the classrooms, requesting the school to honour his father and uncle instead.

Chung was assiduous in his support of reforms in the teaching of the Chinese language. From 1963 to 2000, he was chairman of the Board of Trustees of PCHS, despite the demand on his time and for his attention from his own business. In 1990, having realized that the quality of Chinese education was deteriorating, and that instructional materials had become old and obsolete, Chung, as chairman of the board of PCHS, hired experts at his own expense to revise and prepare instructional materials that would suit the needs of the local-born young generation of the Chinese Filipinos, for whom the Chinese language was often a second or third language. It was a project that took seven years to complete, and Chung was the sole financial supporter. The textbooks and new instructional materials spearheaded the move to teach Chinese as more than a second language, but also to non-Chinese speakers. In 1991, led again by Chung as chairman, and with the support of members of the board of trustees and directors of the Alumni Association, the Philippine Chinese Education Research Center was established. It was tasked to promote reforms in the teaching of the Chinese language within the country. Chung was also concerned about the physical expansion of the institutes and so initiated the construction of an extension of PCHS in Caloocan city, south of Manila, to decongest the Manila main campus. In June 1967, classes were held in the four-storey annex campus in Caloocan City with more than 300 students. In the 1980s, the reconstruction of the school building at the main campus started under the leadership of Chung and in June 1988, the new five-storey school building at the Manila campus was inaugurated at a cost of 40 million pesos — a staggering amount in 1988.

Chung took his social responsibilities seriously, especially those involving the organizations of the Chinese community that he was elected into. He used to serve as chairman of the board of trustees of Anglo Chinese School, the oldest Chinese elementary school in the Philippines established in 1899. He also served as president of the Chinese Boys Scouts of the Philippines. As a member of the executive committee of the Federation of Filipino-Chinese Chambers of Commerce, he was concurrently the head of the welfare committee, where he headed the construction project for the federation's seven-storey building in Binondo, Manila. Chung was subsequently elected vice-president of this body.

Ciputra

(Tjie Tjin Hoan, 徐振环, Xu Zhenhuan, 1931–)

Business tycoon, Indonesia

Ir. Ciputra is an architect and businessman who became famous for his innovations in the property sector, including the development of satellite cities in Indonesia. He is a serial entrepreneur who (co)founded three business groups: Pembangunan Jaya, the Metropolitan Group, and the Ciputra Group. Ir. Ciputra is known as a visionary and creative entrepreneur and a sponsor of education.

Tjie Tjin Hoan, the former name of Ciputra, was born as the third child of Tjie Sim Poe and Lie Eng Nio, an ethnic Chinese merchant family, on 24 August 1931 in Parigi, a small town in Central Sulawesi. His father was interned by the Japanese on false charges of spying for the Dutch, and he passed away in prison in 1943, when Ciputra was only 12 years old. Ciputra, now a fatherless child, was raised in poverty, but he was able to continue his schooling after the war. He attended high school in Manado, the capital of North Sulawesi, and subsequently went to the famous Institute of Technology Bandung (ITB) in Java, where he studied architecture.

During his university days in Bandung, at the age of 24, Ciputra married Dian Sumeler, whom he had known in Sulawesi. Because the allowance he received from his mother was not sufficient, he started his own consulting agency with two friends, Ir. Budi Brasali and Ir. Ismail Sofyan, aside from continuing his studies in architecture in Bandung.

After graduating in 1960, Ciputra decided that, rather than working as a consultant, he wanted to implement his own ideas as a developer. He subsequently managed to convince the then governor of Jakarta, Soemarno, of his talents. He became the Chief Executive Officer of Pembangunan Jaya, a developer partially owned by the provincial government, where he stayed for 35 years and worked closely with several of Jakarta's former governors. Notable projects included the development of Ancol Dreamland and the Senen Market. In exchange for his services, Ciputra received a minority shareholding in the company. Behind his property projects were original and visionary ideas for the future social conditions of Indonesia.

He also established the Metropolitan Group, with his two university friends Ir. Brasali and Ir. Sofyan, where he became the president commissioner, a role in which he actively provided guidance and facilitated the development of this group. Other investors, such as the Salim Group, were also involved in a subsidiary of the Metropolitan Group, which developed projects such as Pondok Indah in Jakarta and also had investments abroad. Unlike other business tycoons of his generation, Ir. Ciputra has always remained focused on what he knew best: property. As an expert in this field, Ir. Ciputra also set up and became the Founding President of the Indonesian Real Estate Association (REI) and became the first Indonesian to head the World Real Estate Federation (FIABCI) from 1994–1996.

In the 1980s, when his children graduated and returned from their university studies overseas, Ciputra started his own family group, the Ciputra Group, in which his wife, his brother, all his children and his two sons-in-law and one daughter-in law are involved. The new Ciputra Group was created for his children, whom he hoped would grow as professionals and continue to build the family tradition in property. The Ciputra Group developed rapidly and specialized in large property projects, such as Citra Raya in Surabaya, and another 30 projects in Indonesia and overseas. Because these required advanced project management, Ciputra hired professionals and modernized his company, which is often admired for its skills to take on complex projects involving multiple stakeholders. Despite his advanced age, Ir. Ciputra is still active in the company as a mentor and is now considered its "creative navigator".

During the Asian Crisis, the Ciputra group of companies almost collapsed under its debts, which were partly in US dollars, and which ballooned after the value of the rupiah declined rapidly. In addition, riots broke out in Jakarta, and rioters damaged properties and people of Chinese descent, but fortunately, Ciputra's properties were not badly affected. However, sales dropped dramatically, and several projects were abandoned while angry customers and contractors demanded to be paid. The group spent many years settling and renegotiating its debts and paying off loans, and was able to restructure and become stable profitable again only in 2005, behind most of its competitors.

After recovering from the economic crisis of the late 1990s, Ciputra intensified his strategy to internationalize his family business with projects in Vietnam, Cambodia and China, with the intention to turn the Ciputra Group into a multinational company. The Ciputra Group became well known for its project to construct an international satellite city in Hanoi, Vietnam, in cooperation with the local Vietnamese government. He also responded to the decentralization of political power and responsibilities in Indonesia after the fall of Soeharto by investing more outside Java in the provinces. In addition, the large projects that were its trademark before the crisis have now made way for smaller projects, financed less with debt.

Ciputra's company is divided into three divisions, each run by a set of family members and consists of three separate companies that are listed on the stock exchange in Jakarta: Ciputra Development, Ciputra Surya and Ciputra Property, which was listed on the stock exchange in 2007.

Ir. Ciputra has also invested in the media industry and owns stakes in various magazines and newspapers. Aside from business, Ciputra is also well known for promoting education, which has helped him to succeed in life as a self-made man, as well as entrepreneurship, which he believes holds the key for a more prosperous and modern Indonesia. Ciputra built ten schools, and is known in particular for setting up the Ciputra University of Entrepreneurship in Surabaya, through which he aims to pass on the spirit of entrepreneurship to new generations. In 2008, at the age of 77, he received an honorary doctorate from Tarumanegara University because of his extraordinary contribution to development, entrepreneurship and education in Indonesia.

Ir. Ciputra and Dian Sumeler have four children: Rina, Junita, Cakra and Candra. He is also an avid collector of paintings by the late Hendra Gunawan, a well-known Indonesian painter, whose painted creatures have been transformed in to sculptures which are scattered all over the many Ciputra property projects. He is now preparing to build a private family museum that will be the largest Fine Arts museum in Jakarta, covering 10,000 m^2. Ir. Ciputra is a religious man who often attributes his successes to God rather than his own considerable talent and creativity.

Co, Charlie

(王显良, Wang Xianliang, 1960–)
Artist, Philippines

Charlie Co is one of the foremost artists in the Philippines, especially distinguished for mastering two mediums in visual arts — painting and sculpture. Known as a social realist, Co was among the pioneering artists in the Visayan region who expressed the starkness of poverty and injustice in their communities creatively. A testament to his accomplishments is seen in major cultural edifices in the Philippines such as the National Museum, and in other parts of the world, including Australia, Japan, Singapore, etc.

Born on 5 November 1960, Charlie Co is the son of industrious and enterprising parents, Co Pao and Pacita Sia, of Bacolod City on the island of Negros in the southern Philippines. Co Pao was an immigrant who sailed to the Philippines alone at the age of nine from Amoy, China. He was the eldest among nine siblings and became the breadwinner when their father passed away. He was unable to finish even elementary school. Sia, on the other hand, was born in Passi, Iloilo, to a pure Chinese father (Alfonso Sia) and a Filipino mother (Josefina Parcon) in 1923. Their business back then in the 1950s was a tannery, making leather slippers. Like many immigrants, Co's parents started with nothing. After getting married, they rented a tiny property in front of a university in Bacolod (now University of Negros Occidental Recolletos), where they lived and set up a small canteen that catered to college students. They had three children at the time — the eldest son, Nelson, and two daughters, Belen and Sonia. Then came Felicidad. Charlie Co is the youngest of five siblings. In 1957, Co's parents started to buy and sell upholstery materials in a small rented shop. It expanded and they started accepting the repair of furniture as well, and were finally able to purchase land to build their house in 1968, where they also set up their furniture factory. Sia then convinced her husband to open a small furniture display room in 1970, which they named "Nelson's Furniture". In 1972, Co Pao bought a 1,600-sqm property and set up the biggest furniture showroom in Bacolod, becoming one of the town's most well known furniture makers and catering mainly to rich and affluent families. The building, now named Pacita Arcade after Sia, is still where the family lives to this day.

It is this environment of carpentry, furniture making, and art that has influenced Co since he was young. He even made his own toys from scrap wood. His father, being strict with the quality of the furniture they produced, was an artist in his own right. Co's mother, Sia, now 88 years old, started to paint as a therapy after the elder Co died. Belen was Co's first teacher in painting since she studied fine arts at La Consolacion College in Bacolod. Sonia Co is an interior designer.

Co began studying fine arts at La Consolacion College in Bacolod, and then went to the capital of Manila to continue his education at the Philippine Women's University. He later took up interior design at the Philippine School of Interior Design with the intention of helping in the family's furniture business in Bacolod. This educational grounding in the visual arts and interior design gave Co a unique edge over some of his contemporaries, as he was able to straddle both the fields of visual art and design.

On completing his studies, and after creating his first body of work, Co returned to Bacolod and mounted his first one-man show, Ekspresyon, in 1983. Since then, Co has put on more than thirty-five solo exhibitions and has joined more than forty-five group shows, not only in the Philippines, but also in Europe, Asia, Australia, and the Americas. His style — described in the Cultural Center of the Philippines' Encyclopedia of Philippine Art as "figurative expressionism bordering on surrealism" — had brought him honours and accolades, and established him as one of the respected contemporary artists of the Philippines.

Co's father never approved of his being an artist. He would always say that there was no prospect in art and would have wanted Co to help in the family's furniture business. Whenever he saw Co drawing, he would tell his son to go with the driver to deliver furniture or collect payments from customers. He never attended any of Co's exhibitions. It was a big struggle for Co during the first years of his profession, as his father thought the exhibitions were just an excuse for him to hang out and enjoy with friends. It was only when Co Pao was dying of colon cancer and Co received the 13th Artists Award from the Cultural Center of the Philippines (CCP) in 1990 when he finally saw Co's passion for art and accepted his son's chosen profession. He told the rest of the family to do the same. That was the peace pact between father and son before Co Pao passed away.

Because of his reactionary paintings, his being involved in propaganda, and his active role as an artist who creates works that speak of the plight of society, Co was originally known as a "social realist". Along with the Black Artists of Asia, Co developed his aesthetic sensibilities and painted art pieces based on his immediate surroundings — the apparent disparity between the rich and the poor, the sufferings of the sugarcane workers, the blatant corruption in the government, and everything in between. It is this intense social experience that constitutes the background of Co's art, be it the social realism of the Marcos years, or even the colourful imagery of the hometown fiesta in his later personal paintings that are tinged with loneliness and heartbreak.

What makes Co stand out even more than his colourful masterpieces is his commitment to giving young contemporary artists a venue to display what they're capable of. As a matter of fact, his gallery has now become the watering hole of brooding poets, burgeoning, independent filmmakers, and up-coming visual artists back in Bacolod.

As a dominant figure in the art scene — having evolved from an exhibitor to a contestant in national, regional, and world competitions — Co has caught the attention of Asian art critics and art collectors revisiting the styles and expressions of contemporary Filipino artists. He has thereby earned himself a visible niche in the fast growing Asian art markets of Singapore, Hong Kong, Shanghai, and Beijing. Along with a young Chinese businessman, Benjamin Lopue III, they set up Gallery Orange, the largest art gallery in Bacolod City, to showcase the city's local young and established artists. It has helped fuel and revitalize the local art scene and has paved the way for young artists in their chosen fields.

Co has received various awards and recognitions from distinguished art and cultural organizations, including the above-mentioned award from the CCP, and the 2008 Jose Rizal Award for Excellence (in Arts and Culture) from The Manila Times and the Kaisa Para sa Kaunlaran. Co has also represented the Philippines in exhibitions abroad, such as the Negros-Japan Exhibition Program (1986, Tokyo, Japan); Images of Contemporary Struggle (1989, Art Space Visual Art Center, Sydney, Australia); the Naguri Open Air Art Exhibition (1992, Naguri, Japan); Asia and Modernism (1995, Japan Foundation Asean Cultural Center, Akasaka, Japan); the 2nd Asia Pacific Contemporary Art Trienniale (1996, Brisbane, Australia); the 23rd Sao Paolo Bienniale, (1996, Brazil); the 2nd International Clay Works Symposium and Exhibition (1997, Toki City, Japan); the Taegu Asia Art Exhibition (1997, Korea); the ASEAN Art Awards (1999, National Gallery, Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia); The Big Picture (2007, Singapore Art Museum); Tenggara: Recent Paintings from Malaysia, Indonesia and the Philippines (2008, Contemporary Urban Centre, Liverpool, UK); and Thrice Upon a Time (2009, Singapore Art Museum). He has likewise been invited to sit as a judge of prestigious art competitions, the most recent being the 2010 Ateneo Art Awards.

Perhaps as a fitting tribute to his artistic accomplishments, Co's artwork is proudly installed at the new Bacolod-Silay Airport and in the collections of various museums around Asia, most importantly, at the National Museum of the Philippines, the Metropolitan Museum of Manila, the Cultural Center of the Philippines, the Lopez Museum, the Bencab Museum, Banko Sentral ng Pilipinas, the Queensland Art Gallery in Brisbane, Australia, the Fukuoka Museum in Japan, and the Singapore Art Museum. His works are also found in select Philippine and Asian corporate and personal art collections.

Co is married to Ann Jalandoni Legaspi, the youngest daughter of sugarcane planters Manuel and Margarita of Silay City. They do not have children. While Co is a full-time painter, his wife is into pastry and wedding cake creations.

Personal Interview with Charlie Co.

Coseteng, Anna Dominique M.L.

(许尔绮, Xu Erqi, 1952–)
Senator, Philippines

Anna Dominique Marquez Lim Coseteng, more popularly known as "Nikki", is a former Philippine congresswoman and senator. She was first thrust into the political limelight as a street parliamentarian and human rights activist in the Marcos years (beginning in 1972 when Martial Law was declared) during her days at the University of the Philippines (U.P.). Coseteng stood firmly for sovereignty, justice, and women's rights throughout the years. Looking back at that part of her life she states, "Lost causes were the only causes worth dying for."

While still at U.P., the student repression in the 1970s stoked the flames of rebellion in Coseteng, who joined street marches and protests against the dictatorship. Soon after the assassination of Benigno Aquino Jr, she held public forums to raise awareness of the situation besetting the country.

During the snap elections of 1986, she was an active member of an organization called WOMB or Women for the Ouster of Marcos and Boycott. She said, "We (WOMB) were boycotting the elections because at that time we felt that no clean honest elections could be held under those circumstances." A weekly forum engaged women to be more involved and to create awareness of what was going on for the general public.

In 1987 she was elected a member of the House of Representatives under the all-women political party she co-founded, Kababaihan para sa Inang Bayan (Women for the Motherland), and eventually became a Philippine senator in 1992, under the National People's Coalition Party. Coseteng ran and won a second term in the senate, which she served from 1995 to 2001.

She headed various committees during her stint as a Philippine senator. She was the chairperson of the Committee on Women and Family Relations, Committee on Cultural Communities, Committee on Civil Service and Government Reorganization, Committee on Rural Development and Committee on Trade and Commerce. She was also vice-chairperson for the Committee on Cooperatives, Agriculture, Foreign Affairs, Public Works, Education, Labor and the powerful Appropriations Committee, and the Commission on Appointments.

As a neophyte lawmaker, Coseteng filed the first bill seeking a debt cap with a provision on full disclosure, as well as other bills and resolutions that reflected her nationalism and dedication to pro-people causes. She made it her crusade to go against global institutions such as the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and The World Bank. This culminated in her filing of Senate Bill 1412 that sought a one-year debt-service moratorium. At that time, the Philippines owed between $35–40 billion to foreign banks.

In addition to filing Bill 1412, she also spearheaded the "Tao Muna Bago Utang" ("People First Before Debt") movement. For this, she travelled all over the country to explain the debt issue and its implications on the country's economy. She has visited almost all the municipalities, cities and provinces of the Philippines and is an adopted daughter of many of these: Iloilo, Antique, Nueva Ecija, Agusan del Sur, Zamboanga del Sur, Capiz, and many others.

Coseteng also filed Senate Bill 1413, or the Women's Anti-Rape Bill that sought to redefine and reclassify rape from a crime against chastity, to a crime against persons. Consulting with various women's groups and holding extensive dialogues to find solutions to the growing problem of violence against women and reproductive rights, she succeeded in gaining congressional approval for House Bill 6265 having reclassified rape as crimes against persons. Gabriela, a Philippine women's rights organization, hailed the passage as a turn in the right direction.

During her second term as senator, she served as chair of the Senate Committee on Labor and filed bills that sought to promote and protect the rights of Overseas Filipino Workers (OFWs). She also filed bills that prohibited discrimination against women workers, increased vacation and sickness benefits of workers, and developed the informal labour sector. There were also bills that allowed workers more access to state pension funds known as the Social Security System and Government Service Insurance System benefits.

Many OFWs went to her for help with most of them seeking assistance because they had been victimized by recruitment agencies. Others went to the office seeking medical help. Coseteng would work with the Philippine Overseas Employment Administration, the Philippine Charity Sweepstakes Office, as well as the National Kidney Institute, to alleviate the OFWs' problems.

As a public official, she was a convenor of many conferences all revolving around the theme of women, women's rights, and family.

Born on 18 December 1952, Coseteng is the eldest of two boys and three girls. Her parents were the late businessman/industrialist Emerson Coseteng and Ambassador Alice Guanco Marquez-Lim. She is fluent in English, Tagalog, Ilonggo, and the Chinese Hokkien dialect.

Her paternal roots are traceable to Tan Na and Chim Ho in Fujian Province, and her grandfather on this side was Eduardo Coseteng also known as Co Yu Chao. The elder Coseteng operated a sawmill that was located in Balut, Tondo. He later co-founded one the country's biggest banks — Equitable Banking Corporation — with fellow Chinese-Filipino Go Kim Pah. Her grandmother, Tan So Kwan, was a well educated lady who lived a life of selfless simplicity and total dedication to family.

Co Yu Chao was born in the village of Fulin in Jinjiang, Fujian, in 1900 and came to the Philippines with an uncle when he was twelve. After university, he joined his uncle in the lumber business and in 1925 became manager of Yi Fong Lumber. In 1930, Co travelled throughout Southeast Asia to find business prospects. He held various key positions in the Chinese community, such as president of the Lumber Merchants Association and the Chinese Chamber of Commerce, and subsequently vice-president of the Fujian Salvation Movement.

As president of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce, he brought a delegation to Fujian and promised to mobilize the strength and resources of the Chinese community in the Philippines for the salvation of Fujian. The commander of the 19th route army, Cai Ting Kai, was truly touched and under the Fujian Secessionist Movement, Co was designated mayor of Xiamen. He authored two language tool books: Chinese-English Conversation and English-Chinese-Tagalog Conversation.

Coseteng's mother, Alice Guanco Marquez Lim, has an equally colourful ancestry, being descended from Philippine Senator Esperidion Guanco and feminist-activist Nicetas Siguenza from Pototan, Iloilo and Hinigaran, Negros Occidental.

Coseteng's father, Emerson Coseteng, was a banker (president of Feati Bank in the 1960s), and industrialist (he founded the Mariwasa Group of Companies, the leading manufacturer of ceramic products in the Philippines). He was an avid sportsman and founded the Philippine Basketball Association.

Coseteng is a recipient of numerous awards, such as being named one of the Top Human Advocates in the Senate (1992–95); one of the Twelve Outstanding Freshmen Solons in 1991, one of the Top Ten Outstanding Representatives in 1991, Outstanding Congresswoman in 1989, and one of the Top Ten Lawmakers and Achievers in 1988. She also received the Gawad Maria Clara Trophy — A Symbol of Filipina Womanhood in 1990.

Coseteng now serves as president and CEO of Diliman Educational Corporation, which runs the Diliman Preparatory School and the Diliman Computer Technology Institute. The school was established by her mother and colleagues from U.P. Diliman, and celebrated its fortieth anniversary in 2009.

Her family includes a son and a daughter who are both achievers in their own right. Coseteng's daughter, Kimberly, is an accomplished and outstanding executive of Johnson & Johnson in Singapore, while her son, Julian, has followed in her footsteps in politics by becoming a three-term councillor of Quezon City. He has served as the president of the National Movement of Young Legislators.

Cu Unjieng, Guillermo A.

Entrepreneur, business leader, Philippines

Born into a poor fishing family of six children on 1 January 1867, Guillermo A. Cu Unjieng was only eleven years old when his father passed away. The third of four brothers, Cu Unjieng was the first member of his immediate family to leave his village to go overseas and seek his fortune. He made the journey to the Philippines in his mid-teens, accompanied by an older male cousin. They arrived in Manila probably in 1882, during the high tide of Chinese immigration to the Philippines.

At the beginning, Cu took on whatever work he could find. Eventually, thanks to the fact that he was literate, he managed to obtain a position as a clerk in a Chinese textile firm, the Hap Hin Dry Goods Store, which also engaged in direct importation. After a few weeks, he was promoted to bookkeeper, a position he held for five years.

Although Cu had received only a few years of education in a small, traditional, clan-run Chinese school, he had beautiful calligraphy, which was unusual for someone of his social class and generation. While his job did not pay much, he managed to save a little money and, more importantly, gain practical knowledge of how the dry goods business was run.

Sometime afterwards, he was promoted from salaried employee to manager of the firm in which he worked, with a ten per cent share of the profits. Over the next four years, he succeeded in turning the firm into one of the largest of its kind in Manila. In the process, he gained the reputation of being one of Manila's youngest and most competent managers.

Using money he had saved, plus capital contributions from some friends, he started Cu Unjieng and Company (大兴有限公司), which began operations in Rosario Street. In another partnership, Cu partly owned and fully managed Siuliong and Company (炳记行). The business engaged in import and export, semi-banking operations for the Chinese community (mainly the handling of remittances from Chinese in the Philippines to their families in China), extending crop loans, and underwriting the trips of merchant ships travelling to and from China.

He spent most of his time and effort in managing Siuliong and Company, which prospered, eventually achieving the distinction of being the only Chinese firm to be included in the shortlist of "most valued customers" of the Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation in Manila. Cu's association with Siuliong and Company would last until 1926, nearly the entire lifetime of the firm.

By the time of the outbreak of the Spanish-American War (1898–99), Cu, at thirty-one years of age, was a wealthy and prominent man. During the period of the Philippine Revolution (1896–98) and the Spanish-American War, the Huaqiao Shanju Gongsuo (华侨善举公所), known in Spanish as the "Comunidad de Chinos", encountered difficulties keeping its operations going as many of the shop owners and businessmen on whom the organization relied for donations, temporarily suspended their activities. Founded in 1870, it was one of two institutions of the time that spoke for the Chinese community in the Philippines as a whole. For a few years immediately following the American takeover of the Philippines from Spain, it was renamed the Philippine Chinese Charitable Association, the sole institution that championed the Chinese-Filipino community.

It was at this juncture that Cu, director of the Shanju Gongsuo in 1898–99, made a timely donation to the organization and engaged in fund-raising efforts on its behalf. This resulted in the collection of tens of thousands of pesos for the organization, which allowed it to continue its operations.

This action, coming at a time of crisis in a period of transition for the Chinese community and for the Philippines as a whole, helped propel Cu from being a rising member of the Chinese elite in the Philippines, to the very top ranks of that community. It was during the first three decades of the American occupation of the Philippines that he reached the peak of his influence and career.

The Shanju Gongsuo, as a charitable organization, could not credibly continue to act as the voice of the various Chinese businessmen in the Philippines on issues affecting their commercial interests. Therefore in 1900 Cu proposed the founding of a merchants' council that became the Manila Chinese Commercial Council, and set about contacting various businessmen to organize such a body. The chamber, which came to be known as the Philippine Chinese General Chamber of Commerce, was recognized by both Chinese and non-Chinese alike as the organization that represented the Chinese community in the Philippines as a whole.

Cu served as the first president of the body from 1904–06, and again in 1917–18. During his time in office, Cu led the Chinese community in protesting against the American Government's extension of the Chinese Exclusion Act to the Philippines. Under this law, all Chinese, with the exception of officials, teachers, students, merchants, or tourists, were barred from entering the Philippines. The policy remained in force until 1940.

After the outbreak of the 1911 Revolution that was soon to result in the establishment of the Republic of China, Cu, in his position as a leader of the Chinese community and a Chinese citizen, immediately donated 5,000 pesos personally to aid the uprising, which encouraged other Chinese in the Philippines to follow suit. The result was that, from the middle of October to about the first ten days of November, the Chinese in the Philippines donated a total of 77,000 pesos to the revolutionary government.

In 1906, Cu embarked on a new venture, the founding of Yek Tong Lin (YTL) Fire and Marine Insurance Co., Ltd. (益同人火烛/洋面兼担保有限公司), the country's first domestically organized insurance company. Cu was the moving force in a group of fourteen investors, all of them Chinese living in the Philippines. At the time, American, British, and other western companies dominated the areas of fire and marine insurance. In the 1930s, the company began to offer personal accident insurance.YTL would remain the sole domestically organized insurance company in the Philippines for the next twenty five years. It still exists today as the Philippines First Insurance Co., Inc., a name that reflects its role as a pioneering Philippine institution.

Another highlight of Cu's career was his involvement in the founding of the China Banking Corporation (Chinabank), the first locally owned Chinese bank in the Philippines. Cu is credited as being the one to suggest the idea of such a bank and to have made the initial push for its realization. The need for such a bank had become pressing. The Chinese had become major players in the economy of the Philippines. Yet they found it difficult to obtain credit from the banks in the Philippines and, for the most part, had to resort to borrowing money from friends and relatives, or from private Chinese moneylenders and remittance firms.

The Chinabank was incorporated under Philippine law on 20 July 1920, and began operations formally on 16 August 1920 in Binondo, Manila. As one of the founders and incorporators of the bank, Cu held post as one of its eleven founding directors until 1937.The bank prospered and is still one of the most trusted banks of today.

Cu was at the height of his career in the late 1920s when Who's Who in the Philippines called him the "Richest Chinese in the Philippines". At one time, Cu had his personal fortune estimated at 10 million pesos.

He retired from active involvement in business in the late 1930s and passed away on 17 October 1953, at his home in San Pedro, Laguna, at the age of eighty-seven.

On his death, a donation of 100,000 pesos was made to the Philippine Chinese Charitable Association in the name of the Cu Unjieng family, for the construction of a building at the Chinese General Hospital. This building, used as a tuberculosis ward, was named the "Guillermo A. Cu Unjieng Memorial Building" (邱允衡纪念堂).

Cu had a full family life. He had a total of seventeen children (ten sons and seven daughters) who survived to adulthood. His descendants from the male line use the following surnames: Khu, Cu Unjieng, and Cu. Of all of his children, it was his daughter Esperanza who came to be considered something of an institution in Manila. As a Catholic nun with the Assumption order, she was the moving force in the post-war rebuilding of the heavily damaged Assumption College. She is also credited with having founded Assumption's College Department in 1946. She became its dean, recruited a top-notch faculty, and mentored many students. In recognition of her services, she received two honorary doctorates: a doctor of education from De La Salle University in 1965, and a doctor of humanities from Araneta University in 1977.

D

Dai Xiao Hua

Writer, Chinese association leader, Malaysia

Dai Xiao Hua, who was born in Taiwan in 1949, is a famous Chinese writer in Malaysia. She was the president of The Writers' Association of Chinese Medium of Malaysia for two terms and is also the president of the Malaysian Chinese Cultural Society since 2003. As a writer, she is recognized and respected by writers especially woman writers from overseas. As a result she was elected as third president of the World Overseas Woman Writers' Association. During her term as the president of the Malaysian Chinese Cultural Society, she was invited to be chairman of a famous debate between two political parties, viz. the Malaysian Chinese Association (MCA) and the Democratic Action Party (DAP). As a cultural figure, she was awarded the Honourable Contribution Award by the king of Malaysia.

From 1968 to 1971, when she was at a university campus as an undergraduate, she was a keen writer of articles. During this period too, she founded The New World Press with her friends and was its deputy president. The publication was a monthly, which provided her with a training ground for her writing. However, her writing career did not continue after she graduated from the university. Instead she stopped writing for ten years. In 1973, she married a Malaysian businessman and has stayed in Malaysia since then.

Dai started writing again in 1986 and wrote not only prose, but also discussive essays and television drama. Her literary works were published in Nanyang Siang Pau (南洋商报) and her television dramas were well received by Malaysian. In 1986, her television drama, Frightening Experience during The Honeymoon (蜜月惊魂) was made into a television series and released on local television channel RTM2. The following year, she started writing another television drama, City Built in the Sand (沙城) and had it published in April 1988 by Shi Fang Publisher (十方出版社). The drama was made into a nine-chapter television series and this made her well known among Malaysians. That drama has a realistic moral theme, and its intense cultural content and vivid portrayal of characters make them readily come to life. The tortuous plot, but simple and active language employed, contributed to the success of the drama, the extremely good response to which established her a place in the Malaysian Chinese writing arena. As a writer, she is versatile in many aspects such as drama, prose, novels and commentaries. Her works are popular in Mainland China and other parts of the world with overseas Chinese.

In 1990, just before the Malaysian Government imposed the ban on Malaysians visiting China, Dai Xiao Hua became the first Malaysian writer to be invited to lecture in China. She then wrote a number of articles on her visit to China, which she claimed to be a special and memorable journey in her life. The articles were then collected in a book entitled Dai Xiao Hua's Journey to China (戴小华中国行). In 1996, she was offered the visiting professor post at the Ni Nan University of China.

Dai's works have won some literary awards. As early as in 1986, her prose, Auntie Ah Chun (阿春嫂) won the literary award organized by the Nanyang Siang Pau. In 1992, her book on her journey to China won the first "Xu Xia Ke Literary Award" (徐霞客文学奖), in a competition which drew writer contestants from Mainland China, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Macau, and other overseas Chinese writers.

Dai Xiao Hua published a few important works between 1988 and 1996. As mentioned earlier, her television drama, City Built in the Sand (沙城) was published in 1988. Four years later, she published Dai Xiao Hua's Journey to China. The same year, she published Surging Forward (风起云涌), The Golden Touch (点石成金), The Great Pen (巨笔如椽), which comprised her interviews and dialogues with famous figures in Malaysia, including political figures, successful entrepreneurs, and renowned cultural figures. In the books, there are not only interesting dialogues, but also interesting narrations as well as her comments on the figures overall. In short, these three books are not merely a compilation of interviews and dialogues, they are literary pieces and this pushed them high in the bestseller book list not only in Malaysia, but also in China. The following year, she published another collection of prose entitled Whereabouts in the Remotest Corner of the Earth (天涯行踪). In 1994, her first novel, No Regret in This Life (悔不过今生) was published. The book reflected her concern on woman issues.

In 1999, she published three books namely Dai Xiaohua's Eyes (戴小华眼), Who Says I Do Not Mind (谁说我不在乎), and Heartless Journey (永结无情游). All of them were published in Malaysia. Dai Xiao Hua's importance as an internationally recognized writer can be seen from the number of her books published in Taiwan and China. In Taiwan, three of her books were published, viz. a collection of prose, Looking at the World with Deep Feelings (深情看世界), a collection of satirical essays entitled Not Feeling Regret in This Life (悔不过今生) and a collection of reportive literature entitled The Most Attractive Woman is Woman with Ideas (有想法的女人最有魅力).

Dai Xiao Hua also involved herself actively in editing works. From 1991 to 2004, she edited ten volumes of books, four of which were published in Malaysia, and three each in Taiwan and China. In 1996, she was invited to be the editor of a books series entitled the Golden Spider Series (金蜘蛛丛书) by China He Bei Educational Publisher. The series, with twenty-three books in all, won good response from readers abroad. In 2002, she acted as the chief editor of a very important series of the Malaysian Chinese Society — Mahua Wencun (马华文存). The ten books in the series denote the important issues of Malaysian Chinese community from 1980 to 2000, such as education, economics, and others. In 2004, as the president of Writers' Association of Chinese Medium of Malaysia, she succeeded in publishing of the Comprehensive Anthology of Malaysian Chinese Literature (马华文学大系). The anthology consists of ten books covering different genres such as poetry, prose, novels, drama, literary criticisms, and historical materials. She was its chief editor. These two series, which comprise twenty books in total, can be regarded as the twin towers in the history of Malaysian Chinese culture. She was also the editor of the Collection of Seminar Papers of the Second International Conference on Malaysian Chinese Literature, which was published by Shan Dong Literary Publisher in 2004.

Dai Xiao Hua is internationally well known as a writer, as well as a distinguished and influential woman. The organizer of the Fourth World Woman Conference published a book entitled Hua Xia Famous Women (华夏女名人), which included 140 famous Chinese woman around the world and Dai Xiao Hua was the only woman from Malaysia who was included in the book.

Due to her great contribution to Malaysia and also the good relations between Malaysia and China, and particularly the provinces of Shan Dong and Jiang Xi, she was named "The National Warrior" (KMN) (护国勇士) by the king of Malaysia in 1999, and given the Malaysia-China Good Relations Award (马中友好贡献奖) in 2004, the "Honourable Citizen" title by the Shan Dong local government in 2004, and the Jiang Xi local government in 2005.

From 1986 to the present, Dai Xiao Hua has published twenty-two books, and edited ten books. Some of her books have been translated into English, French, Russian, and other languages and distributed worldwide.

Dakay, Benson

(尤金隆, You Jinlong, 1955–2012)

Entrepreneur, community leader, Philippines

Considered the father of the local carrageenan industry, Benson Dakay steered his Cebu-grown Shemberg Group to become largest producer of refined and semi-refined carrageenan in the world. Dakay was very concerned with the overall development of the seaweed industry, especially the growth of his company, which affected the livelihood of tens of thousands of farmers and around 2,000 employees.

Born on 26 March 1955, Dakay had the family's entrepreneurial spirit in his blood. His father, Ernesto, was also a businessman who made mosquito coils for a living. Under the tutelage of an uncle, Dakay earned his first million at age nineteen. He started by exporting raw seaweeds and then changed to manufacturing carrageenan, a raw material extracted from seaweeds. Dakay could become a millionaire at such a tender age because his entrepreneurial and pioneering enterprise had succeeded in turning the farming of the lowly regarded Philippine seaweed into a multimillion peso industry. This bold venture enabled farmers and fisherfolks, especially in the impoverished coastal towns of Visayas and Mindanao, to find a new source of livelihood and a much needed source of extra income.

But like most businessmen, Dakay was caught in the Asian financial crisis of 1997, which brought the peso down to half its worth, causing his dollar-denominated loans to be doubled almost overnight. Creditors were demanding outright payment of his multibillion peso loans. He almost gave up his business ventures, and regarded that as one of the hardest times of his life, which in turn also strengthened his resilience. He managed to negotiate with the creditors for the restructuring of his loans. Having learned his lesson the hard way, Dakay made it a point to keep his bank payments up-to-date, as well as use all excess funds to upgrade technology and expand the carrageenan market. While Dakay could have closed shop and lived off his savings from years of being ahead of the game, he could not, in good conscience, simply leave the farmers empty-handed. Business was definitely difficult, but helping poor farmers earn a living by providing them with an alternative means of livelihood — seaweed farming — gave Dakay a sense of fulfilment and inspired him to push forward.

The Shemberg Group, a company Dakay started from scratch, is now the largest producer of refined and semi-refined carrageenan in the world, producing 9,000 metric tons per year. The Group has eight carrageenan refineries located in various parts of the Philippines, with major product lines that include raw seaweed, as well as traditionally refined and natural-grade carrageenan, which supply raw materials for food, dairy, air freshener, oral and personal care products, cosmetics, pharmaceuticals, biotechnological, and other industrial and consumer products. Shemberg is unrivalled as the only carrageenan manufacturer to utilize a variety of processes providing different levels of carrageenan refining. This enables them to provide customers with the most cost-effective carrageenan for their specific applications. Instrumental in introducing commercial seaweed farming in the region, Shemberg secured a preferred position in marketing the Philippine seaweed, both for its own use, and for use by other carrageenan producers. As a result of these activities, Shemberg now provides a livelihood for more than 40,000 coastal families while helping to save the Philippine coastal reefs from destructive fishing practices.

To expand the carrageenan market, Dakay opened the markets in Europe and other parts of the world by putting up its marketing, know-how, and technology network. "Other countries now copy Philippine technology," Dakay proudly said, adding that carrageenan is imported everywhere except in Africa. Dakay was also responsible for three major feats that benefited the local seaweed and carrageenan industry. The first was to achieve the recognition of the United States Food and Drug Administration of the Philippine natural-grade carrageenan as a non-toxic food additive in 1990. The second was the country's successful campaign for the classification of Philippine natural-grade carrageenan as a food additive in the Food Codex Alimentarius and the Codex Committee on Food Additives and Contaminants. The third was the country's successful campaign to have the Processed Eucheuma Seaweed (PNG) included in the European Union food additives' list. These

One of the Ten Outstanding Young Men awardees in 1988, Dakay did not rest on his laurels. His main concern stretched beyond the growth of his company and included looking into the livelihood of the farmers and his employees. Dakay was fully aware that taking care of the farmers was the only sure way to safeguard his own business enterprise. Realizing that its revenues were propelled by seaweed production at the farmers' level, Dakay headed the Seaweed Industry Association of the Philippines (SIAP) to implement a social programme for seaweed farmers. The programme involved providing the farmers with social and medical insurance, and connected them with government financing institutions for the production of loans. Seaweed, being a high-value aquacultural product, could change the lives of marginalized farmers, turning them from poor peasants into entrepreneurs. To help seaweed farmers recoup their losses in the past, Shemberg and SIAP joined hands to tap available public funds. Giving a voice to farmers, these two institutions used their clout to have government funding allocated as the Agricultural Competitiveness Enhancement Fund, the safety net established by the government to shield the farming and fishery sectors from the effects of trade liberalization. Furthermore, the association also talks to banks and credit guarantee institutions to provide loans payable within twelve months to seaweed farmers and traders.

Dakay said Shemberg was committed to lift the quality of life of both the seaweed farmers and consumers. The company, he added, would ensure the quality of its products for the customers' ultimate satisfaction and honour its commitment to protecting the marine environment which, according to him, was the source of the company's existence in the first place. The number of families who had directly or indirectly benefited from the industry went up from 108,265 in 2001 to 116,084 in 2003.

Apart from Shemberg, Dakay also owned a California-based food company, marketing and research centres in Canada and Denmark, and the original family business making mosquito-repellent products.

Dakay died of kidney cancer on 5 January 2012.

Dananjaya, James

(James Tan; Tan Soe Lin, 陈士林, Chen Shilin, 1934–)

Anthropologist, folklore specialist, Indonesia

James Dananjaya is an emeritus professor of Anthropology at the University of Indonesia (UI). He is known as the first Indonesian folklore specialist, and is the author Indonesian Folklore (1984), Japanese Folklore (1997), and Chinese Folklore (2007). For his publication, Indonesian Folklore, he received The Best Book Award of 1987 from Yayasan Buku Utama. He also received Satyalencana

Kebudayaan from the Indonesian Government for his contributions in writing and his development of cultural anthropology and folklore in 2002.

Dananjaya was born the second of three sons of the Tan family on 13 April 1934 in Jakarta. His father was a cashier in a private company and his mother had a beauty salon in Malang (East Java). According to Dananjaya, his mother was the one responsible for his pursuit of a higher education. Even though he was born in Jakarta, he spent his childhood in Surabaya and Malang. He went to Holland Chinese School (HCS) Chiao Thung in Malang and then continued at Holland Chinese School Ming Kuang in Surabaya for his primary education. It was around that time that the young boy learnt ballet, together with Javanese and Balinese dances, from Nyi Tjondrolukito. But because he was unable to play the gamelan (Javanese musical instrument), he could not teach Javanese dance. He finished his primary education in 1947 and continued at SMP Ming Kuang, also in Surabaya. However, before finishing his junior school education, he moved to SMP Tiong Hoa Hwe Koan (THHK) in Jakarta, also known as Pa Hua, until he graduated in 1951. He continued his senior high school at SMA Budhaya — also in Jakarta — and graduated in 1955. Afterwards, rather than going straight to university, he worked as an instructor at the Namarina Ballet School and taught ballet at a Chinese school — Chiauw Chung — in Mangga Besar (Jakarta). One of his ballet students was Kamil Setyadi, the secretary of Paguyuban Sosial Marga Tionghoa Indonesia (PSMTI), an Indonesian Chinese Social Clan Association, who after the fall of Soeharto, asked him to help the organization.

Dananjaya went to the University of Indonesia in 1963 to study anthropology. His professor at the university, Koentjaraningrat, was a leading Indonesian anthropologist. The young man became his assistant and Koentjaraningrat later helped him obtain an M.A. scholarship to the United States in 1969. It was in UC Berkeley that Dananjaya became interested in studying folklore under Aland Dundes. He received his Masters degree in 1971 after submitting a thesis that was later published as An Annotated Bibliography of Javanese Folklore. He did not forget his interest in ballet though, so even while studying at UC Berkeley, he registered for the Martha Graham Style Contemporary Dance.

After receiving his Masters of Art degree, Dananjaya returned to the University of Indonesia and enrolled in a Ph.D. programme under the supervision of Professor Koentjaraningrat. This time he ventured into a new field studying an ethnic group in Bali, which gained him a Ph.D. in 1977. His dissertation, "Petani Desa Trunyan di Bali: Lukisan Analitis yang Menghubungkan Praktik Pengasuhan Anak Orang Trunyan dengan Latar Belakang Etnografisnya" was published by Pustaka Jaya in 1980 under the title, Kebudayaan Petani Desa Trunyan di Bali (The Culture of Trunyan Farmers in Bali). That year, Dananjaya also published Beberapa Masalah Folklor (Several Folklore Problems) through the Anthropology Department of the University of Indonesia. Another Trunyan related book, Upacara Lingkaran Hidup di Trunyan Bali (Life Cycle Rituals at Trunyan Bali), written several years later, was published by Balai Pustaka in 1985.

Dananjaya was appointed guru besar, or professor of Anthropology, at the University of Indonesia in 1980. A.B. Susanto and Murti Bunanta are among those who have been taught and supervised by him. He returned to the United States for his two-year non-degree programme on Anthropology of Psychiatry at the University of California, San Francisco, in 1980. At the same time he was also a one-year Fulbright guest professor at the University of California Berkeley. It was also in 1980 that he stopped dancing because, as he said, he wanted to become a good lecturer.

During his twenty years of professorship at the University of Indonesia, Dananjaya published several book serials for children, namely, Folk Stories from Bali, Folk Story from Central Java, Folk Stories from Kalimantan, and Folk Stories from Sumatera. All were published in 1992. He also published Japanese Folklore (1997) and two books on practical jokes, namely, Humor Mahasiswa Jakarta (1988) and Humor & Rumor Politik Masa Reformasi (1999). He became emeritus professor since 1999, but continued to teach at the Universitas Kristen Krida Wacana (Ukrida) and supervise doctoral students at UI. He continued to study folklore, and in 2003, published American Folklore. His activities became very limited after he had a stroke in November 2007 and had to move around in a wheelchair.

Since the Jakarta riots of May 1998, Dananjaya has actively voiced his disapproval of the discrimination of Chinese Indonesians. According to him, Chinese folklore in Indonesia had been suppressed for almost thirty-five years during the authoritarian regime of former President Soeharto. But he claims that folklores are very important to maintain identities, especially for ethnic Chinese-Indonesians, amid pressure from the New Order regime. He said:

> For more than three decades, Chinese descendants were forced to forget their roots. Some of them suffered a type of 'amnesia' … folklores could be used to cure this amnesia (Junaidi 2008).

Friends and former students of Dananjaya know him as a man who is proud of his ethnicity and also loves his country. He always jokes about his alias being "Kasnawi Karna Dipanegara", which is an acronym for bekas Cina-Betawi tukar nama karena dipaksa negara, meaning, a former Chinese-Jakartan who changed his name because he was forced to do so by the state. He is now involved in the PSMTI, the Indonesian Chinese Social Clan Association, as an expert consultant, particularly in relation to Chinese culture.

Đặng Văn Thành

(邓文成, Deng Wencheng, 1960–)
Banker, Vietnam

Đặng Văn Thành is chairman of Saigon Commercial Joint Stock Bank (Ngân hàng Sài Gòn Thương Tín), popularly called Sacombank. After eighteen years in operation, his bank has scored many "firsts" in market performance and transaction network. In December 2006, Sacombank became the first bank to be listed on Ho Chi Minh Stock Exchange (HOSE). The following year, it was named Vietnam's Bank of the Year by Euromoney, an international financial magazine. In January 2008, Sacombank established its representative office in Guangxi's Beibu (meaning, "northern") Golf Economic Zone and was reportedly the first foreign bank to make its presence felt in this developing province of China. On 12 December the same year, it opened another branch in Vientiane, Laos. The bank is the largest joint-stock commercial bank with 190 branches across the country and has a total asset of 98,474 billion dong and a staff force of more than 7,000 in September 2010. On 15 January 2011, the bank's securities arm officially inaugurated its first branch in Cambodia, called Sacombank Securities Cambodia Public Ltd. (abbreviated as "SBS-Cambodia").

Thành is someone who understands the advantages of expanding his banking empire via strategic partnerships with globetrotting banks and investment houses. He started his career as a supervisor at the credit cooperative called Thành Công (meaning "success" in Vietnamese), when private enterprises were forbidden in the socialist state. When reforms were ratified in the late 1980s, Thành established Sacombank in 1991 as a private commercial bank. Over the years, the bank grew into a multinational enterprise and was the first to be listed in the stock exchange of Vietnam.

The Sacombank has ventured into four main business areas: brokerage, corporate finance advisory, investment banking, private equity, and research. It owns four companies, Sacombank Leasing Co. Ltd. (Sacombank-SBL), Sacombank Remittance Express Co. Ltd. (Sacombank-SBR), Sacombank Asset Management Co. Ltd. (Sacombank-SBA), and Sacombank Jewelry Co. Ltd. (Sacombank-SBJ). In addition, it has six partner companies, Sacombank Securities Joint Stock Company (Sacombank-SBS), Saigon Thuong Tin Investment Joint Stock Company (Sacombank-STI), Saigon Thuong Tin Real Estate Joint Stock Company, and Vietfund Management (VFM).

The bank has managed to convince two multinational financial organizations, the International Financial Corporation (IFC) and Dragon Capital (DC) to be its partners. It also entered into strategic partnership with the Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Limited (ANZ) in 2005, but the latter withdrew its 10 per cent stake in 2010.

Sacombank was quick to apply the strategies of customer segmentation and product differentiation. It noticed the active participation of women in the economy and responded to it by arranging special financial services for women entrepreneurs in Ho Chi Minh City and Hanoi. Its branches for lady customers are named after International Women's Day on 8 March, which is commemorated in Vietnam, and therefore called, "8th March Branches". The bank was the first to issue international credit cards to its women customers; it is also unique in that it has filled the niche and gap which was created about a decade ago with the closure of the first bank for Hoa (ethnic Chinese) called the Viet-Hoa Bank. On 10 August 2007, Sacombank inaugurated its first branch for the Hoa, residents of Ho Chi Minh City called Hoa-Viet Branch. Chinese language can be used at Hoa-Viet Branch as its staff are able to speak Mandarin and forms for transactions are also printed in Mandarin. This specialized branch is located in the "Chinatown" district of Ho Chi Minh City — District 5. Districts 5, 6, 10, and 11 in the

Thành is a second-generation Hoa born in Saigon on 11 August 1960. His father is a Hainanese and his mother, an ethnic Vietnamese. Thành's ancestral roots can be traced to Jiaotang village (蛟塘村) in Puqian town (铺前镇), in Wenchang (文昌) on Hainan Island, China. His father served as adviser at the Hainan Native-Place Association, Ho Chi Minh City — a role which is continued by Thành at the association. He prays annually at the commemorative ritual for Tianhou, the goddess of heaven, at the shrine of the association. Thành attended Vietnamese schools when he was young, but has retained his comprehension ability of the Hainanese dialect. He has visited Wenchang, accompanied by his ethnic Vietnamese wife, Huỳnh Bích Ngọc, and their eldest son, Đặng Hồng Anh (邓鸿英). The couple also has a daughter, Ức My, a year younger than Hồng Anh, who pursued financial studies in New Zealand, and two other younger sons, Anh Tuấn and Thái Sơn, who attended an international school in Vietnam.

Thành's eldest son, Hồng Anh, aged thirty-one in 2011, helms Sacomreal, Sacombank's real estate company which employs 400 managerial and non-managerial staff. Measured by his individual achievements, the young man seems poised to keep up with his father in business. He has been named an "outstanding young entrepreneur" twice and "model entrepreneur of Ho Chi Minh City" four years in a row. Among his awards is "The Red Star" (Giải thưởng Sao Đỏ) — an award given to successful young businessmen who have also made outstanding contributions to their communities.

He seems to have followed in his father's footsteps in expanding his real estate business through joint ventures with overseas business partners. In 2010 Sacomreal, partnered a Malaysian property development company, Gamuda Land, to build a township of 82 hectares named Celadon City, in Ho Chi Minh City.

Women in the Đặng family are just as actively engaged in business as its men. All five women in the Đặng family, including the extended family, are listed among the richest women in Vietnam's stock market in 2007. The five women of the Đặng family who are shareholders of Tan Tao Industrial Zone Development Company (ITA) include the mother, two daughters, a daughter-in-law and a maternal grandchild who have a total asset value of 2,178 billion dong ($136.12 million). Nguyễn Phương Anh, the maternal grandchild of the Đặng family, who is not involved in managing the business, is the third richest woman of the top fifty richest women in Vietnam, with a net worth of 743 billion dong in 2007. The Đặng family's wealth is said to have significantly grown especially after it registered Tan Tao Industrial Zone Development Company (Công ty Cổ phần Khu Công nghiệp Tân Tạo — ITA) in the bourse in November 2006. Đặng Thị Hoàng Yến, the mother of Phương Anh, who is chairman of ITA, ranks ninth on the top fifty richest women list and was valued at 372 billion dong ($23.25 million). The chairman of Sacombank, Thành, has no qualms about being featured on the list of the rich and famous in Vietnam, saying that such announcements of the rich are recognitions of the success and contributions of individuals.

Thành tries to balance his family life and business health and has reportedly been successful at this. At home, he believes in abandoning his chief executive officer image, and lending a listening ear as a father and husband to everyone. His oldest married son, Hồng Anh, regards his father as his model, and still frequently dines with his parents.

Darmaputera, Eka

(The Oen Hien, 1942–2005)
Church leader, liberal theologian, Indonesia

Eka Darmaputera was born as The (郑) Oen Hien on 16 November 1942 in Mertoyudan in Magelang, Central Java. He was raised in a very simple family where his father ran a small shop to make a living and raise his two sons. The economy of the country during his childhood was very difficult, so much so that his family often had to make do with very little food, eating only cassava for weeks.

The young Darmaputera had his primary and secondary education in Magelang. He graduated from SD Masehi (Christian Elementary School) in 1953, junior high school at Christian Junior High School (SMP BOPKRI) in 1957 a public senior high school in 1960. He then wanted to go on to the National Military Academic in Magelang. However, because of his family's economic situation, he finally decided to join his friend who had applied to study at Jakarta Theological Seminary simply because the seminary provided its students with a scholarship.

The scholarship provided by his seminary was not huge so he often had to make money elsewhere. For example, he once taught religion for very little pay at SMA BPSK, a Christian high school in Jakarta.

Darmaputera was ordained at GKI Bekasi Timur, Jakarta, on 15 September 1967, and served this congregation until his retirement in 2000. From 1969–1973 Darmaputera was elected for two periods to be the moderator of the Indonesian Christian Church (GKI) of West Java Synod. To date he is the youngest moderator ever elected at this synod. From 1975–1977 he served as the moderator of the General Synod of the Indonesian Christian Church, consisting of the three synods of West, Central, and East Java.

In 1977 he received a scholarship to do a Ph.D. programme at Andover Newton Theological School and Boston College in Boston, Massachussetts, USA under the guidance of Professor Max Stackhouse and Professor Theodore M. Steeman, OFM. He completed his Ph.D. in Christian Ethics in 1982, with a dissertation entitled, "Pancasila and the Search for Identity and Modernity in Indonesian Society: An Ethical and Cultural Analysis" (the dissertation was published in 1988 by Brill).

Darmaputera is known as a very productive writer. Ever since junior high school, he has been writing poems. In 1973, together with friends such as Arswendo Atmowiloto and Julius Syaranamual, he published a humour magazine, Astaga, in the style of MAD Magazine, although the publication did not survive for long.

He also wrote a lot of articles in the mass media. He was the regular editorial writer for Sinar Harapan daily until the newspaper was banned in 1980 by Soeharto's regime. When Suara Pembaruan was published to replace Sinar Harapan, he often wrote his reflections in the new paper.

Darmaputera was very active in several organizations. He once served as a member of the executive council of the Indonesian Student Christian Movement (1962–66). In this position, he became one of the proponents of a Christian union of junior and senior high school students (GSKI). He was elected as the general secretary of this student organization (1962–66), as well as a member of the executive council of the Young Christians Movement of Indonesia. He was also elected chairperson of the National Front of Students (1965–66).

His rich experience in organizational life shaped his leadership in church circles as well as the wider society. From 1984–89 Darmaputera became a member of the executive committee of the Communion of Churches in Indonesia (CCI, formerly the National Council of Churches in Indonesia). During the general assembly of the Christian Conference of Asia (CCA) in Seoul, South Korea, in 1985, he delivered a defence of the Indonesian churches accused of keeping quiet and supporting the policy of the Indonesian Government in East Timor, and its human rights violation there. This was immediately followed by the decision of the Indonesian churches and the CCI to freeze their membership of CCA.

Darmaputera's books, lectures, writings, and sermons showed his sensitivitiy and sharp analysis of the faith and the responsibility of Christians in their social life. His thoughts have often been used to develop policies of the churches in Indonesia. Among others is his concept to train young members of the church congregation to become motivators to serve rural communities. This became one of the best programmes initiated by the CCI and was held in Cikembar, Sukabumi.

Together with General T.B. Simatupang, another important thinker among Indonesian church leaders, he formulated in the 1980s what is called the PNSPP or the "Implementation of Pancasila in National Development". This concept was later adopted as the core of the Basic Outlines of National Policies of Soeharto's government. PNSPP is the outcome of the thinking of BP7, the government body for the study of Pancasila as a national ideology, and the work of the National Development Planning Board.

Darmaputera's concern for social and humanitarian issues is clearly seen when in 1973 he was delegated by the CCI to become the expert witness at the State Court of Central Jakarta for Iwan Rubianto who submitted his petition for gender reassignment and had his name changed to Vivian Rubianti after undergoing a sex change operation in Singapore. In his argument, Eka said that according to the Christian faith, God wants human being to be happy in their life. Thus, if the sex reassignment would make Iwan Rubianto happy, the Christian church would be fully supportive of his decision.

Darmaputera was also heavily involved in interfaith dialogues. Together with his friends, such as Th. Sumartana, Abdurrahman Wahid, and Gedong Bagus Oka, he was involved in founding "Dian/Interfidei", an interfaith organization in Kaliurang, Sleman. He also translated a book by an interfaith theologian, Stanley Samartha, Dialogue between Men of Living Faiths. This book and other involvements of Darmaputera in interfaith dialogues have brought condemnation of him by some conservative churches and theologians in Indonesia.

However, he remained a humble thinker and continued to strive to build bridges and cooperation with those who held different theological views. For example, he had a close relationship with Rev. Stephen Tong, a famous conservative evangelical pastor in Indonesia. Darmaputera later also accepted an invitation to teach at the Southeast Asia Theological Seminary, a conservative seminary in Malang.

Other than being a graduate school lecturer at Jakarta Theological Seminary, he also served as a lecturer of the Southeast Asia Graduate School of Theology in Singapore (which was later moved to Manila in the Philippines).

In 1999 he decided to get involved in politics by becoming a legislative candidate for the Indonesian Democratic Party of Struggle to represent Tangerang. He was not elected because his position was later transferred to a lower rank, making it impossible to win unless the party won heavily.

In October 2000, he took early retirement as pastor of his church because of his deteriorating health and his intention to contribute more at the national and international levels. His thinking and contributions were recognized by Princeton Theological Seminary who awarded him The Abraham Kuyper Prize for Excellence in Reformed Theology and Public Life, in December 1999.

Eka Darmaputera passed away on 29 June 2005 after more than twenty years of battling with cyrosis and liver cancer. He is survived by his wife, Evang Meyati Kristiani; and a son, Arya Wicaksana who is now working in a financial company in Australia; his daughter-in-law, Vera Iskandar; and one granddaughter.

Dee Ching Chuan

(李清泉, Li Qingquan, 1888–1940)
Business and community leader, Philippines

Dee Ching Chuan is most respected and remembered within the Chinese community for his leadership and contribution to the welfare of the overseas Chinese in the Philippines. He was called "the Lumber King" as he was the major force that expanded his family business into a world-renowned enterprise. As an ethnic Chinese, Dee had never forgotten his motherland and had contributed extensively to the improvement of his hometown. He was also a leader of the Nanyang Fund-raising Committee (南洋筹赈总会) to support China in the Sino-Japanese War.

Dee was born on 24 August 1888 in Shizhen Village of the Fujian Province, China. During the end of the Qing Dynasty, the government was very corrupt and life was miserable in China. Like many other Chinese, Dee's father, Calixto Dyyco, left Fujian in search for a better life in the Philippines. He then set up a small-scale lumber business in the Philippines. When Dee was thirteen, his father brought him to the Philippines to learn the family business. He worked during the day and studied Chinese and English at night. A few years later, his father sent him for further studies in Xiamen and then Hong Kong, where he mastered English and learnt how Westerners conduct business.

When Dee was seventeen, he returned to the Philippines to manage their small company, and his father retired to China. Dee began improving facilities in the company by utilizing electrical machineries, such as electric chain saws, which was a major breakthrough in the lumber industry. Around this time, Dee also established Dee C. Chuan and Company. A watershed for this fledgling company was the acquisition of the Negros Philippine Lumber Company (NPLC) in 1920. With NPLC he also acquired a twenty-year concession from the Bureau of Forestry to log at Cadiz in Negros Occidental. At the time of acquisition NPLC was already exporting to the U.S. West Coast and had a total of 12.4 million board feet of production. This was a case of being at the right place at the right time with the right goods. The Americans had an open economic policy and lumber was very much in demand. As Dee was able to provide the needed lumber for the Americans, he earned the name, "Lumber King".

Dee expanded into shipping with his Singbe Transportation Company which was tasked with serving the inter-island shipment of lumber between Cadiz, Negros Occidental and Manila. In 1928 he incorporated the Philippine Lumber Manufacturing Company to oversee its new franchise of logging and sawmilling at Catabangan, Camarines Sur in Southern Luzon. Tragedy struck in 1931 when fire burned down the sawmill in Cadiz.

After the war, Dee and some other ethnic Chinese wanted to provide better financial assistance to small- and medium-scale businesses owned by the overseas Chinese as the Americans imposed very strict banking policies on Chinese businessmen. The China Banking Corporation was then established by Dee and his partners and it offered tremendous relief to the community. The bank earned a very good reputation by providing very low, even zero, interest rates to the overseas Chinese, thereby gaining their trust and support. Dee served as president of the bank for twenty years until his death in 1940.

He was also a very well known leader among the Chinese community in the Philippines and was secretary and councillor of the Philippine Chinese Charitable Association — the biggest Chinese non-profit organization, for many years. He was Trustee (1917) and vice-president (1919–24) of the Philippine Chinese Chamber of Commerce (PCCC), its president for six consecutive terms and its youngest and most prestigious president ever. And from 1925 to 1935, he held the position of either trustee or supervisor.

It was during his term as president of the PCCC that the Philippine authorities, with the support of the American colonizers, implemented the Bookkeeping Law, which required books of accounts to be written only in English, Spanish, or Filipino. Dee then led the Chinese community to protest against the implementation of such a law. He and other Chinese community leaders resorted to legal means to appeal to the local court, higher court, and the United States Supreme Court, and even sought the help of the Qing Government from China. Dee also sent a lawyer, Albino Sycip, to Washington D.C. to plead the Philippine case at the Supreme Court there. After five years of struggle and protest, the U. S. Supreme Court declared the law unconstitutional.

Dee had a great love for his motherland, China, even though he was residing in the Philippines. He was very concerned about the development of his hometown in Fujian and organized the Save Fujian Province Association, as well as coordinated with fellow Hokkiens from Southeast Asian countries to join efforts in developing their home province. He established the Fujian Newspaper in the 1920s through which he propagated the idea of love of one's country and hometown. In 1929, in order to promote trade between China and the Philippines, and to promote the products of China in the international market, Dee organized a committee to promote China products in the Philippines and assumed the position as its chairman. In 1930 China established the Bank of China, with a supervisory committee of which Dee was a member. He was also elected a director of the board of this bank. Dee indeed expended a lot of effort for the improvement of the economy of China. In 1933, he also invested more than two million silver yuan to reclaim land, build dykes, improve docks and built several commercial buildings in Xiamen. He even invested more than 100,000 silver yuan for the survey of land and aviation routes in Zhangzhou, Fujian. The same year, the 19th Army established a revolutionary government in Fujian. As Dee was very supportive of the development of the province, he was given the position of provincial government committee member. He also donated several school buildings to help solve the province's education problem.

During the Sino-Japanese War, Dee led the overseas Chinese in raising funds to support the revolutionary army. After the 18 September Incident in 1931, he led the PCCC and other overseas Chinese associations to call for the termination of the civil war, urging the Communist and Kuomintang parties to join forces in the resistance against the Japanese. The same year, they were able to raise US$2 million for the 19th Army. The overseas Chinese in the Philippines organized the China Aviation Development Federation Manila Chapter, with Dee as the chairman. With the funds raised, they were able to purchase fifteen airplanes for China's air force, including one Dee donated personally. After the Marco Polo Bridge Incident on 7 July 1937, Dee also organized the National Salvation Movement (华侨救国联合会) and even collaborated with business tycoon Tan Kah Kee (陈嘉庚) to organize Nanyang Fund-raising Committee that rendered relief operations for war victims.

However Dee did not get to see his homeland and adopted country free themselves from their invaders. He passed away in California on 27 October 1940, leaving behind US$100,000 in his will for the benefit of the war-stricken children of China. His death was honoured by the Philippine Government with flags raised half-mast.

Dhanin Chiarawanon

(谢国民, Xie Guomin, 1939–)

Entrepreneur, tycoon, Thailand

Dhanin Chiarawanon is a leading entrepreneur and head of Charoen Pokphand (CP), one of the largest Thai multinational companies. He was born on 19 April 1939 in the Yaowarat area of Bangkok, the youngest of five siblings. His father Chia Ek Chor (谢易初), was a Teochew who migrated from Guangdong Province to Bangkok in 1921. His mother's name was Kimkee.

Dhanin attended Sarasit Witthayalai Primary School in Ban Pong, Ratburi, where he completed his studies in 1956. He finished his secondary education in Shantou, China, in 1958 and went on to study commerce in Hong Kong at the age of seventeen. He began his first job at the Charoen Pokphand Store in Bangkok but soon left to take up employment with the Federation of Poultry Egg Cooperatives of Thailand. This was followed by a stint at Samakkhi Kha Sut Company. When he turned twenty-five, Dhanin moved back to CP and has been working in the corporation ever since.

In the early 1990s, CP ranked as the largest foreign investor in China. During the Asian Financial Crisis of 1997, Dhanin was forced to make significant changes to CP to ensure that the corporation would survive, such as selling a motorcycle factory and a brewery in China. Eventually, the corporation recovered and managed to penetrate the Chinese market. In 2004, avian flu affected CP badly, as the conglomerate was the largest chicken producer in Asia. There was a rumour that CP had tried to cover up the outbreak, but a senior officer of the United Nation's Food and Agriculture Organization in Bangkok confirmed Dhanin's statement that the enclosed factory farms that CP used to raise its chickens are sequestered from birds believed to be carrying the virus.

Although he did not attend university, Dhanin has obtained honorary degrees from various institutes of higher learning. In 1986, he received an honorary doctorate from the Mae Cho Institute of Agricultural Technology in Chiang Mai. He received an honorary doctorate from the Faculty of Commerce and Accountancy of Thammasat University in 1988. Dhanin attended the National Defence College of Thailand in 1989 as a member of the first joint public/private class. The following year, he received an honorary doctorate in economics from Ramkhamhaeng University. In 1991, he was awarded an honorary doctorate in agricultural science from Chiang Mai University and an honorary doctorate in marketing from the China Agricultural University. Four years later, he received an honorary doctorate in business management from Thailand's National Institute of Development Administration and an honorary doctorate in agriculture from Khon Kaen University. In 2000, Dhanin was awarded an honorary doctorate by Kasetsat University and, in 2004, an honorary doctorate in agricultural technology from Chankasem Rajaphat University. Most recently, he was given an honorary doctorate by the Business Administration Faculty of the Christian University of Thailand. He also received an honorary doctorate from King Mongkut's Institute of Technology, Lat Krabang, in 2008.

Currently, Dhanin is among the top executives of the Charoen Pokphand Group, serving as chairman and chief executive officer of a number of the group's firms. CP is well known as the largest producer and trader of animal feed in the world. The group has also been acknowledged as a leading conglomerate in Thailand, with ten different industrial groups handling the production and trade of industrial and agricultural goods and foods; international trading, marketing, and distribution; plastics, land development and real estate; telecommunications, automotive and general industry, as well as integrated agri-business.

According to Forbes, Dhanin was ranked the 390th wealthiest man in the world in 2006. In 2010, he was ranked the wealthiest man in Thailand, with net assets valued at roughly US$7 billion (216 trillion baht).

Dhanin is married to Khunying Thewi (Watthanlikhit) Chiarawanon. They have three sons — Suphakit, Narong, and Suphachai, and two daughters, Wanni and Thiphaphon.

Dhanin has received several royal decorations, such as the Most Exalted Order of the White Elephant, the Most Noble Order of the Crown of Thailand, and the Most Admirable Order of the Direkkhunaphon. In late March and early April of 2008, he expounded a theory of "two highs": that consumer prices should be allowed to increase, but that wages and salaries must also be adjusted simultaneously.

Dhanin spends his leisure time in his country estate Chonburi Province, where he raises free-range chickens and water buffaloes in an attempt to conserve native breeds of livestock and to revive traditional values. He conducts research on the development of traditional chicken breeds. His focus expanded to include water buffaloes when one of his sons, Narong, saw a good-looking specimen on its way to the slaughterhouse. Feeling sorry for the animal, Dhanin bought it on the spot. He has since come to realize that water buffaloes can play a significant role in the farming cycle, leading to enrichment of the fertility of the soil.

Dhanin is also a devotee of cockfighting. He has attempted to modernize the sport to make it as humane to the animal as boxing is to humans. He has invested in the Native Chicken Research and Demonstration Center, which not only preserves and advances the sport of cockfighting, but also promotes the export of Thai chicken meat.

Diệp Bá Hành

(叶伯行, Ye Boxing, 1869–1950)
Banker, community leader, Vietnam

Diệp Bá Hành was known for his community leadership and his professional achievements as a banker. He carved his career in a significant state bank during the colonial period of Vietnam and finally helmed it. His clever arbitration between the Chinese community and the French authorities in sensitive commercial and legal disputes won him recognition and respect as the leader of the most important economic organization of the Chinese — the Saigon Chinese Chamber of Commerce and Industry.

His efforts in the establishment of economic, educational, and social institutions for the ethnic Chinese community of the Republic of Vietnam were noteworthy.

Hành was born in 1869 in Da Ji village in Zhongshan county of Guangdong Province, China (广东省中山县大吉乡). His family was not wealthy, but he had great interest in learning and was a popular child with the village elders.

At the age of fourteen, his maternal uncle, Wu Gengtang (吴赓堂), sponsored his trip to Hong Kong and enrolled him at St Joseph's Institution where he studied English. He made good progress in the language after six years of study, and on the recommendations of Wu, who worked at France Steamship Company, secured a job in the same company.

At the age of twenty-two, he assisted Huang Meixi (黄梅西) in the operations of the branch office of China Merchants Steamship Company in Jiujiang City of Jiangxi Province, China (江西省九江市). During his three years of employment there, he proved to be an excellent worker. When news of Wu's deteriorating health reached him, he returned to Hong Kong and was again employed at his former workplace, the steamship company. After several years, he applied for the post of assistant manager at an American mercantile bank (美商宝顺银行) which had just established a branch in Hong Kong. He rapidly rose to become its manager. A few years later, his bank merged with the International Banking Corporation (IBC), which was a company chartered to conduct the banking business of the National Bank of the City of New York (万国宝通银行) outside the United States International Banking Corporation opened its branches in East Asia in 1901–02, and later developed into the Citibank Corp.

Hành landed the manager's position at the Guangzhou branch. A difference in opinion between him and the chief of the branch after half a year led to his resignation. An opportunity awaited him, however, in Saigon, where the post of vice-manager at Banque de l'Indochine (西贡法国东方汇理银行), the forerunner of Banque Indosuez, was vacant. He responded to the opportunity and performed well. Within a decade, he rose through the ranks and was promoted to managing director in 1916, thanks to economic development and the increasing participation of the Chinese in the French colonial economy, which favoured a Chinese-speaking professional like him. In the 1940s, the Banque de l'Indochine was acting as a financial agent for the French Government in the territories of France in Asia and was also handling the transfer of Boxer indemnity payments from China to France in addition to transacting international trade between France and China.

Hành's professional reputation boosted his social stature and created more opportunities in the socio-political and economic arenas for his skills. When he first took office at the Chinese Chamber of Commerce, he initiated the construction of a new building for the South Vietnam Overseas Chinese Association for Commercial Affairs when physical space became limited. The project which took place from July 1922 to October 1923 required sterling commitment in raising funds and cost 130,000 piastres to build. It was located in Rue de Paris (renamed Phùng Hang Street in the 1950s), and at its launch, the organization was renamed the Saigon Chinese Chamber of Commerce (南圻中华总商会). After this first major achievement, Hành mediated and resolved commercial conflicts in the Chinese community Saigon, also managing requests from the Chinese community for the colonial government, as well as the Chinese Government. He intervened in the legislation which had made it mandatory for all Chinese businessmen to keep their accounts in the French language. As the enforcement of the legislation would create obstacles for Chinese businesses, he negotiated successfully for its abolishment. He wielded great social influence, serving as the chairman of the organization for four terms (six years) from 1920 to 1925, and again from 1930 to 1931. Each term lasted two full years, from January of the first year to December of the following year. He further mooted the idea of building a sports and martial arts school for Chợ Lớn (Cholon), and was one of the main drivers behind the fund-raising efforts of the Guangzhao Native-Place Association in its construction of the building of Trường Quảng Triệu (西贡广肇学校), a school managed by the association. Matters related to construction came under his charge, but he also became one of the two top donors for the project. The other donor was businessman, Lý Trọng Trác (李仲卓). The school finally opened in 1928 in Rue d' Alsace Lorraine, later renamed Phó Đức Chính Street.

Hành came up with the idea of enabling the Guangzhao Charity Association (Hội Từ Thiện Quảng Triệu 广肇善堂) to achieve financial independence instead of relying solely on donors. The association offered refuge to poor migrants who were in great need of medical aid, but could not afford it. In 1909, he gathered the Cantonese in the community and proposed organizing a charity bazaar. The three-day bazaar was successful and realized a profit of 80,000 piastres. The sum was deposited in Banque de l'Indochine where it earned interest and finally increased in value to 90,000 piastres. This sum was then used to acquire real estate with the hope that it could fetch rent from its lease to cover the operational costs of the association. However, trouble surfaced when the person under whose name the property was purchased became deeply mired in debt. The property then had to be used as collateral for his debt obligations, causing the association to lose its ownership rights. When the case was brought to court, the property was frozen and put up for auction. Hành fought the case with wit and perseverance for a few years, determined to prevent the creditors from laying their hands on the property. He finally managed to change the minds of the creditors, and retrieved the asset for the association.

Although Hành repeatedly used the excuse of business to remain in Vietnam instead of returning to Guangdong, he continued his financial support of schools in his native Da Ji village. His active contributions in both international and community relations in Vietnam were much more significant, and for these, he was conferred several medals and decorations of honour from the Government of the Republic of Vietnam. In 1919, he was awarded the second-class silver medal, for example. This was retroactively followed by the Star of Order award in 1925, and a chivalric order in the Legion of Honour (Légion d'honneur) from the French president in 1929. In 1936, he resigned from his profession and began to lead a tranquil life of retirement. He passed away in 1950 at the age of eighty-one.

Diệp Truyền Anh

Community leader, martyr, Vietnam

Diệp Truyền Anh was a picture of stylishness and robustness. He was a twenty-something when he helmed the Jiaying (嘉应), or Hakka clan of Hoi'an as well as the Zhonghua (Chinese) Association of Hoi'an in the days when headmen were mostly grey-haired. The Zhonghua Association was an organization whose activities cut across the four predominant dialect-based clans of Hoi'an which were and still are: the Cantonese, Hokkien, Teochew, and Hainanese. Anh was appointed secretary of the KMT (Guomindang) Branch of Hoi'an when the KMT influence was prevalent in Chinese institutions in the central and southern regions of Vietnam. Having supported the cause of the national salvation of China and engaging in anti-Japanese resistance, Anh became a target of the Japanese military police, kempeitai. He was one of the thirteen ethnic Chinese martyrs of the central part of Vietnam.

Anh was born on 19 November 1914 in Hoi'an, the eldest son of Diệp Khải Minh (叶启明), a third-generation in the family. Diệp Khải Minh's grandfather, Diệp Ngộ Xuân (叶遇春), originally hailed from Fengshun (丰顺), Guangdong province, but went to trade in Hoi'an in 1856. Diệp Khải Minh inherited the family business and in 1900 named the family enterprise, Diệp Đồng Nguyên (叶同源). He expanded his business by importing and exporting ceramics as well as other Chinese goods, steering it to greater heights in the process. Diệp Khải Minh also led the Gia Ứng clan (Jiaying/Hakka), which put Jiaying migrants and residents in Hoi'an under his charge. As leader of the Zhonghua Association, he executed socio-political duties, such as supporting charitable causes. His social philanthropy earned him accolades from the last emperor of the Nguyễn dynasty, Bảo Đại, and his name also became synonymous with his flourishing business. At the entrance to his home at No. 80, Nguyễn Thái Học Street (阮泰学街), the ex-Canton Street, a suspended tablet inscribed with the characters, "叶同源" (Diệp Đồng Nguyên), can still be sighted.

The old albums and correspondence of the Diệp family furnish evidence of Diệp Khải Minh's involvement in Chinese education and spoke of the influential leader who was well connected to both Chinese and Vietnamese political and business elites. In 1937, Anh was invited to tour schools in six provinces which included Shanghai, Nanjing, and Hangzhou. In Nanjing, Anh attended a conference on education for overseas Chinese (南洋侨教讲学会). A letter penned by KMT member, Shen Honglie (沈鸿烈), and a picture given to Anh by Lin Zechen (林泽臣) are among the items found in Anh's old mailbox. Lin Zechen took part in the Huanghuagang Rebellion and once also sat on the committee of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce and Industry in South Vietnam. He was Secretary-General of the KMT Main Branch in Annam — the name of the French protectorate in the central region of Vietnam where Hoi'an is located. An autographed photograph of Sun Ke (孙科, or Sun Fo), the son of Sun Yat-sen, was also found among Diệp Khải Minh's mail. Sun Ke's first role in government was as mayor of Guangzhou (1920–22; 1923–25) and his last, as president of the Examination Yuan of the Republic of China.

Diệp Khải Minh's leadership qualities as leader of the Gia Ứng clan (Jiaying) seemed to have rubbed off onto his son, Anh. Being the eldest son of Diệp Khải Minh, Anh was a natural candidate to be groomed to take over his father's business. Politically he was affiliated to KMT like his father. The confident young Anh had the overall Chinese community under his charge when he helmed the Zhonghua (Chinese) Association, an association that cut across all the dialect-group boundaries. As an avid reader of Chinese classical novels, he was enthralled by characters in The Classic of the Three Kingdoms and revered Guan Yu, the historical paragon of justice in the story. In real life, the seventy-two martyrs of Huanghuagang were his heroes. It was not surprising then that he was a leader who saw red when he perceived injustice. Therein lay his enthusiasm in undertaking such roles as president of the National Salvation Association (华侨救国总会) of Hoi'an. Besides this association, two other organizations with a similar mission to save China existed in Hoi'an in the late 1930s: the Overseas Chinese Youth Resistance (华侨青年团) — led by Anh's brother, Diệp Truyền Hoa, and the Overseas Chinese Women Association.

Like his father, Anh was fluent in Mandarin. As a teenager, he had studied at Zhiyong Middle School (知用中学) in Guangzhou and taught Mandarin for personal development to promote Chiang Kai-shek's "New Life Campaign" in Hoi'an. He was not the solemn thinker like his brother, Diệp Truyền Hoa, however,he excelled in vigorous outdoor sports such as basketball, tennis, and soccer. Thus when Chinese nationalism was intensifying in Chinese communities overseas and the call came for him to lead the National Salvation Movement of Hoi'an, he channelled his energy into fund-raising endeavours. As the war unfolded, his efforts to salvage China slowly developed into building resistance against the Japanese.

When Japanese soldiers arrived in Haiphong, the country's northern port, in 1941, the activities of the National Salvation Movement in Hoi'an were immediately halted, and KMT members diverted underground. There were reports of Chinese youth who fled to Kunming, Chongqing, and Guangxi for insurgent training, or even to further their studies. Around 1942, struggles between the French sûreté and the Japanese kempeitai became apparent. On 5 April 1943, Japanese troops arrived in Hoi'an and began their arrest of those suspected of resisting them. Twenty-three ethnic Chinese men were arrested in Hanoi and Hoi'an that April morning. Among them were prominent KMT members of Hoi'an such as, in addition to Anh, Xu Wenmao (许文茂), the elderly headman of Chaozhou Native-Place Association (Hoi'an), who was also a prime figure in the National Salvation Movement; Li Zhongxun (李仲珣), administrator of the KMT Branch of Hoi'an and an intelligence strategist; and two other KMT members who were headmen of both Guangzhao and Hainan native-place associations. Some of the captives were later released, but Anh and two others suffered a different fate.

Anh was taken to Hanoi where the kempeitai was headquartered. He sustained heavy injuries after gruelling interrogations and was admitted to hospital where he subsequently passed away. His wife of Teochew ancestral origin, Wang Miao Xiang (王妙香), saw him on his hospital bed before he was reportedly given the lethal injection by the kempeitai on 11 September 1943. Li, the KMT branch administrator from Hoi'an, contracted infections because of repeated torture by the kempeitei in Danang and passed away. Xu, the Chaozhou clan headman, was arrested in Hanoi and sent to Danang before he died. These three men were buried in their family cemeteries.

In the later part of 1944, the kempeitai based in Danang took away ten young Chinese men from the central part of Vietnam. The young men were La Doãn Chánh (罗允正), Lin Jianzhong (林建中), Xie Fukang (谢福康), Cai Wenli (蔡文礼), Liang Xingbiao (梁星标), Cheng Daixun (程诒训), Zheng Yanchang (郑燕昌), Lin Bingheng (林秉衡), Gan Bingpei (甘炳培), and Wang Qingsong (王青松). Cai Wenli was known to be the most dedicated to the National Salvation Movement; Liang Xingbiao was mayor and translator at the Guangxi Liuzhou Daqiao Academy; Cheng Daixun was an employee at a trading company and an officer from KMT Branch, Danang; Zheng Yanchang, an employee of Tianyue Railway Company which transported freight from Haiphong to China, contributed valuable intelligence; Lin Bingheng was a trader who became an intelligence agent in Danang; Gan Bingpei was a Chinese educator who received training as a special intelligence police in Guizhou at the outset of the war; and Wang Qingsong was an employee of a trading firm and a KMT member since 1939 who gathered intelligence for the Central Overseas Department of KMT. These men underwent excruciating interrogations before being led to the foot of Phước Tượng Mountain (福祥山) in Danang. Unnamed witnesses reported that they were massacred on 1 April 1945.

Diệp Truyền Anh and his compatriots all paid with their lives in resisting the Japanese in 1943–45. They were memorialized as "The Thirteen Martyrs of Hoi'an", but only ten were buried in the compound where the memorial now stands in Hoi'an.

While controversies relating to political allegiance and Chinese nationalism may beleaguer the story of the martyrs, the commemoration of their martyrdom legitimizes the moral existence of the current Hoa (Chinese) community by highlighting its participation in history, and deepens the sense of identity of the Hoa residents with their town. The officially sanctioned memorialization of the martyrs also adheres to the Vietnamese cultural practice of worshipping local tutelary gods in a nation where many of its heroic stories have contributed to engendering the type of nationalism built around throwing off the yoke of foreign invaders.

Anh was the sixth youngest among the thirteen heroes of Hoi'an. He was only thirty-one when he departed from his wife and two children, Diệp Gia Miên (叶家棉) and Diệp Gia Tân (叶家槟). His daughter, Miên, left for Guangzhou while Tân migrated to France a few decades later after his death.

Perhaps Anh's youthful passion and righteous anger had influenced his fate, but they also garnered him a reputation that has lasted through the times.

Diệp Truyền Hoa

(叶传华, Ye Chuanhua, 1918–70)

Educator, scholar, Vietnam

Diệp Truyền Hoa was one of the two wealthy Jiaying (Hakka) brothers of Hoi'an, with ancestry in Tangkeng village (汤坑乡), Fengshun district (丰顺县), Guangdong province (China). His brother was Diệp Truyền Anh (叶传英 Ye Chuanying), head of the Gia Ứng clan (Jiaying bang 嘉应帮) and president of the Zhonghua Association (中华会馆) — a Chinese native-place association that operated across dialect boundaries — in Hoi'an. Diệp Truyền Hoa founded the Hoi'an Chapter of the Overseas Chinese Youth Resistance (Huaqiao Qingnian Tuan 华侨青年团) on 8 August 1938. Being committed to working for social causes, he led the National Salvation Association from the late 1930s to the early 1940s in supplying financial and material relief to China. His brother was then serving as president of the association. Hoa was a thinker, scholar, and educator. His interests were composing prose and poems in the Chinese language, translation, and researching Chinese philosophy. Through his prose, readers are treated to glimpses of Hoi'an in the past, as well as to his rich emotions such as his fondness of his brother. The gentle and warm scholar also inspired his students by the high standard he achieved in literary Chinese.

In early twentieth-century Vietnam, the sons of wealthy Chinese families who attended Chinese schools were likely to be sent to China for further studies due to the lack of suitable institutions in the country where they could pursue higher Chinese education. Hoa went to Guangzhou (Canton), China, to study at Peizheng Secondary School (培正中学) in Guangzhou in 1933. He returned to Hoi'an in 1937, and a year later, founded the Youth Salvation Team of Hoi'an (会安华侨青年团), the year when the National Salvation Movement began in Saigon in the wake of intensifying anti-Japanese resistance.

The main activity of the National Salvation Movement revolved around disseminating anti-Japanese propaganda, banning Japanese goods, and organizing emergency relief to China. Its objectives included supporting the personal development of its members through Chiang Kai-shek's "New Life Campaign". The programmes for personal development, which were adopted from the "New Life Campaign", reflected the strong influence of, and support in the Chinese community and schools from, the Guomindang Party of China. The Youth Salvation Team of Hoi'an also published a weekly, Shikong Zhoukan (时空周刊), and collected monthly donations using boxes marked "save-to-salvage-nation" placed in every home, school, and shops. Anti-Japanese sentiments were propagated through fairs, art exhibitions, and the "Double Ten" (Republic of China's National Day) Scout Big Parade then held in Saigon. Personal development programmes aimed at improving skills in reading, and in speaking Mandarin and Cantonese, were delivered, with music also included. Mandarin courses were conducted by Hoa's brother, Diệp Truyền Anh, and music was provided by La Doãn Chánh, better known by his Cantonese pseudonym, La Hối. Hoa wrote the lyrics of the song for Hoi'an's Chinese Youth Salvation Team, while La Hối composed the melody. Hoa also penned the Chinese lyrics of a song sung to La Hối's melody, Xuân và Tuổi Trẻ (Spring and Youth 青年与春天) — before the song was translated into Vietnamese in the 1946 by the famous Vietnamese poet, Thế Lữ (世吕) (1907–89), after his sojourn in Hoi'an (see La Doãn Chánh).

Hoa was born on 5 November 1918 in the Diệp family home at No. 80, Nguyễn Thái Học Street. A signboard bearing the words, "叶同源" (Diệp Đồng Nguyên), can be seen at its doorway. The home, which still stands in its original location, is currently called "The Hakka House" in tourist literature as Diệp Khải Minh (叶启明) and his eldest son, Diệp Truyền Anh, both helmed the Gia Ứng bang (Jiaying clan) of Hoi'an. The home boasts of antiques collected by the family through the generations, now guarded by a family member, Diệp Gia Tùng (叶家松).

Hoa was a proficient speaker and writer of the Chinese language. In 1941, he went to Kunming via Hong Kong and eventually sat for an entrance examination which he passed. He nurtured his interest in poetry writing at Xinan Lianhe University (西南联合大学) during the war years of 1944–45 when studying there. After the Second World War ended, he returned to Hoi'an in 1946, and tied the matrimonial knot the following year with Đặng Kim Xoa (邓金钗), the third child of a well known medical doctor of Hoi'an, Đặng Thế Trinh (邓世贞). Trinh was deputy director of the only hospital in Hoi'an. He was also head of Hội Quán Quảng Triệu (Guangzhao Native-Place Association, Hoi'an) from 1955 until his old age. He passed away in 1967.

Hoa went to Qinghua University in June 1947, the same year of his marriage. In 1948 he returned to Hoi'an where he began a ten-year teaching career at Zhonghua Gongxue (中华公学), the Chinese school in Hoi'an which resulted from the merging of the four dialect-based schools in 1942. The dialect schools before World War II were Yangzheng School (养正学校) which was run by the Fujian bang (dialect-based clan), Peiying School (培英学校), the school of the Chaozhou bang, Guanghua School (光华学校) which was affiliated to the Cantonese, and Yuzhi School (育智学校), the school of the Hainanese bang. The Gia Ứng (嘉应 Hakka) Chinese in Hoi'an has never been a large congregation and thus do not have a building specially dedicated to their bang and educational activities, such as a native-place association building or a school.

In 1959, Hoa left Hoi'an and settled in South Vietnam. He landed a job as a supervisor of translation at Asia Daily (亚洲日报) and simultaneously taught at the English Language Institute. From 1960 to 1961, he was an instructor at both the Foreign Language Department of the National Teachers' College of the Republic of Vietnam, as well as at the Philosophy Department of the National University for Humanities and Social Sciences. He went to the central region of Vietnam six years later to take up a post teaching Chinese literature at Hue University of Humanities and Social Sciences. In 1969 he became principal of Việt Tú School in Saigon, which was operated by the Cantonese bang, the Huicheng Native-Place Association (惠城会馆).

Hoa was remembered as a debonair man who exuded the air of a Confucian scholar and was always meticulously dressed. He was slightly plump in physique and had a high forehead and broad cheeks. He was admired for his literary and translation skills after he composed many inspiring poems, prose, and song lyrics. Among his most well-read prose was "会安埠今昔 (Hoi'an — Past and Present)". Writing commentaries on Chinese literature was another of his favourite past times. His expressions in the Chinese language frequently surfaced in the Chinese language press of Saigon. Several Chinese papers existed in the 1950s in Saigon, namely, Xinwen Ribao (新闻日报), Meiri Luntanbao (每日论坛报), Asia Daily (亚洲日报), Yuenan Wanbao (越南晚报), and Yuandong Ribao (远东日报). Since 1965 under Prime Minister Nguyễn Cao Kỳ until before 1975, at least six Chinese language newspapers were circulating in Vietnam after having merged several times. Hoa's prolific poetry and prose writings finally culminated in an anthology in 1970.

Hoa suffered from liver problems and was hospitalized at the Military Hospital of Saigon in December 1969. He died of meningopathy on 5 November 1970 in Saigon (currently, Ho Chi Minh City). He is survived by his three children — eldest daughter, Diệp Gia Mai (叶家梅), second daughter, Diệp Gia Phong (叶家枫), and youngest son, Diệp Gia Tương (叶家湘) — all of whom are currently professionals in the United States. His wife, Đặng Kim Xoa, currently aged eighty-three, also resides there.

Interviews with Đặng Tử Khôn, nephew of Đặng Thế Trinh, in August 2004, in Hoi'an (Vietnam).

Đới Ngoan Quân

(戴顽君, Dai Wanjun, 1913–2003)
Artist, Vietnam

Đới Ngoan Quân was from Hengshui city (Hành Thuỷ) of Hebei province, China (河北省衡水市). He had taken a liking to traditional painting since he was young. At age twenty, or in 1933, he joined the Beijing Academy of Arts (北京美术学院). During the Chinese resistance war against Japan, Quân abandoned his studies and went to serve in the Chinese armed forces. After the end of World War II, he followed the Chinese army to Vietnam to receive the surrender of the Japanese there. After 1946, Quân retired from the armed forces and settled in Saigon where he entered the profession of teaching art. In 1976 he migrated to Paris and lived there till the end of his life. While there he served as a consultant on culture to the Chinese section of The European Times (欧洲时报).

In 1954 when the National College of Fine Arts in Saigon was established, Quân was invited to teach Chinese painting there. He was already known as an artist who followed the Capital School (Kinh phái or jing pai 京派), which specializes in traditional Chinese paintings; he was also a renowned sculptor who worked with materials such as ivory, bones, and stones. In the world of calligraphy, he was also famous for the Lễ (Li 礼) form, which led to many contemporary artists and others in the culture arena going to him for help in producing the required calligraphy for use in various activities. While friendship was a key factor in these requests, it was also a recognition of the talent and character of the calligrapher who had gained a certain status within his community.

As a result of the formal education and formal fine arts training that he received, Quân did not shine only in arts and literary works, but was also very well versed in the theories of art. He understood fundamentally the characteristics and styles of different schools and the value of different art forms. His assessments of art works were often accepted as authoritative in the field. Famous artists such as Lương Thiếu Hàng, Hoàng Hữu Mai, and Hà Lãn Hùng often asked him to write prefaces or epigraphs for their own publications or works. Quân often obliged and wrote the preface for Nam Tú Họa Tập Đệ Nhị Tập (1967), published by Lương Thiếu Hàng and his students; the foreword for Hữu Mai Họa Tập (友梅画集) (1958) by Hoàng Hữu Mai (黄友梅); and the introduction for authors of Cổ Tùng Hiền Sư Sinh Tác Phẩm Niên Triển Tập (古松轩师生作品年展集) (1973), published by Hà Lãn Hùng (何嬾熊) and his students.

As for his own works, Quân did traditional water colour, seal, and microcarvings, in addition to calligraphy. His works are sought after by many museums. In addition to numerous exhibitions in Vietnam, Quân did no fewer than ten exhibitions of his works outside Vietnam. One of his works entitled, "Heavenly Winds and Sea Waves" (Thiên Phong Hải Đào 天风海涛), is collected in the Việt Nam Sùng Chính Y Viện Thư Họa Nghĩa Triển Đặc Tập (越南崇正医院书画义展特辑), published by Hoa Nghệ Kha Thức Ấn vụ Cục (华艺柯式印务局). This work clearly demonstrates that Quân belonged to the Capital School of water colour paints. The calligraphy in this piece is firm, yet smooth, and is well placed within a space just beside the scenery of strong flowing waves, evoking wind movements and their howling sounds. Quân's most famous carving is his microcarving of the New Testament (Thánh Kinh Tân Ước Toàn Thư 马可福音) on a block of ivory, seven by eight centimetres. The entire work consisted of sixteen chapters, containing 18,000 words, and engraved in regular script (楷体). This work was accompanied by seven other ivory pieces on which he engraved illustrations for the New Testament. All eight blocks have been collected by the Vatican Museum.

In 1985 Quân was appointed honorary fellow by the Da Vinci Academy of Arts in Italy. The City of Long le Saunier in France awarded him a cultural medal in 1986. The same year, the French city of Montelimar selected him to be honorary president for the World Exhibition of Microcarvings. On 12 October 1998, the mayor of Paris awarded Quân a cultural medal of the City of Paris. At the grand ceremony organized for the award, China's ambassador to France, Cai Fangbo (Thái Phương Bá 蔡方柏), read a speech, later published in The European Times, containing the following sentence: "Mr Đới is a great patriot, an artist of many talents, and has in him a deep understanding of Chinese culture. In him one sees many excellent qualities of the Chinese nation."

In his daily life in France, Quân continued doing what he did when living in Vietnam, meaning he was tireless in contributing to artistic causes and respected by everyone in the Chinese community there. Back in Vietnam he had been active in the field of fine arts for thirty years, and taught for twenty of those years at the National College for Fine Arts in Saigon. His influence on fellow artists, especially on those who worked on silk and water colour paintings, was considerable. As a follower of the Capital School of art — which started at the beginning of the twentieth century around the region of Beijing — Quân, like other followers of the traditional schools of painting, was able to preserve his style and inject new energies into his art when the Chinese nation was in a turmoil in the first half of the twentieth century. This school also managed to attract a younger generation of followers. Its artists persuaded many schools to teach the subject of traditional art to help the young retain this tradition. Therefore, the Capital School is also known as the National Essence School. Quân had played an important role in this effort, through a life dedicated to spreading traditional Chinese painting in both Asia and Europe.

Dư Thị Hoàn

(Vương Oanh Nhi, 王莺儿, Wang Ying'er, 1947–)
Poet, Vietnam

Dư Thị Hoàn was born Wang Jing Er or Vương Oanh Nhi in Vietnamese and her pen name is Nữ Lang Trung. She is an acclaimed contemporary Vietnamese poet, literary translator, and critic.

The "Hoàn" in her pseudonym is formed from a rearrangement of the middle syllable "Oanh" in her original name, Vương Oanh Nhi, with the addition of a falling tone (`); "Dư" means "spare, odd", and "Thị" is the middle name for ladies. Thus, "Dư Thị Hoàn" means "the odd woman Oanh".

The ancestors of the Wang family had migrated from Guangxi province (广西), China, and settled down for seven generations in Vietnam. Hoàn was born in Haiphong (Hải Phòng 海防市) in the northern region of Vietnam on 1 August 1947.

After graduating from Haiphong Middle-High School for Chinese Overseas (Trường Hoa Kiều Trung học Hải Phòng 海防华侨中学) in 1965, she started to work. Her career can be of four periods. During the first period (1965–80), she worked as a wood turner, a tedious job, at the ship repair factory of Z-21, a part of the Bureau of Marine Transport in Haiphong. She met with a severe accident at work in 1972 and spent six years receiving treatment and recuperating. Thereafter she took on the job of a workshop clerk for two years (1978–80), but was fired during the Sino-Viet border war of 1979. However, throughout her fifteen years as a worker, she always received commendations and rewards from her employers for her contributions. During the second period (1980–90), she made a living from doing handicraft such as knitting and sewing, and doing petty trading in fabrics, clothes, and vegetables. She sat for the entrance examination of the Nguyen Du College of Literary Writing (Trường Đại học Viết văn Nguyễn Du) in 1989, but quit school after the first year due to poverty. During the third period (1990–98) which occurred in the era of economic renovation in Vietnam, she tried various jobs, first as a Chinese translator and interpreter for commercial affairs at the frontier between China and Vietnam (1990–93), then as an agent for the commercial office of Hong Kong in Haiphong (1993–96), and finally as owner and manager of her own business company (1993–96) until her retirement. In 1996 she was admitted to the Vietnam Writers' Association and in 1998 she was elected a member of the Executive Committee of the Literature and Arts Union of Haiphong City, the vice-chairman of the Association of Literature (a part of the union), and branch chairman of the Branch of Poetry (also a part of the association).

Until now, she has only published two poem collections: Lối Nhỏ (The Narrow Path), which comprises forty-seven poems and was published by the Literature and Arts Union of Haiphong in 1988, and Bài Mẫu Giáo Sáng Thế (The Kindergarten Lesson of Genesis), which comprises twenty-four poems and was published by the Publisher of Vietnam Writers' Association in 1993. Though the rest of her compositions are only published in newspapers or still drafts such as, Du Nữ Ngâm (The Gypsy Girl's Song) and Tập Thơ Song Ngữ Anh-Việt (The Bilingual Poem Collection), she has created a remarkable position in contemporary Vietnamese poetry. Beside composing poems, Hoàn also does translations and writes literary critiques for many newspapers, such as Văn Nghệ (Arts and Literature), Nhân Dân (People), Phụ Nữ (Women), Lao Động (Labour), Tiền Phong (Avant-garde), Thể Thao Văn Hoá (Sports and Culture), Văn Nghệ Thành Phố Hồ Chí Minh (Arts and Literature of Ho Chi Minh City), and Người Hà Nội (Hanoian). Her critiques are also published in magazines, such as Văn Học Nước Ngoài (Foreign Literature), Văn Nghệ Quân Đội (Army Arts and Literature), Nhà Văn (Writers), Diễn Đàn (Forum), Tia Sáng (Light Array), and Sông Hương (River of Perfume).

Poetry to her is an essential release for a soul preoccupied with emotions. She confessed, "I write when I cannot eat or sleep well, when I don't bother even to comb my hair and feel scared of someone calling [at] the door…I write for nobody and thus cannot move anyone… Poetry came to me together with brand-new, deep hurts. It has given my life such overloaded shakes". Her first three poems, printed in the weekly newspaper, Văn Nghệ (number 1244, on 5 September 1987) — Viên Mãn (Fulfilled), Bước Chân Chậm (Slow Steps), and Trong Bệnh Viện Tâm Thần (In the Mental Hospital) — were honoured as the best in 1987. They were the crystallization of her real personal suffering — at that time, she had such severe depression that she had to seek treatment at a mental hospital. They also signified an innovative turn of Vietnamese literature.

With Lối Nhỏ (The Narrow Path), the title of her first poem collection, Hoàn is referring to narrow paths that people must travel through in life: the path of love, the path of social rules, and the path of destiny. Walking on the narrow path of love, the woman in her poetry seems unsatisfied: there is something lost, uneven, and disharmonious in the interactions between lovers, but she is determined not to turn away. Living within the narrow path of social rules, the woman in her poetry has suffered from her own tragic experience, but her love and attachment with the Vietnamese environment still remain, as seen in Mười Năm Tiếng Khóc (Ten Years of Weeping), Bức Thư Người Hoa (A Chinese Letter), Tổ Quốc (Home Country), and Viết Tặng Một Nhà Thơ Già (The Writing for An Old Poet). Crossing the narrow path of destiny, the woman in her poetry patiently searches for justice and true values, as seen in Của Hồi Môn (The Dowry), and Lời Giẻ Lau (Words of Clouts). This is where her awareness of creative nature occurs, with certainty and profundity, reflected as "An exceptional beauty" in Mai, (the name of a girl), "The joy of illegitimate pregnancy" in Người Sáng Tạo (The Creator), and "Resisting the suppression" in Khi Cầm Bút (On Writing).

Her collection, The Kindergarten Lesson of Genesis (Bài Mẫu Giáo Sáng Thế), continues her human narration and reveals a number of questions on other dimensions: time and human, as in Ơ Này Thời Gian (Hey Time), war as in Cầu Nguyện (Pray), religious belief, as in Quo Vadis (original title, meaning "Returning to Where?"), paradoxes of the human world, as in The Kindergarten Lesson of Genesis, and idols and people's illusions (The Dream). Human lives at the bottom of society are reflected in Nói Đi Em (Please Say Baby), and those depraved under contextual influence, in Nhà Cười (The Mirror House). Lastly, her own feelings have their place in Trăng Sáng Quá (How Bright The Moon Is) and Nơi Dĩ Vãng (The Place of Memories). A special feature in this collection are the two poems written in Chinese-Vietnamese: Tây Hồ Du (A Trip in Tay Lake) and Đàm Hoa Ai (Crying over Flowers).

Most of Hoàn's poems are written in free form, are modern in tone and concept, concise, honest, and full of femininity. Unlike most contemporary Vietnamese poetesses, Hoàn not only exposes her personal sentiments, but also expresses her worries about age and the country. Anxiety and nervousness overflow in her writings, making up never-ending questions over the human fate. There is, however, a solitary woman seeking absolute values that only exist in the land of bliss (极乐). Refusing habits, ruts, and clichés, the poetic character in Hoàn's poetry desires to get through prejudices and reach primitive nature, following the spirit of Zen as in Tổ Quốc (Home Country), Hóa Công (The Creator) and Vô Đề (Untitled). Văn Tâm, the literary researcher, considers Hoàn's poems "pain without resentment", "surrounded by numerous torments, her own innermost feelings, her family, her country".

Wayne Karlin, the American author and editor who is known for his writing of the Vietnam War, wrote this about Hoàn's poems: "…one senses in them an impish, sharp intelligence, confined in the darkness, but able to observe and report and hope for the light; a voice marked by a complete lack of self-pity and a wry sense of humor", "their musicality, which echoes the chants of prayers and meditations that are so often her subject, their combination of words and rhythms and sounds are evocative in ways that allow the reader to sense the complexities of reality that can't be expressed only in words or intellect".

With only a few compositions, Hoàn has created her own identity, which is like a coincidental beautiful crystallization of two cultures — Chinese and Vietnamese. As she humourously says about herself: "Chinese identity exists without my wish. Vietnamese essence is gained through my passion. Vương Oanh Nhi is a short circuit, between the two cultures, and Dư Thị Hoàn is its consequence."

Dy, James

(李逢梧, Li Fengwu, 1931-)

Businessman, philanthropist, community leader, Philippines

Dr James Dy is widely known in business circles for leading more than a dozen companies in diverse fields such as music and entertainment, travel, and real estate. However, he is first and foremost a philanthropist. Under his leadership, thousands of poor people in rural, urban poor coastal and informal settlers areas throughout the country benefited from the weekly medical assistance programmes of the Philippine Chinese Charitable Association. Dy also undertook the improvement and modernization of the Chinese General Hospital and Medical Center (CGHMC), expanding the hospital's services for thousands of charity patients in CGHMC. Under his guidance, public servants employed in several government agencies were provided with top-of-the-line free medical care.

Born in the town of Yongning in Shishi, Fujian Province, Dr James G. Dy was barely three years old when he and his mother came to settle in the Philippines. With his unrelenting principle of "establishing a career to serve society", Dy is today recognized as an accomplished entrepreneur, philanthropist, and respected leader in the Chinese-Filipino community.

At the turn of the century, Dy's grandfather came to the Philippines in search of better opportunities. He began by operating a grocery store in the streets of Chinatown. The family later began importing foreign food items and cigarettes when Dy's father took over the business. After graduating with a degree in commerce from the University of the East, Dy joined the family-owned business and worked his way up to being general manager at the age of twenty-six.

However, not long after that, he resigned from his duties at the family-owned corporation to launch Dyna Recording Company, a product of his love for, and fascination with music, and a deep awareness of the huge potential of the local music industry, particularly to a population whose very being reverberates with musical artistry.

With meagre resources of 1,000 pesos and two operating machines and a small staff consisting of ten workers, Dy started by producing a few recordings which earned a little money. His big break came when he became the distributor of the widely popular song, "Yesterday", sung by the Beatles, and the songs of other popular foreign artistes such as Teddy Randazzo, Paul Anka, Jo-Ann Campbell, Connie Francis, the Platters, The Bee Gees, Gary Lewis, and the Playboys.

At the time — the early 1960s — his company recognized the talent of Filipino artistes and produced local recordings from Asia's Queen of Songs, Pilita Corrales, and Perry Como-sing-alike, Diomedes Maturan, to name a few.

As founder and chairman of the Philippine Association of the Record Industry (PARI) and the Asean Music Industry Association (AMIA), Dy professionalized and exerted the rights of the local music industry. Before piracy even became a byword, PARI and AMIA were already implementing an anti-piracy programme that initiated bills and laws protecting the intellectual property rights of Filipino composers, authors, publishers, and artistes. For this, Dy is recognized as the "godfather of the music industry in the Philippines".

In 1994, when Polygram Recording Company established its branch in the Philippines, Dr James G. Dy held 70 per cent of the stocks. Today, with over 60 per cent share of the local market, Dyna Records, has not only been a licensee of major world-renowned recording companies, it has, under the able leadership of Dy's late daughter, Bella Dy-Tan, launched and groomed top-selling local artistes that include industry giants such as Gary Valenciano, Jose Mari Chan, Apo Hiking Society, Kuh Ledesma, Jake Concepcion, and Celeste Legaspi, to name a few.

Dy's personal hobbies, including his love of travel, led him to establish Pan Pacific Travel Corporation in 1978. Owing to his achievements and prominence in local tourism, he was elected vice-president of the Philippine Travel Agencies Association. He was the presiding chairman of the 6th World Tourism Convention held in Manila in 1985. Aside from this, he has also ventured into the restaurant, manufacturing, real estate, and entertainment businesses.

While there is no doubt that Dy is a consummate businessman, he is more recognized in the Chinese-Filipino community, as well as the mainstream Filipino society, for his leadership in various business and charitable organizations. He was elected president of the Philippine Chinese Charitable Association, Inc. (PCCAI) in 2001 and chairman in 2005, posts that he has held until today. He was also president of the Filipino-Chinese General Chamber of Commerce, Inc. (established in 1904) from 2001 to 2005, and honorary president from 2006 to the present. Additionally, he was also president of the World Lee Association (Taipei) from 2002 to 2005.

The Philippine Chinese Charitable Association, Inc (PICCAI). had played a significant role in the history of the early Chinese migrants in the Philippines. The Comunidad de Chinos, the predecessor of the PCCAI, was organized in 1870 with charity donations from Chinese immigrants who wanted better medical and burial conditions for their countrymen. Together they donated and raised funds to construct a medical clinic, where treatment was free of charge. In 1879, more money was raised to purchase the lot where the Chinese Cemetery now stands for these ethnic Chinese who were refused burial in the adjacent Christian cemetery because they were not baptized Catholics. PCCAI also donated money to build the Chinese General Hospital in 1891 to cater to Chinese patients who could not speak the Filipino language very well and were wary and suspicious of Western doctors.

Today PCCAI is the oldest and one of the largest charitable organizations in the Tsinoy (Chinese-Filipino) community and popular society. It oversees the Chinese General Hospital and Medical Center, the CGHMC College of Nursing, the Home for the Aged, the Chinese Cemetery, and a free clinic at the association's headquarters.

In August 1995, Dy personally led more than twenty doctors and medical personnel on a medical mission to the Philippines' southwest island of Palawan. For three days, they administered medical treatment and undertook forty-five small operations and 300 tooth extractions for local residents. They also gave out food and daily necessities to the people there, benefiting more than a thousand people in Palawan.

Every time there are natural calamities occurring in the Philippines, the PCCAI is always at the forefront. It has sent hundreds of medical missions to marginalized rural areas and coastal villages, and urban slums, and has provided free medical attention (through close coordination between PCCAI and the CGHMC) for indigent patients. As part of the hospital's and the organization's continued advocacy to help in the country's national development, policemen, firemen, and government workers are either given free medical treatment or huge discounts on doctor's and hospitalization fees.

Dy has always stood by his philosophy in life, "Do not just be occupied with your business". For his achievements in socio-civic and humanitarian work, he has been conferred honorary doctorate degrees by the Lyceum-Northwestern University in April 1999, the Central Luzon State University in 2004, the University of Pangasinan in 2006, and the Technological University of the Philippines in 2007. He was also given the Outstanding Manileño Award by the Manila City Government during the city's 428th founding anniversary. Dy was also recognized as "The Outstanding Filipino Award for Humanitarian Service" by the Philippine Jaycee Senate and Insular Life Insurance Ltd., in December 2001, and as the Dr Jose P. Rizal Lifetime Achievement Award for Excellence from The Manila Times, and Kaisa Para sa Kaunlaran in July 2004.

Dy, Manuel B., Jr.

(李继鹏, Li Jipeng, 1947–)
Scholar, philosopher, Philippines

When asked, students speak highly of Dy. Some would even go to the extent of describing his teaching as that of a seasoned professional who makes the thinking-learning experience that is philosophy more palatable and enjoyable. This is the skill he has honed for the past forty years. Fresh out of university, Dy jumped right into teaching. He had wanted to be a teacher even as a young boy and even promised his high school alma mater in Cebu, Southern Philippines, that he would go back there after his studies and teach. Fate, however, had different plans for this teacher.

Born on 22 April 1947, Dy's education was wholly local, except for some graduate and postgraduate courses in Belgium, Hong Kong, and the United States. His foray into teaching was precipitated by the people of the profession in his life — his own teachers. In grade school and high school, the Sacred Heart School run by the Jesuits, Dy was blessed to have a teacher who truly wanted to teach him. In his second year at Ateneo, Dy answered the call for students to be the first batch of philosophy majors. As a student in the field, Dy excelled enough to gain the Departmental Award upon graduation. Along with the award, he was also given the offer to teach at the university. He has not left there since, except to study further, give lectures, or be a consultant. He took up his master's in philosophy at Ateneo de Manila University, and his doctorate at the University of Santo Tomas. He taught at Ateneo while taking his master's and his doctorate degrees. He then furthered his studies in Louvian, Belgium, and then Hong Kong and Washington DC.

When asked how it is to be a teacher, he simply says, "When I'm in the classroom, I am energised. I forget my problems the moment I am in the classroom. Of course, there are always the frustrations there, but then I get an excellent paper and I am elated." This energy emanates to his class in its own way. The Metrobank Foundation honoured Dy as an awardee of the prestigious Metrobank Foundation Search for Outstanding Teachers in 2004. Dy gives students reason to love philosophy although it is one of the "dreaded" required courses at Ateneo. He teaches them that philosophy is simply thinking, just plain thinking; and that no thought is wrong as long as the student can defend his ideas. He encourages students to ask questions and to seek answers instead of simply waiting for them; and he tells them that no answer is wrong if the student has truly thought about it. His own way of defining being a teacher sets him apart as well. He likens himself to a candle that sheds light on knowledge, explaining that, "Teaching, or being a teacher is only being an instrument — an instrument of peace, instrument of healing, instrument of reconciliation… It's the passion. It's a responsibility."

Besides his excellent performance academically, Dy also exudes the confidence and exhibits the skills that let him thrive with people from other cultures. As a product of two cultures, he shows pride in his heritage and has sought to marry the philosophies of his Chinese-Filipino ancestry. He has chosen to stay put in the country so that he can help hone more philosophically-oriented Filipinos in his teachings. In this sense, he is developing more global Filipinos by simply being himself — a patriot, an idealist, a philosopher. Although he has personally remained in the country, his life's work has gone global. Dy can shed his light on philosophy anywhere. A true mark of a teacher is the ability to teach effectively, whatever the setting or circumstances. Dy has presented his work and represented the university, as well as the country, at various local, regional, and international conferences, seminars, and lectures. He shares what he knows and brings back what he has learned. Even when not physically abroad, his writings reach students, teachers, and enthusiasts of philosophy all over the world.

His mind will not stop at simply learning. Dy has written about philosophy too. He has woven what he learned with what he experienced, and transformed this into compositions that reflect the mind of a true thinker. His writings cover many subjects, all close to his heart — Philosophy and Religion, Oriental Philosophies, Man's Search for Meaning, Philosophy of Suicide, among other publications. Many of these books are now being used in schools of philosophy all over the world — for example, the Christian Academy in South Korea, The Catholic University of America, and the Centre International Pour Etude Comparee de Philosophie et D'Esthetique. His texts provide much needed information for courses in basic and advance philosophy and are studied in the Asian region as well as in various Jesuit institutions in other countries.

Dy is also a research scholar in the International Asian Studies Program at the Chinese University of Hong Kong, and has served as secretary to the Asian Association of Catholic Philosophers. A frequent speaker at international conferences on oriental and contemporary philosophies, moral education and ethics, he has been published widely in philosophical journals both in the Philippines and abroad — such as the Council for Research on Values & Philosophy in Washington, the Asian Journal of Philosophy, the Junshin Journal of Human Studies, and the local Budhi papers, to name a few.

Outside books and classrooms, he is also active in organizations in the Jesuit and Philosophical communities. This involvement is one of the things the Jesuits emphasize for all members of the community — students, teachers, administrators, and service personnel alike. He currently serves as a Director for the Jesuit Volunteers Philippines, an organization of volunteers that go to various parts of the country to teach and help in the community's development. Also, it wasn't so long ago that Dy was one of the fourteen controversial professors of Ateneo who made the headline in the papers for saying that the Reproductive Health Bill — a proposed law that would promote family planning and the use of contraceptives — was not entirely against the precepts of the Catholic Church. This stance is contrary to what many staunch Catholics and conservative men of the cloth have been evangelizing.

In essence, Dr Manny B. Dy, Jr. fits Metrobank Foundation's definition and paramenters of an outstanding teacher. The Metrobank Foundation "bestows honor upon the teaching profession by according special recognition to teachers who manifest profound commitment to the development of the youth through exemplary competence, remarkable dedication to their work and effective educational leadership. It singles out teachers who have made a significant contribution to national development by raising the quality of outcomes of education through their effective, innovative and creative teaching strategies, materials and devices and their admirable efforts to bring the school closer to the community and consequently, the community to the school, thereby providing models of excellence in the teaching profession".

E

Ear Cheam Heng

(杨国璋,Yang Guozhang, 1938–)
Businessman, Cambodia

Ear Cheam Heng was born in 1938 in Phnom Penh. He is known by many for being the first person to create a wine with a Cambodian brand that made a name outside the country as early as the 1960s. He is also highly respected for his contributions to the economic development of Cambodia and the welfare of the Chinese community in the country.

Ear's parents, Ear Shao Sheng (father) and Lin Chan Xing (mother), were married in Chao'an, Guangzhou, before migrating to Cambodia in the 1920s. In 1930, Ear Shao Sheng established his beverage factory, Lao Hang Heng Wine Company, which initially produced soda drinks, but the senior Ear expanded its production capacity to bring out an alcoholic drink called Black Cat Wine. He was hence well known as a pioneer manufacturer of beverages in Cambodia. In 1958 Ear Cheam Heng inherited his father's beverage business and in 1966 created another new brand, the Special Muscle Wine, with an improved formula to replace the company's trademark Black Cat Wine. In 1968 King Norodom Sihanouk in his address to the nation during the National Water Festival praised the Lao Hang Heng Wine Company for producing excellent wine that brought honour to the kingdom. Ear Cheam Heng's Special Muscle Wine was the first Cambodian wine that made a name in the Southeast Asian region, in particular, in Vietnam, Thailand, and Myanmar.

The French administration of the Cambodian Chinese community ended in 1958. From the 1960s, Chinese community affairs were handled by a Chinese Hospital Committee, the largest group of Chinese merchants in Cambodia that funded and ran the Chung Hwa Hospital (中华医院), established in 1906. In 1971, the Cambodian Government approved the formation of a new body, the Federated Association of Chinese of Cambodia. This was the first organization formed by the five major Chinese dialect groups of Cambodia — Teochew, Cantonese, Hokkien, Hakka, and Hainanese (五帮会馆 — 潮州会馆、广肇会馆、福建会馆、客属会馆、海南会馆) — and it functioned like today's Association of Khmer Chinese in the Kingdom (柬埔寨柬华理事总会), handling all matters relating to Cambodian Chinese, such as rendering help in social, cultural, and public health areas, as well as promoting friendly relations between Cambodians and Cambodian Chinese. In 1973 Ear Cheam Heng's leadership, based on his achievements in business, was recognized by the Chinese community and he was elected chairman of the board of governors of Chung Hwa Hospital. At the time the hospital had more than two hundred doctors and nurses and was the only welfare organization providing free medical care to the needy in Cambodia, regardless of their race and ethnicity. According to the hospital records, Ear Cheam Heng, who was then thirty-five years old, was the youngest elected chairman of the Chung Hwa Hospital and he served for two years. In 1975, when the Khmer Rouge took control of Cambodia, Chung Hwa Hospital was forced to stop its medical services and was later closed down. It did not resume operations thereafter and its location is currently taken over by a forty-two-storey residential building called Gold Tower 42.

In 1975 Ear foresaw political instabilities that would bring about various problems if he continued to stay in the country. He then made a quick decision to abandon all his businesses in Cambodia and sought refuge in Hong Kong with his family. There he started his business afresh by trading seahorse, a highly prized Chinese herbal medicine that he imported from Thailand to sell in China via Hong Kong. In 1978 he expanded his business to collect parts of television sets of major brands such as Sony of Japan, Philips of Holland, and ITT of Germany, to export to Thailand. These television parts were then reassembled and sold in the local market. His television sets were sold at lower prices compared with brand new sets because television parts were non-taxable by Thai customs. At the beginning he was selling one hundred television sets monthly, but demand grew so fast that his sales went up to three thousand sets a month. However Ear's business suffered a setback when the Thai Government implemented a tax-free policy for some imported goods, including brand new television sets. In 1988 Ear switched to exporting goods such as daily necessities, electrical appliances, and biscuits to Vietnam. On average, his monthly revenue was more than US$1 million and, in good times, the credit of his Vietnamese customers could be as high as US$4 million in one month.

In 1985 Prince Norodom Sihanouk, who was restored as king of Cambodia in 1993, visited Hong Kong and met up with Cambodians residing in the territory. He talked about the task of rebuilding the Cambodian economy after the fall of the Khmer Rouge and encouraged his audience to return to Cambodia to take up the task. In 2000, in response to the call of the king, Ear, at the age of sixty-two, decided to return to Cambodia. He understood that it was not going to be an easy task; his Special Muscle Wine would have been completely forgotten after a period of twenty-five years and also, many of his customers in the 1970s had either been killed during the Khmer Rouge era or had sought refuge in other parts of the world. However Ear, for the second time in Cambodia, managed to revive his customers' confidence in his herbal wine. On two separate occasions — in 2008 and 2010 — Prime Minister Hun Sen awarded him gold certificates for his economic contributions to Cambodia. Today, the advertisement of Lao Hang Heng Wine Company can easily be spotted in magazines, newspapers, and on television in Cambodia.

Ear was married to the late Chen Xiu Zhen (陈秀珍), a Cambodian Chinese with roots in Guangdong who passed away in Beijing in 1997. They have four daughters and three sons. The eldest daughter initially lived in Paris and later settled down with her husband in Macau to start a business in real estate. The second daughter has residency in both Canada and Hong Kong, and is running a jewellery business with her husband. The third daughter and her husband are running a law firm in Hong Kong. The fourth daughter is a businesswoman in the real estate business in Guangzhou. As for their sons, the eldest, who was a regional manager of an insurance company in Hong Kong, has returned to Cambodia to help manage his family's wine business. The second son runs a travel agency in Hong Kong and occasionally returns to Cambodia to help in the family business. Their youngest son is a senior manager of a bank in Hong Kong.

Ee Peng Liang

(余炳亮, Yu Bingliang, 1913–94)

Accountant, community and social worker, philanthropist, Singapore

Mr Charity, Father of Charity, and Professional Beggar… these are just some of the nicknames Ee Peng Liang had earned for himself after his pioneering work in Singapore charity, which spanned more than six decades — from the late 1940s to the early 1990s. A founding member of the National Council of Social Service in 1953, he was the organization's president for twenty-eight years until his retirement in 1992. He was also founding president of the Community Chest of Singapore when it was established in 1983.

For his contributions to the needy in society and humanitarian work, he was awarded some of the state's highest honours, such as the Public Service Star (1964), the Justice of the Peace (1966), the Meritorious Service Medal (1967), the Distinguished Service Order (1985), and the Order of Nila Utama (Second Class) in 1991.

Ee Peng Liang was born to Ee Seng Watt, a shipping clerk, and his wife, Lim Choo Neo on 24 November 1913 at No. 6, Sin Koh Street, near the Kallang River in Singapore. He was the eldest of seven siblings comprising three boys and four girls. He obtained his Senior Cambridge Certificate at St Joseph's Institution in 1931 and after graduation, spent another eighteen months there taking commercial courses, which included shorthand and typing, bookkeeping, and elements of commerce. He then passed examinations set by the London Chamber of Commerce with flying colours.

Ee started work as a stenographer with a law firm and pursued professional accounting qualifications through correspondence courses, which led to fellowships to the Chartered Association of Certified Accountants and Chartered Institute of Secretaries and Administration in London in 1937. The year before that, he had just married his teenage sweetheart, Mary Seow. They met when both were members of the Singapore Amateur Orchestra. He was playing the flute and she, the piano, and was the only female member of the twenty-piece musical group.

He started his own accounting firm, Ee Peng Liang and Co. in 1947, which operated for nearly forty years before it merged with Ernst and Whinney (later Ernst and Young) in 1986.

Ee's lifelong dedication to charitable causes came after his escape from three near-death experiences during the Japanese Occupation, which he attributed to the grace of God. A few days after the Japanese took over Singapore in 1942, a general round-up took place. He noticed that those who wore spectacles were called aside. He quickly shoved his glasses into a pocket and was passed over. The bespectacled were later shot.

On another occasion, he found himself rounded up again, this time as a member of the Straits Volunteer Force. The Japanese officer unsheathed his sword and then asked for volunteers to face execution. As he held the most senior rank of sergeant, he was one of the three among their group of about ninety men who stepped forward — only to be treated to a drink and praise for bravery.

When he was rounded up by the Japanese a third time, the group was divided into three rows. Two rows were arbitrarily sent home. Those who remained were sent to the firing squad.

Ee, a staunch Roman Catholic, said in an interview with the Sunday Times in 1977 that: "I felt God had spared me for something and not just for myself. I felt I had to do something."

After the war he went straight into charity work, becoming the first honorary secretary for Marymount Convent, and helping to raise funds and set up the Marymount Vocational Centre in 1947. After that, he joined one organization after another to volunteer his services. When he was in his sixties and seventies when most people his age were long in retirement, he was still actively involved in no fewer than fifty organizations, most of them welfare groups.

His involvement included being a member of the Public Service Commission and Advisory Board of the Central Council of Malay Cultural Organisations, president of the St John Ambulance National Council, chairman of the Catholic Welfare Services, Boys' Town, and Catholic Junior College, and as trustee and adviser to many other community, civic, and charitable organizations.

He was involved with the Singapore Scout Association since the early 1950s and was vice-president of the Singapore Scout Association in 1965, and president from 1973 till his death in 1994. For his contributions and long service, the association awarded him the Scouts' Distinguished Service Medal in 1970. When the association built its new headquarters in Bishan in 1996, it was named the Ee Peng Liang Building in memory of the long-serving president.

In 1991, the World Scout Foundation admitted him as a Baden-Powell Fellow, the scout's movement's highest honour named after its founder, Robert Baden Powell. Other honours he received included the honorary doctor of letters from the former University of Singapore (1976), Friend of the Labour Medal from the National Trades Union Congress (1981), Knight of the Order of St John conferred by the queen of the United Kingdom (1984), and Knight of the Grand Cross of the Order of St Sylvester by the Catholic Church (1992), which is awarded to only those who have been active in social work for more than forty years.

One of his last public appointments was in 1993, when he was made pro-chancellor of the Nanyang Technological University.

Of all his contributions, his most important achievement was perhaps the setting up of the Community Chest in 1983, which put in place a machinery that helped meet the financial needs of most welfare organizations in Singapore today.

Ee died of a sudden heart attack on 24 August 1994, aged eighty-one. The late former Singapore President Ong Teng Cheong said of his passing: "He will be remembered as the father of charity. I hope more people would emulate his example. He has done us proud."

Ee was survived by his wife, Mary, and five children — daughters Theresa, Cecillia, and Agnes, and sons Lawrence and Gerard. Younger son, Gerard, later succeeded him as president of the National Council of Social Service and in other charity work to carry on his title as Mr Charity.

Ee Tiang Hong

(易天鸿, Yi Tianhong, 1933–90)
Poet, teacher, academic, Malaysia

An eminent Malaysian poet, Ee Tiang Hong remains an important figure and influence in the literary landscape of post-colonial, post-Independence Malaysia. As part of the first wave of nationally recognized writers to spearhead the writing of literary works in English, Ee shares pioneering status with the generation of poets, fictionists, and dramatists who constitute the "university writers", so-named because they were all products of the British tertiary education system, with some going on to pursue careers in academia. Ee's poetry reveals a lifelong preoccupation with the experience of exile, displacement, and discrimination, and their impact on identity and notions of home. As such, his work resonates with Malaysians of Chinese descent and other ethnic backgrounds who find their cultural and political identities and allegiances undermined by racialized regimes. Disenchanted with the oppressive race politics in Malaysia which culminated in the race riots of May 1969, Ee migrated to Australia with his family in 1975. However, as his writings amply demonstrate, he never lost sight of his homeland.

Ee Tiang Hong was born in 1933 in Malacca, Malaysia, into a peranakan (local born) family that had lived on the peninsula for six generations. Ee belonged to the seventh generation. Being a baba, Ee spoke Baba Malay as his first language. This is a Malay patois widely spoken by the Straits Chinese of Malacca and Singapore. The Straits Chinese refer to Chinese subjects born and long domiciled in the Straits Settlements (an administrative unit formed by the British in 1826 and named after the Straits of Malacca). Ee studied at Tranquerah English High School and Malacca High School before going to the University of Malaya in Singapore in the 1950s where he read English, history, and philosophy. Ee's formative years as a student coincided with politically turbulent times. The British colonial administration was faced with anti-colonial sentiment, communist insurgency, the Japanese Occupation, and post-war pro-independence nationalism. After graduation, Ee became a teacher in the civil service and was once the principal of the Kota Bharu Teachers Training College. He eventually became senior education officer in the Education Ministry where he served till 1969. Subsequently, he embarked on an academic career at the University of Malaya in the Faculty of Education. In 1975, Ee migrated to Australia and made a new home for himself and his family in Perth, along the banks of the Swan River. He officially became an Australian citizen in 1979. Ee lectured at the Western Australian College of Advanced Education (now Edith Cowan University) and took a Ph.D. in Education from the University of Western Australia with a thesis entitled, "Education in Malaysia and Singapore: A Comparative Study of Racial and Cultural Factors as Determinants of Educational Policy 1945–70" (1984). As a scholar-poet and academic, Ee wrote not only poetry and literary criticism, but also monographs and papers on education. He co-authored Education in Malaysia (1975) and Reading and Thinking (1971) and co-edited The Writer's Sense of the Contemporary: Papers in Southeast Asian and Australian Literature (1982).

Ee produced five volumes of poetry in all: I of the Many Faces (1960), Lines Written In Hawaii (1973), Myths for a Wilderness (1976), Tranquerah (1985), and Nearing a Horizon (1994). Only the first two books were published while he was still in Malaysia. Generally, Ee's poetry is inflected with the memory of a personal and communal history as well as perceptions of a national identity and nationhood that are fiercely at odds with those of the country. The Malaysia of the post-Independence era was heralding the dominance of Malays as the sons of the soil, and Ee who regarded his peranakan community as rooted to the land, and Malaysia as his only homeland, was moved to write poetry which expressed his dismay and frustration at the turn of events. As Leonard Jeyam notes: "We must remember that Ee was Malaya's first national poet to choose self-exile after deciding that the new Malay-dominated vision of the land and its racial politics were unacceptable to him. Such disjunctions of nationhood and the meaning of nation would forever remain unresolved in his writing" (p. 189). In fact, Ee unequivocally defined himself as "a true son of the soil"; his sense of a "total self" was embodied in the "natural integration of cultures" ("Literature and Liberation", p. 28) — Chinese, Malay, and European — as a result of centuries of cultural intermingling. That his community's long-standing commitment to the land was not recognized amounted to a painful betrayal for him. In "Heeren Street, Malacca", Ee nostalgically revisits a place of personal, communal, and national significance, but the decay and bleakness of the place belie its former glory: "Gharry and palanquin are silent. / The narrow street describes / Decades of ash and earth. / Here in the good old days / The Babas paved / A legend on the landscape" (Myths, p. 1). Not only are the good old days gone, but it is suggested that "our children" are powerless to "Blaze another myth, / Mediating in every wilderness / Of this golden peninsula" (Myths, p. 1), the "wilderness" being a metaphor for the crisis of identity and place afflicting the nation. Not surprisingly, arrogance and power abuse in the nation's history are themes which Ee treats with characteristic candour and irony. In the poem, "Ownership and Control", the speaker bitterly deplores those who presume to invent categorisations of inhabitants, based on degrees of rightful belonging or not belonging, such as "prince of the earth, son of the soil, naturalised citizen, / immigrant, permanent resident, new settler, / alien, illegal, etc." (Tranquerah, p. 33). In Nearing a Horizon, his last book of poetry, the speaker laments: "Race, language, religion, birthplace — / the categories do not satisfy: / what do they say of you and me, / the space, the silences between?" ("Some New Perspectives", p. 10). After the move to Australia in 1975, diasporic issues also came to the fore as the trauma of separation and loss began to weigh heavily on the poet's sensibilities. The anguish of alienation and departure is captured in poems such as "A Page from Nature" (Myths, p. 17), "Patriotism" (Myths, pp. 52–53), and "Lesson from Childhood" (Nearing, p. 28), while the demands of founding a new home in Australia are conveyed in "The Burden" (Nearing, pp. 19-20), "Coming To" (Nearing, pp. 35–36) and "Done" (Nearing, pp. 38–39). In terms of style, Ee was among the first Malaysian English-language writers to attempt evoking a more authentic sense of place and culture in some of his poems by employing the rhythms and dialects of the English spoken by the locals.

Eu Tong Sen

(余东旋, Yu Dongxuan, 1877–1941)
Entrepreneur, Singapore and Malaysia

Eu Tong Sen is a famous entrepreneur in South China and Southeast Asia. He came from a family of migrants. In 1861, his grandfather, Eu Hok-chung (1822–86) settled in Foshan, Guangdong from Jiangxi Province. He was a fengshui master, as well as a man with extensive social networks. In 1876, he utilized his connections and helped his eldest son, Eu Kong-pui (1853–91) to migrate to Malaya. Eu Kong-pui settled himself in Penang with his family's acquaintances in a cloth shop and was later employed as a shop assistant in a Yue Sang grocery shop. The timing of Eu Kong-pui's arrival is important. His migration to Penang coincided with the expansion of British colonial rule in the Malayan peninsula. After the making of the Treaty of Pangkor in 1874, Britain introduced the systems of British Residency Protection to the Malaya Peninsula. The systems encouraged the opening up of tax farms in tin mining and intended to expand British control to the inner parts of the Malayan peninsula. The British officials believed that the Chinese migrants were ideal partners in opening up the virgin land. Eu Kong Pui was one of them. In 1882, Eu Kong-pui secured financial support from his employer and acquired from the British colonial government a tax farm in Gopeng, Perak. With the revenue farm, he ventured into tin mining and developed a captive market among the miners. He opened a shop, Yan Sang, to sell groceries, Chinese medicinal herbs and other daily necessities.

Eu Tong Sen (1877–1941) was born in Penang. He was Kong-pui's only son. In 1882, he was sent back to Foshan for education. It was there that he became interested in Cantonese opera, a favourite pastime of his grandfather. In 1891, Eu Kong-pui died of an unidentified illness at the early age of thirty-eight years. In 1892, Tong Sen returned to Penang and his stepmother entered him at St Xavier's School. He boarded with a Mr R. Butler, his father's business partner, for almost two years. With this exposure, Eu developed a zest for horse racing.

Eu Tong Sen inherited his father's business at the age of twenty-one. The tax farming business, however, was in a state of decline. The British colonial government was phasing out the system. By his enterprise and hard work, Tong Sen eventually cleared his father's liabilities and went on to amass a fortune from a wide of array of enterprises including plantations, foundries, real estate, Chinese medicine, banking, as well as theatres in Malaya, Singapore, Hong Kong and Canton. At the peak of his career, Eu owned 11 mines, which recruited more than 12,000 Chinese miners. By 1908, for instance, he owned two mines at Kampar, three at Gopeng, one at Tronoh, one at Chenderiang, and one at Papan. About 8,000 coolies were recruited for these mines. In Selangor, Eu also operated one mine at Ampang and one at Kancheng, together employing about 3,000 coolies. In Batang Benna and Negri Sembilan, Eu also operated a mine with about 1,000 miners. To offset the risk of fluctuating tin price, Eu set up a Sang Woh Foundry and extended his business into the manufacturing of tin-made items for China and Southeast Asian countries. By doing so, he also attempted to set up a "vertical integration" for his business empire.

In 1908, Eu commenced planting two rubber estates of about 450 and 250 acres and ventured into the business of rubber plantation. This venture gradually expanded and helped Eu to diversify his business empire. With expanding business networks in British Malaya, Yan Sang shops also expanded its engagement in remittance, helping miners and coolies to send their income back to China. As the remittance and medicines businesses expanded, branches were set up in such major cities as Penang, Ipoh, Kuala Lumpur, Hong Kong and Singapore. In a branding exercise, Tong sen changed the name of his shop to 'Eu Yan Sang' (余仁生, hereafter, EYS). A branch was established in the Sheung Wan district of Hong Kong in 1909. As his branches increased and his business spread out, his potential market also expanded. The distribution network extended by the EYS shops was converted into remittance channels. EYS gradually built up an extensive remittance networks connecting British Malaya with Hong Kong and southern China. In the 1920s when the rubber business deteriorated, Tong Sen further shifted his focus to remittance business.

By the late 1920s to mid-1940s, the most profitable part of EYS's business was in remittances, not medicines. In terms of the volume of money remitted, EYS was one of the most influential Chinese agents in remittance business. The EYS shop in Hong Kong became a distribution centre of Eu's remittance business between Southeast Asia and southern China. With this foundation, Eu also established a Lee Wah Bank in Singapore in 1920. The Bank was set up to cater mainly to the Cantonese-speaking community. With increasing wealth and fame, Tong Sen became a community leader. He was the Chinese representative in the Federal Council from 1911–20. During the First World War, other than presenting a tank and an aeroplane to the British Government, he also made substantial donations to the Prince of Wales's and other Relief Funds. In return to his services and loyalty, the British Government conferred upon him the Order of O.B.E.

Eu Tong Sen had eight wives and 13 sons. All his sons were English-educated and adopted English names. They were arranged to study accounting, laws, business and finance in the United Kingdom or the United States of America respectively. Eu Keng Chee (1900–57), the eldest son, was sent to study at a boarding school in England and later arranged by his father to study for a degree in Accounting. Keng Chee returned to Singapore in 1925 and gradually took over the management of the family businesses.

In 1928, Eu Tong Sen retired to Hong Kong and his eldest son, Keng Chee, took over his business in Southeast Asia. While most of Eu's old businesses (like tin mining and the rubber plantations) were handled by Eu's senior managers in Southeast Asia, the new businesses (like banking and real estate) was handled by Eu Keng Chee in Singapore. Eu Tong Sen was kept thoroughly informed of their operations by reading the monthly accounting reports submitted by the branch managers. In 1932, Eu set up an Eu Tong Sen Limited in Singapore to supervise his properties in Southeast Asia. To pre-empt power struggles among his sons, Eu Tong Sen converted business equity into shares.

Eu Tong Sen owned a number of beautiful private residences in Hong Kong and Southeast Asia. In Singapore, he had a grand house known as "Eu Villa". After his retirement to Hong Kong in 1928, Tong Sen also acquired a large number of properties there. He built two Gothic-style castles — Euston on Bonham Road and Eucliff at Repulse Bay. An Austrian-style schloss named Sirmio was built in the New Territories. In 1934, Eu Tong Sen registered his will with the Hong Kong High court, which stated that his fortune would be equally distributed to his 13 sons after his death.

By 1941, when the Japanese troops were approaching South China, Eu Tong Sen arranged for his family to migrate to Australia and the United States. He himself never managed to make the trip. On the 9 May 1941, spending a final week at Sirmio before departure, he had a heart attack and passed away. Following the terms set out by his will, Eu Tong Sen was cremated and his ashes were buried in the courtyard at Sirmio. His estate was divided among his 13 sons. Lawyer and scholar Song Ong Siang recorded in 1923 his impression of Eu Tong Sen as follow: "he is a level-headed man of business, of a frank, genial and sociable disposition and a warm-hearted friend. With the sole exception of the late Loke Yew, he can easily claim to be the richest man in the F.M.S."

F

Fang Beifang

(方北方, 1918–2007)
Prolific novelist, Malaysia

Fang Beifang (meaning: Fang of the North) is arguably the most prolific Malaysian Chinese writer who produced at least 31 books, the largest number of which are the novels.

Fang Beifang's real name was Fang Zuobin 方作斌. He was born in Huilai (惠来), Guangdong, China, in 1918 and went to Penang, Malaya in 1928 at the age of 10 to join his uncle who ran a shop selling construction materials. Fang Beifang studied in the Chung Ling Middle School (Penang) but returned to China in 1938 during the anti-Japanese war to continue his studies. He eventually returned to Penang in 1948 and stayed with his cousin's family. He became a citizen after Malaya gained its independence and stayed on in Malaya/Malaysia until he died in 2007 at the age of 89 years old. Fang was not a full time writer; he held a stable job as a Chinese language teacher in Hanjiang Secondary School of which he was once its principal. He was also a part-time Chinese newspaper editor in Penang for four years.

Fang began to publish his works in 1947 when he was still in China. His first novel which was published that year was A Story in Spring (春天里的故事). But his first published book after his return to Penang was a literary report entitled The Old City Where A Thousand People Die Everyday (每天死千人的古城). Nevertheless, it appeared that he was more talented in writing novels. In 1952 he published a novel entitled Two Men who Commit Suicide (两个自杀者). But the novel which brought him fame was Nonya and Baba (娘惹与峇峇) which was published in 1954 and was reprinted numerous times. It was also made into a movie by Cathay Film Co. in Malaya/Hong Kong. Although the movie was generally considered

The novel tells the story of a rich Nonya known as Lim Nonya who was a widow with a son by a previous husband. She married a Chinese migrant, Lin Tianfu, who had no say on anything. His step-son, Lim Baba, was sent to an English school and lost his Chinese values and cultural identity. Lim Baba married a wife who ended up committing suicide and their son, Lim Xiba, was abandoned. When Lim Baba went bankrupt and his new wife ran away, it was his forsaken child who came back to look after him. Lim Xiba was Chinese-educated and regained his Chinese values. This novel dwells on the views of a China-born and Chinese-educated writer on the Baba community. It is also a criticism of colonial education and an advocate of Chinese education for the Chinese overseas. Fang as a Chinese school teacher tended to preach, but in the novel Nonya and Baba the preaching was woven into a well-written story. However, as time passed, the moral teaching in Fang's novels became more obvious.

There were two schools of thought in Malayan Chinese literature: one was "art for art sake" and the other was "art for society". The latter was known as the school of realism, and Fang Beifang belonged to this school. In 1957 he published the first volume of his Trilogy of Trends (风云三部曲), Light Comes Late in the Morning (迟亮的早晨), which was followed by The Extraordinarily Brief Noon (刹那的正午) in 1967, and The Evening which Vanishes (幻灭的黄昏) in 1978. This trilogy portrays the lives of Chinese youths, especially the young intellectuals in mainland China during the 1930s and 1940s, their struggles against the Japanese invasion and their national awakening. Apparently this trilogy was a departure from Fang Beifang's 1954 novel which uses Malaya as a background.

Regarding this trilogy, supporters of Fang argued that this was the only substantial novel on China during the turbulent years written by a Chinese outside China, which reflected the talent and courage of the author, but those who were local-oriented regarded this trilogy as a work about China and hence foreign to those who were born and brought up in Malaya/Malaysia.

It would seem that as a Malaysian Chinese writer Fang believed that people expected him to write about local Chinese society. Therefore he planned to write another trilogy which was later called the Malaya Trilogy (马来亚三部曲). He wanted to write the history of evolution of Chinese Malaysians from migrants to citizens. Fang Beifang stated his objectives of writing the above trilogy as follows: "After completing the trilogy on the anti-Japanese War in China, I realize that I have lived in Malaysia for more than 50 years, from youth to old age and from a foreigner to a citizen. I have special feelings for this land, and hope that through literary writing, I as a citizen, together with other citizens, will be able to contribute to nation-building. I will tell the story of the Chinese participation in opening up this land and developing this country...."

In fact, the second volume of the Malaya Trilogy, Under the Towkay (头家门下), which was also entitled Healthy Branches Produce Good Leaves (枝荣叶茂), came out first. The first volume, entitled Big Tree Has Deep Roots (树大根深) was only published in 1980, and the last volume, Flowers Fly and Fruits Fall (花飘果坠), was published in 1994. In other words, the span from writing to publication of this trilogy was 14 years. The first volume, Big Tree has Deep Roots, tells the story of a migrant called Hua Ren and his sons in Malaysia. The second volume is a history of the fictitious Shi family in Malaya, its ups and downs, and its involvement in Chinese education, while the third volume tells the story of the Chinese community's struggle in Malaya/Malaysia. Some critics have argued that of these three novels, his first, Big Tree has Deep Roots, is quite a successful narrative of the Chinese migrants and their struggles, while the third volume which includes a lot of statements and propaganda is the weakest.

Fang Beifang, considered a pioneer of Malaysian Chinese literature, received a lot of praise from his own generation, especially the followers of literary realism. However, some Malayan Chinese scholars of the younger generation who rejected literary realism have criticized him for preaching his moral values and spreading political propaganda rather than writing literary works.

The 1970s and 1980s, were the golden years for Fang Beifang. He was elected the deputy vice-president of Malaysian Chinese Writers Association (1978–80), and served two terms as of its President from 1980–84. In November1989 Fang was awarded the First Malaysian Chinese Literary Award, and in 1998 the ASEAN Literary Award. In his 40 years of writing career, Fang produced 31 books which included novels, collections of short stories, essays, commentaries and others. He died on 11 November 2007. To commemorate his contributions to Malaysian literature, the Malaysian Chinese Writers Association decided to reissue his complete works. This giant project was completed and published in 16 volumes in 2009.

Fang Xiu

Literary pioneer, Singapore

The greatest contribution Fang Xiu made is his effort of documenting literary works written in vernacular Chinese in Singapore and Malaysia from the early twentieth century to the early years of independence. An amateur scholar but a devotee of literature, Fang dedicated his whole life enthusiastically to accounting for what happened in Singapore and Malaysian Chinese literature and the literary community. While critics have posed scepticism about his ideological inclination, few get close to him in providing a better understanding of how Singapore and Malaysian Chinese literature evolved in its early stage.

Fang Xiu's actual name is Wu Zhiguang (Goh Tze Kwang, 吴之光). His other pen names include Guan Zhi (观止) and Ren Xin (任辛). He was born on 9 February 1922 in Chaoan, a Teochew speaking county in Guangdong, where he attended primary and secondary schools as well as received training as a teacher. He followed his mother in moving southward from China and joined his father in 1939 in Kuala Lumpur, where he subsequently worked in grocery shops, rubber factories, and western wine shops. The year 1941 marked his first entry into the local Chinese cultural reproduction industry when he worked for the Xin Guomin Daily News《新国民日报》as a proofreader and a night-shift editor.

When Japanese troops invaded the Malayan Peninsula, Fang Xiu fled to Singapore together with his friends. In January 1941, he joined a training class for young cadres conducted by the Wartime Working Organization of the Singapore Chinese Cultural Circle. After the fall of Singapore to the Japanese army, he returned to Kuala Lumpur. After the Japanese Occupation, he became a reporter for two newspapers based in Kuala Lumpur, Minsheng Bao《民声报》and Zhonghua Wanbao《中华晚报》in 1945 and 1946, respectively. He then left Kuala Lumpur again and taught in a few primary schools in Johor and Singapore.

He landed a stable job in 1951 when he was appointed editor of a major Chinese newspaper based in Singapore, Sin Chew Jit Poh, for which he also oversaw the weekly issues. In 1956, he was promoted to chief editor for news about Malaya. He consecutively took care of such literary and cultural supplements as Wenyi《文艺), Xingqi Xiaoshuo《星期小说》, Qingnian Zhishi《青年知识》, and Wenhua《文化》. He retired from the newspaper in 1978.

From 1966 to 1978, Fang Xiu taught at the University of Singapore as an adjunct lecturer, offering courses on Mahua (Malayan/Malaysian Chinese) literature, modern Chinese literature, and studies of Lu Xun. After he retired from the newspaper and his teaching assignments, his passion for literature continued, and he churned out many publications on Singapore and Malaysian Chinese literature. In 1997, he founded the Tropical Literary and Arts Club (热带文学艺术俱乐部) and served as an adviser to the club for many years.

Fang Xiu is most admired for his enduring determination to dig up and sort out historical materials of Malaysian and Singapore Chinese literature. The results are important compilations of literary works. His ten volumes of A Comprehensive Anthology of Modern Malaysian Chinese literature《马华新文学大系》 was a painstaking project done entirely on his own, which turned out to be a work of great value for reference in the study of Chinese literature in Southeast Asia. Also remarkable are his six volumes of A Comprehensive Anthology of Postwar Modern Malaysian Chinese literature《战后新马文学大系》. Other anthologies include Selected Works of Modern Malaysian Chinese Literature《马华新文学选集》.The original editions of these voluminous compilations were published from the early 1960s to the early 1980s.

In addition to the documentation of literary works, Fang Xiu also published works on the history of Malaysian and Singapore Chinese literature. Useful as a starting point for access to the subject are his A Draft of the History of Modern Malaysian Chinese Literature《马华新文学史稿》(1965, 1976), The Evolution of Malaysian Chinese Literary Trends《马华文艺思潮的演变》(1970), and Modern Malaysian Chinese Literature and Its Historical Outline《马华新文学及其历史轮廓》(1974).

Besides observing and studying the literature, Fang Xiu produced creative writings as well in many genres. The anthologies of his proses and essays include The Light Dirt《轻尘集》, Smoke from the Stove《炉烟集》(1977), and A Long Night《长夜集》(1973). He wrote both classical and modern poetry. Small Poems in Multiple Chambers《重楼小诗》(1998) is an anthology featuring sixty-nine poems that he wrote over five decades — from 1948 to 1997.

He passed away in Singapore on 4 March 2010. After his death, there have been many essays in newspapers about his contribution, and also academic discussions about his works. He is remembered as a literary pioneer who shaped significantly the understanding of how Chinese literature has reoriented from China to Malaysia and Singapore, and evolved across various ideologies.

Fann Wong

(Fann Woon Fong, 范文芳, Fan Wenfang, 1971–)

Model, singer, actress, Singapore

Fann Wong is the stage name of Fann Woon Fang (范文[雯]芳) is a leading Singapore actress who has gone international. She was born on 27 January 1971 in Singapore, the second daughter of Fann Chin Khew and Wong Siew Toy, both tailors. 'Fann Wong' is a combination of the surnames of both her parents. Fann was educated at Temasek Secondary School and then at a private school. After completing her GCE 'A' level examinations, she enrolled in LaSalle International Fashion School where she earned a diploma in fashion merchandising.

At the age of 16, Fann won a beauty contest organized by Her World magazine and thus kick-started a successful modelling career. She modelled part-time first for Imp Agency (which closed down), and then Carrie's, while still studying. Carrie's was responsible for securing her a modelling contract for an Oil of Ulan commercial which was aired in both Singapore and Taiwan, and this proved to be her big break. PT Models, a large Taiwanese modelling agency spotted her and engaged her to model up to 80 dresses a day for catalogues. In 1993, she moved to Taiwan.

In 1994, Fann returned to Singapore, signed up as a full time TCS (Television Corporation of Singapore) artiste and starred in her first local drama series, Dreams Come True (美梦成真). This was quickly followed by lead roles in The Challenger (勇者无惧), and Chronicle of Life (缘尽今生). At the Star Awards in 1995 Fann became the first actress to win both the Best Actress and Best Newcomer awards in the same year. In 1996, Fann released her first album, Fanntasy which featured the theme song of her TV drama, Brave New World which was a duet with Taiwanese singer Jeff Chang. The album was later repackaged for the Taiwanese market as I Live Alone (一个人生活) and it won four IFPI (International Federation of the Phonographic Industry) sales awards in Taiwan. It sold more than 500,000 copies.

In 1996, controversy broke out when PT Models of Taiwan accused Fann of breaching their contract when she signed on with TCS. The six-year contract, signed in 1993, gave the modelling agency rights over Fann's appearances in all film productions, sound recordings or any entertainment-related activity in Taiwan. The dispute was settled amicably in January 1997 and Fann returned from a TCS-imposed suspension to resume her acting career.

Fann's regional reputation was sealed with the 1998 release of her hit wuxia drama The Return of the Condor Heroes (神雕侠侣) and of her second album, Shopping (逛街). The music video of Shopping so impressed Hong Kong director Derek Yee that he flew to Singapore to cast Fann as the lead in his art film, The Truth About Jane and Sam (真心话). The Hong Kong produced movie topped the Singapore box office for three weeks and she was nominated as Best New Performer at the 19th Hong Kong Film Awards.

Her third album, Missing You (想你) was released in 1999. This was quickly followed by No Problem (没有问题) in 2000. In the meantime, Fann recorded Private Number with British boy band 911 and also performed Moments of Magic, Singapore's official millennium song. In 2000, Fann became the first Singapore singer to hold a solo concert at the Singapore Indoor Stadium. That year, she stunned everyone by winning Mediacorp's Special Achievement Award at the annual Star Awards since the award is usually reserved for veterans.

In 2002, Fann became the first Singaporean actress to play a major role in a Hollywood move. She starred as Chon Lin in the movie, Shanghai Knights which starred Hong Kong star Jackie Chan. When the movie was released in 2003, critics were full of praise for Fann's acting. Fann has starred in numerous drama series and films both in Singapore and abroad. For example, the serials A Romance in Shanghai was produced in Shanghai, while Wild Orchids was filmed in Sydney, and Brave New World in Amsterdam and Belgium.

Fann has scored many firsts in her career. In late 2004, she released her first publication, a semi-autobiographical comic book entitled Girl Illustrated (笔芳说) the first local artiste to do so. In August 2005, she became the first local actress to do a voiceover for Singapore's first 3D animation film, Zodiac: The Race Begins. In 2007, she became the first Singaporean artiste to release a self-illustrated 3G animation titled Fanntasy World. Such was Fann's popularity that in 2003, she was engaged by Tourism Queensland as its ambassador.

Since 2002, she had been romantically linked with Malaysian actor, Christopher Lee. They have collaborated on eight occasions and in 2009, they starred in The Wedding Game (大囍事) as a celebrity couple who fake their romance and marriage just to boost their careers. The comedy won the best feature film at the 1st international comedy film festival in Thailand.

The couple married on 29 September 2009 in the glittering celebrity-studded wedding at the Shangri-la Hotel in Singapore. Fann turned up in a $300,000 Bollywood-inspired gown while Lee was togged out and styled by Italian label Ermenegildo Zegna. Another wedding ceremony was held in Lee's hometown of Malacca in October 2009. Fann's hobbies include illustrating comics, gastronomy and shopping.

Fong Chong Pik

(方壮壁, Fang Zhuangbi, 1926–2004)
Key Malayan Communist Party leader, Singapore

Fong Chong Pik was a key Malayan Communist Party (MCP) operative in Singapore nicknamed 'The Plen'.

Fong Chong Pik was born in China in 1926 in a village near Swatow (汕头), Guangdong Province, and came to Singapore with his mother and his elder brother in 1932 to escape the communists. Little else is known about his family. They settled in the Teochew-dominated Upper Bukit Timah area and he studied at Seh Chuan (树群) School in Jalan Jurong Kechil where he showed himself to be an excellent student. Indeed, his principal, Lu Jia Shu was so impressed by Fong that he personally took him to Chinese High School (the premier Chinese-language boys' school in Singapore) for enrolment. He entered Chinese High School in 1939 and immediately demonstrated his academic and sporting prowess. However, he nearly dropped out of school on several occasions due to financial difficulties. His education was interrupted by the Japanese Occupation in 1942.

Fong did not do much during the Occupation, but assisted his father in going to disused rubber plantations to plant crops like sweet potatoes and tapioca for subsistence. He also did odd jobs at a Japanese factory. When civilian rule was restored in 1946, Fong re-enrolled in Chinese High School — which had set up temporary premises in the Singapore Kindergarten in Tras Street. Two months later, he was forced to withdraw because of financial difficulties and found work at the Orphan Centre at Mount Emily. Having saved a little money, he returned to school but left a month later to work at Lee Kong Chian's Nam Aik Rubber Factory, having obtained the job at the recommendation of his school principal Xue Yongshu (薛永黍). In 1947, Fong was determined to return to school to finish his education. He managed to remain in school till the end of the year and graduated with a Senior Middle Three certificate. In the meantime, he took an active part in school life, establishing a students' cooperative with a few of his classmates and being elected President of the cooperative. He also became the foremost middle-distance runner in school, winning the 800m, 1500m and 3000m events. He was even All-Malaya champion in the 1500m.

It was at Chinese High School that Fong began reading the works of Marx, Sun Yat Sen, and modern Chinese authors like Lu Xun, Guo Moruo, Mao Dun, Ba Jin and Lao She. He found their writings inspiring and given his difficult financial situation, he was already veering to the left in his political thinking. The arrest of some teachers of the school by the Malayan Special Branch in 1946 for anti-colonial activities hardened his political thinking.

After leaving school, Fong remained at Chinese High School as Discipline Officer. He left in 1948 to become a teacher at Sin Min Primary School where he took charge of physical education. As his job was not terribly demanding, Fong decided to improve his English by enrolling in an English school. Through a friend, he was introduced to Canon Adams, principal of St Andrew's School, who put him in Standard 8, one of the higher classes. Fong did well, topping the class in Mathematics and Scripture, scoring distinctions in History and Geography but achieving only an 'average' grade for English.

Fong was never to finish his English education as he was invited to join the Nan Chiau Jit Poh (南侨日报) by his former teacher, Chu Chi Chok, at the end of 1949.

This left-leaning Chinese daily was reputedly controlled by the radical China Democratic League. It was while working at the newspaper that he first met Eu Chooi Yip a member of the Malayan Communist Party's (MCP's) Singapore Town Committee and who would later become the MCP's main operative in Singapore. Eu had been hired by the paper as a translator, and subsequently became Fong's contact with the communist underground. Fong, who was, by now, fiercely anti-colonial, was a willing and ready recruit of the communist-led Anti-British League (ABL) which had already singled him out as a 'candidate for development'. By this time, the British were already suspicious of Fong and in 1948 arrested him for questioning.

Fong was initially told by Eu to translate War News of the Chinese Liberation Army into English for publication in the underground paper, Freedom News (自由报). He subsequently assumed full responsibility for the production of Freedom News. In September 1950, the authorities raided and shut down Nan Chiau Jit Poh but Fong evaded arrest and hid out in an attap hut in Lorong Tai Seng where he continued producing Freedom News. In early 1951, there was another raid and Fong once again escaped by jumping into a duck pond. The police offered a $2,000 reward for his arrest, along that of Eu ($5,000) and Lim Kean Chye (also $5,000).

Fong then rented a piece of land in the middle of Singapore island and pretended to be a chicken farmer. With him were his sister (Fung Yin Ching 方韵琴, who was later elected Assemblywoman), brother-in-law and nephew. There, he remained for several years, forging identity cards for MCP members. In the meantime, his superiors had been evacuated to the Riau Islands where they established a three-man Singapore Working Committee comprising Eu, Wong Meng Keong and Chiam Chong Chian to direct operations in Singapore. In 1957, Fong was summoned by his superiors to Moro Island, given full authority over all operations on the island and power to negotiate with Lee Kuan Yew, leader of the then-opposition left-wing People's Action Party (PAP). The plan was to work closely with the PAP and to share power when they won the forthcoming 1959 general elections.

The first of their four meetings took place sometime in March 1958, and the last, sometime in 1961. Lee wanted Fong to prove his credentials and challenged him to order Chang Yuen Tong of the Workers' Party to resign from the City Council as well as for the communists to withdraw support for the Parti Rakyat Singapore. Fong naively agreed, but the shrewd Lee kept the communists and pro-communists at bay, refusing to appoint any one of them to a cabinet post when the PAP swept to power and landslide victory in the 1959 polls. It was Lee who gave Fong the nom de plume, 'The Plen', short for 'Plenipotentiary'. By 1961, when Malaya's Prime Minister Tunku Abdul Rahman agreed to a merger with Singapore, the tables had been turned against the MCP and now, armed with the powerful Internal Security Act, the Internal Security Council proceeded to arrest and detain without trial all suspected communist leaders, activists and grassroots workers under Operation Coldstore (1963). All of the MCP's exposed cadres were systematically evacuated, and Fong escaped to Indonesia sometime in January or February 1963.

Little is known about what happened to Fong while he was in the Riau Islands, but in 1977, he managed to make his way to the Thai-Malaysia border where the MCP's armies were sequestered. There he joined the Special Force and within a year, transferred to the 12th Detachment, the largest MCP unit at the border. He was then known as Ah Tong or Lee Ping. In 1989, the Malaysian government signed the Haadyai Peace Agreement with the MCP, ending over 40 years of hostility. Fong then emerged from the jungles where he had been involved in guerrilla warfare and granted a series of interviews, urging the Singapore Government to allow former MCP members to return to Singapore.

Fong died in a Haatyai hospital on 6 February 2004 after losing a battle with cancer. He was survived by his wife, Zheng Hong Ying and son, Guan Shao Ping. Fong, who had been banned from entering Singapore since 1966, failed to realise his last dream of returning to Singapore as he refused to comply with the three conditions the Singapore Government insisted on.

Fong Swee Suan

(方水双, Fang Shuishuang, 1931–)
Trade unionist, politician, Singapore

Fong Swee Suan was a powerful left-wing anti-colonial trade unionist and politician and founder member of the Barisan Sosialis.

Fong Swee Suan was born on 27 October 1931 in Senggarang, near Batu Pahat in the state of Johor, Malaya. His grandparents and parents had come from China in search of a better future. In Senggarang, his elder brother and father operated a laundry shop while his mother leased a piece of land to grow gambier and other cash crops to supplement the family income. The family lived apart for some time, him with his mother, and his brother with his father. Fong thus regards his mother as the most important influence in his life, having taught him the right values and how to be a person of good character.

Fong attended the Chung Hwa Primary School but the onset of World War II meant that everything came to an abrupt halt. When the War ended, he resumed his studies and left the school in 1948. He then enrolled in the Chinese High School in Batu Pahat, but transferred to the Chinese High School in Singapore the following year. Among his classmates was Lim Chin Siong, with whom he worked closely to form the People's Action Party (PAP) and then the Barisan Sosialis (BS). During this time, the Chinese High School, just like Chung Cheng High School, was the hotbed of radical student activity. Fong took an active part in these activities — many of them communist-inspired and anti-colonial — and in 1951, organized and participated in the examination boycott. This led to his expulsion from school. He then enrolled in an English school while he found employment as a clerk in a shipping firm.

In 1952, Fong joined the Green Bus Company and became involved in trade union activities, getting himself elected as Secretary-General for the Bus Workers' Union in April 1954. That year, together with Lim Chin Siong and other trade unionists, Fong met Lee Kuan Yew for discussions on the formation of the People's Action Party (PAP). At the party's inauguration on 21 November 1954, Fong was elected a member of the Central Executive Committee. The PAP was seen as a fiercely anti-colonial, left-wing party and many of its members, including Fong and Lim Chin Siong were radical left-wing trade unionists who were experts at mass mobilization, especially among the Chinese-educated (who formed the bulk of the population). Lim and Fong expanded their spheres of influence by expanding their unions and amalgamating smaller unions and bringing them under their control. This invariably led to clashes with other trade unionists who were unsympathetic to the pair's left-wing socialist ideology and methods, as well as with employers.

In May 1955, Fong became involved in the tragic Hock Lee Bus riots that would forever be linked to his name. At the end of April 1955, a dispute concerning pay and working conditions had broken out between workers and management of Hock Lee Amalgamated Bus Company. The workers were all members of the Singapore Bus Workers' Union (SBWU) which was under Fong's control. To pressure the management into accepting the workers' demands, Fong declared an official strike at the bus company. To add further pressure on the management, Fong urged all other bus companies' workers to stage a sympathy strike if the dispute was not settled. On 29 April, thousands of Chinese middle school students then joined the strikers in support, providing them with food and entertainment. The following day, sympathy strikes were held throughout the island. On 9 May, negotiations between the management and SBWU broke down and the police were ordered to clear the picket lines for the buses to pass. Fire hoses were used to disperse the strikers. A riot broke out and this was supported by some 20 lorry loads of Chinese school students who were ferried to the scene. A mob of some 2,000 rioters attacked the police. In all, four persons died and 31 persons were injured in the three-day riots. By 13 May, order had been restored and on 14 May, the government arbitrator negotiated a settlement in which the bus company management had to reinstate the dismissed workers. Normal bus services resumed on 16 May.

Fong publicly apologized for the violence which got out of hand: 'We express our deep distress at the violence used against the buses of the Hock Lee Bus Company and the police.' He had always maintained that while his SBWU was certainly the instigator of the strikes, he did not expect that there would be such violence, and did not expect it to turn into a riot. On 11 June, Fong was arrested, along with the other union leaders held responsible for the strikes. They were released after 45 days in detention. Fong immediately returned to his trade union activities, his power in the unions, even greater than before. Numerous strikes continued to be organized. By now, he had brought his SBWU in alignment with Lim Chin Siong's Singapore Factory and Shop Workers' Union (SFSWU), becoming its Deputy Secretary-General in 1956. That year, he was also appointed vice-chairman of the Association of Workers' Singapore Industry. In this latter capacity, he led a seven-member delegation to meet Chief Minister Lim Yew Hock on 21 September 1956 to discuss the matter of the arrest of the Association's president, Lim Zhen Guo. Lim Yew Hock, who had by now lost patience with the left-wing unions, ordered Fong's arrest, along with those of Lim Chin Siong, Devan Nair, and some 200 others on 27 October. With this single stroke, the Chief Minister succeeded in smashing the leadership of the Middle Road Unions.

Fong remained in detention till 4 June 1959 when he was released after signing a joint-statement (along with James Puthucheary, Lim Chin Siong, Devan Nair and Sandra Woodhull) to support the PAP's 1958 policy statement, 'The New Phase after Merdeka: Our Tasks and Policy', and to commit to prioritizing nation-building in a multi-racial society over any 'socialist objective' and shunning the 'communal road'.

Like many of the left-wing trade unionists who had been detained by Lim Yew Hock, Fong was not trusted by the PAP's inner circle, who were convinced that both he and Lim Chin Siong were open front leaders of the Malayan Communist Party. He was thus not given a prominent role in the new PAP Government of 1959 but was instead appointed Political Secretary of the Ministry of Manpower and dispute secretary of the Trade Union Congress. The following year, after he publicly criticized his minister's labour policies, Fong was transferred to the office of the Deputy Prime Minister as Political Secretary.

By this time, the fissures within the PAP were showing and an attempt was made to unseat Lee Kuan Yew's government through a 'no confidence' vote. Thereafter, the 13 PAP Assembly men who were dismissed from their party formed the Barisan Sosialis (Socialist Front). Fong was then the Secretary-General of the Singapore Association of Trade Unions (SATU) and the adviser of many other unions. On 2 February 1963, in a massive security sweep codenamed Operation Coldstore, Fong was detained under the Internal Security Act, along with some 111 other trade unionists, left-wing activists and grassroots leaders.

As Fong was a Malaysian, he was sent to Kuala Lumpur for a short period of detention, and then to Muar Detention Centre where he remained till 25 August 1967 when he was released. While in detention, Fong completed both his GCE 'O' and 'A' level examinations. He then worked as an administrative assistant in a sugar factory in Kuala Lumpur before moving to Johor Baru in 1970 where he became branch manager for De Cheng Machinery Pte Ltd. At this time, he moved his family (who had remained in Singapore) to Johor Baru so that his children could continue attending school in Singapore.

In 1976, he established You Lian Machinery Pte Ltd and ran the business till he retired in 1996. In the meantime, Fong continued to study part time and obtained his Bachelor in Business Administration degree from Kensington University and then proceeded to complete an MBA and Ph.D. at the British West Indies St Clements University.

Fong moved back to Singapore in 1998 even though the ban on his entering Singapore had been lifted by 1990. He is married to fellow unionist, Chen Poh Cheng (who was known as the 'Black Peony' during her trade union days), and they have three children, Xiu Min, Yong Jin and Yong Zheng (Otto).

G

Gaisano, Henry

(施维鹏, Shi Weipeng, 1920–2004)
Entrepreneur, philanthropist, Philippines

Gaisano is a name quite well known in the southern parts of the Philippines. In Visayas and Mindanao, the Gaisano brothers and the Gaisano brand are acknowledged pioneers of the shopping mall business. Today, the businesses are operated entirely by second-generation Gaisanos who understand their fortune in having one another and working together to attain smooth and coordinated growth and success for every Gaisano.

Born on 21 May 1920, Henry Gaisano was the foremost member of the clan, the third son of Jose Sy Leng Kee, who was a Chinese from Long Hu Ya Kou, Jinjiang in Fujian, China. Sy married Doña Modesta Gaisano with whom he had eleven children — five boys, David, Stephen, Henry, Victor, and John, and six girls, Pian Pian, Kam Kam, Eng Eng, Yan Yan, Ching Ching, and Teng Teng.

The Gaisano empire began with a small store in Cebu City whose operations were interrupted by World War II. Soon after the war, the brothers set up White Gold Store, a retail outlet that carried an increasing array of merchandise. Henry Gaisano was in charge of daily operations and finance. When White Gold Store succeeded, the brothers decided to construct a five-storey building to house White Gold Department Store. It was the first multistorey department store in Cebu City. White Gold became the "go-to" place of every Cebuano living in and around the city capital. It carried everything one would need — clothing, houseware, kitchenware, appliances, toys, groceries, and in 1962, even a fine Chinese restaurant at the top floor of the building. White Gold Department Store was the concrete realization of the teachings of the family matriarch, Modesta Gaisano, who throughout her life emphasized the importance of family unity. She drummed into their consciousness that "united, you brothers could move mountains", and her children did work as one until the much larger number of second-generation Gaisanos were ready to take over.

Big though the department store became, the brothers stayed hands-on managers. Key positions in the company were not given to outsiders in the early years. All work and responsibilities were shared among the brothers. They worked day and night, taking turns to work at night — doing the inventory, restocking shelves, balancing the books, and even cleaning the aisles. The line of satisfied customers who returned to White Gold again and again proved that their concept of a department store was on the mark; it was also the precursor of the shopping mall concept where everyone's needs are in one place. This showed the foresight of the brothers. However, success did not come without trials. White Gold was burned down in 1974, but from the ruins, the brothers emerged stronger and more confident. Together, they reconstructed their business, even branching out to other provinces. This chain of establishments later emerged to be the Gaisano malls known throughout the south. The brothers also entered into the real estate business, banking, and finance.

Their collective efforts, coupled with their dedication and hard work, spelled magic. As Henry Gaisano often said, "the measure of your giving is the measure of your fortune" (量大福大). Although the five brothers handled the family businesses as a single family entity, it was Henry Gaisano who was renowned in the Chinese-Filipino community because of his ardent support of education. He believed that education was the only way to lift a person from poverty. With education, a person gains more self confidence, giving himself value, and recognizes his own value in the society. Hiding his identity behind the name "Cebu Anonymous (宿务无名氏)", he gave annual recognition and cash rewards to outstanding Chinese schoolteachers and principals. For seventeen years, he gave away more than 23 million pesos to almost 1,400 outstanding Chinese language teachers — a selfless act of generosity which he concealed (his identity was revealed the day he passed away). As Cebu Anonymous, he also supported the Chong Hua Hospital of Cebu City and the Chinese-Filipino volunteer fire brigade in Cebu. To him, maintaining anonymity in giving donations was the purest form of benevolence as it shows genuine concern for those in need and not a hankering for recognition. Out of love for their mother, the brothers set up the Modesta Gaisano Scholarship Foundation, which provides scholarship grants to deserving students to go to university. It is one of the most prestigious scholarship grants in Cebu City and one of the longest-running in the country. Now in its fifty-sixth year, it is ably run by the younger Gaisanos with Joseph Gaisano as chairman.

Influenced by their mother, the Gaisano brothers developed a strong passion for traditional arts and culture, such as calligraphy, painting, carving, classical literature and even horticulture. Henry Gaisano's exposure to the classics made him a good finance manager as he applied what he read in real life situations.

In 1981 the brothers decided to go their separate ways after the death of their matriarch, but the teachings of Modesta Gaisano left a permanent impact on them. They stayed united even after the family businesses were split among the five brothers. The assets had been divided, but not their strength and power as a family, and the Gaisano empire grew even bigger after the division of the assets. They also ventured to Manila with their Isetan Department Stores.

Henry Gaisano died on 8 September 2004. Today, the businesses are operated entirely by second-generation Gaisanos. In addition to the stores in Manila and the mother stores in Cebu, one sees the Gaisano chains (Gaisano Department Store, White Gold Department Store, Isetan Department Store) everywhere in the south — Iloilo, Roxas, Kalibo, Bacolod, San Carlos, Ormoc, Davao, Cagayan De Oro, and Ozamiz. The Gaisano descendants understand their forture in having one another and working together to achieve smooth and coordinated growth and success for every one of them.

Gan Say Hong

(颜世芳, Yan Shifang, 1890–1956)
Community leader, banker, Singapore

Gan Say Hong made a significant contribution to the Chinese community in Singapore and beyond, and yet not much has been written about him. In fact, he was a founding member of both the Tung Ann (Tong An) Association (Singapore) and the OCBC Bank, and a leading trustee of the Thong Chai (Tong Ji 同济) Medical Institution in Singapore, known as Tong Ji Yi Yuan (同济医院) in Mandarin.

Gan was born in 1890 (one source says 1887) in Shuang Zhen Tou (双圳头) in Tong An (同安, also spelt "Tung Ann") county, Fujian province. He later moved to the downtown area of Tong An. There is not much else known about his early life in China.

In 1908, at the age of eighteen, he sailed to Singapore and worked in a local commercial firm. Several years later, he set up the Ho Seng Company and, in 1926, the Khiam Bee & Co., both of which did traditional import and export business in commodities. Gan gradually excelled himself in the commercial sector and later entered the banking world where he, in the early 1930s, served as director of the Chinese Commercial Bank (CCB) in Singapore, prior to its merger with two other Chinese banks.

In 1932, the CCB, established in 1912, the Ho Hong Bank (HHB), set up in 1917, and the Oversea-Chinese Bank (OCB), founded in 1919, were merged into a new bank, the Oversea-Chinese Bank Corporation (OCBC). Gan, who was then the director of the CCB, played an important role in the merger. Most members of the first board of directors of the OCBC were from the CCB, viz. Cheok Cheng Lee, Lee Kong Chian, Yap Twee, Wong Siew Qui, Gan Say Hong, and Lim Keng Lian. Gan was not only a founding director of the Oversea-Chinese Banking Corporation but he also remained as a director until his death in 1956. From 1933 onwards Gan was also elected a director of the pre-war Singapore Chinese Chamber of Commerce, representing the Hokkien clan. (The Hokkien clan had twelve directors; Gan was one of the long serving directors.) He remained a director until 1941, before the Japanese invasion.

Like many leading Chinese businessmen in the past, Gan was also active in community service. In 1929 on his initiative, he and other clan members established the Tung Ann Association into which he put much of his money and effort. He was later elected the fourth president of the association where he continued to be active until after World War II. Equally important was his involvement in the Thong Chai Medical Institution in Singapore where he served as the leader of the board of trustees between 1932 and 1942. From 1943 until 1957 when he died, he remained a trustee; his name was listed in the second or third, rather than the first position. But he never served as treasurer or president of Thong Chai as indicated in Ke Mulin's Chinese Historical Figures in Singapore 《新华历史人物列传》. Thong Chai Medical Institution, first established in 1892 with the goal of helping poor Chinese patients, is one of the oldest Chinese hospitals in Singapore using Traditional Chinese Medicine (TCM).

Gan was also active in the educational service in Singapore. He was the major sponsor of the Chinese Girls High School (Zhonghua Nuzi Zhongxue 中华女子中学). During the 1930s, he served as chairman of its school council until the Japanese Occupation. After the Japanese surrender, Gan formed a committee to rebuild the Chinese Girls High School as it was bombarded during the war. He was closely associated with the school and remained active as its chairman until his death.

Similar to other first generation Chinese migrants in Singapore, Gan was concerned with the well-being of China, particularly his birthplace. During the anti-Japanese war in 1937, Gan, as president of the Tung Ann Association in Singapore, participated actively in the war of resistance against the Japanese. On 10 May 1938 when Xiamen fell to the Japanese, the Singapore Tung Ann Association organized the Save the Homeland Refugees Committee. Gan, as the elected chairman, began "the Overseas Kinsmen Active Donation" drive to save the refugees in his homeland.

He also played a part in the fund raising campaign for the war of resistance in China led by Tan Kah Kee in the Ee Hoe Hean Club (Yi He Xuan 怡和轩). In 1937 Tan became the chairman of five committees. One of them was the Sing Hwa Fund-Raising Committee which consisted of thirty-two respected members, including Gan, who put in both money and effort.

Gan was equally enthusiastic in promoting public welfare in his homeland in China. In 1933, he initiated the repair of the Gan ancestral temple in Front Street in Tong An county; built a primary school in his ancestral home in An Loo village; and assisted in founding the Tong Min Hospital, also in Tong An county.

For the respect he commanded in Chinese society, as well as for his contributions to the colonial society in Singapore, Gan was made a Justice of the Peace (JP) by the colonial government. He died on 6 September 1956 in Singapore, leaving eight children: six sons and two daughters.

Gautama, Sudargo

(Gouw Giok Siong, 吴玉祥, Wu Yuxiang, 1928–2008)

Professor of Law, prominent advocate, Indonesia

Sudargo Gautama was the longest serving professor of law at the University of Indonesia who concurrently held professorship at the two other educational institutions in Indonesia. He also wrote the first dissertation on regulations relating to mixed marriages in Indonesian which attracted a lot of attention.

Known as Gouw Giok Siong before the name-changing regulation in 1966, Gautama was born in Jakarta on 1 March 1928. He started his law studies in mid-1947 at Rechtshogeschool, which later became the Faculty of Law, University of Indonesia (FHUI). He completed his studies on 18 December 1950 thus obtaining the title Mr (meester in de rechten or master of laws) within three-and-a-half years in what normally would have been a five-year study. He immediately embarked on his doctorate studies at the same university and obtained the title Dr (doctor in law) in 1955. His dissertation "Legal Aspects of Mixed Marriage Regulations" (Segi-segi Hukum Peraturan Perkawinan Campuran) attracted the attention of not only the foreign legal scholars, but also foreign linguistic scholars, especially those of the Van Vollenhoven Institute of Leiden University in the Netherlands. This was so because it was the first ever law dissertation written in Indonesian. The dissertation aroused interest for the former legal scholars because it discussed mixed marriages after Indonesia's independence, and for the foreign linguistic scholars because it was expected to contribute to the translation, or perhaps even transformation, of Dutch legal concepts into the language of the new-born Republic.

Gautama's contributions as a legal scholar are enormous. They began with a series of talks broadcast in Programa III Radio Republik Indonesia, a government-owned and controlled radio station, from 25 May to 28 September 1955. These talks were mainly on constitutional law, with an emphasis on the idea of Rechtsstaat. On the one hand they aimed at educating and enlightening the general public on the foundations of the new-born Republic, and on the other hand they were designed to promote public participation in the upcoming general election to be held on the day following his final talk.

Professor Djokosoetono, the first dean of the FHUI, appointed Gautama as professor of law responsible for inter-population-group law (intergentielrecht or hukum antar golongan), replacing the former professor and promoter, G. J. Resink. Thus on 27 September 1958, Gautama delivered his inaugural speech at the age of thirty. He would retain this position until he passed away in 2008, with a tenure spanning fifty years. It made him not only one of the youngest professors in the country to date, but also one who held the professorship longest. Besides being a professor at FHUI he was also a professor in law at the National Police Institute (Perguruan Tinggi Ilmu Kepolisian), the Military School of Law (Perguruan Tinggi Hukum Militer), both in Jakarta, and at the Padjadjaran University in Bandung, West Java. He was also a visiting professor at the University of Amsterdam (1967–1968), the University of Sydney (1970), and the National University of Singapore.

A professor is responsible for developing his field of expertise, and Gautama carried out that duty proficiently. When he was studying law, most of his professors were Dutch and most, if not all, of the subjects were taught in Dutch. However, independence for Indonesia brought about changes not only in the use of Indonesian instead of Dutch, but also in opening up opportunities to Indonesians from all walks of life to become educated. Knowing that his students were no longer trained in Dutch and therefore did not have a good command of the Dutch language, he wrote textbooks in the Indonesian language in his field of expertise, which he later referred to as hukum antar tata hukum (interlegal law). The textbooks were later compiled into a series of eight books, titled Hukum Perdata Internasional Indonesia (Indonesian Private International Law) which may be considered as his magnum opus as a legal scholar. This work contains not only his rich scholarship, but is also the underpinnings of legal science in Indonesia, especially in the field of private international law. The legal theories and frameworks developed by him in these books were later adopted by the National Legal Development Body (Badan Pembinaan Hukum Nasional) when it drafted the Bill of Private International Law for Indonesia in the 1980s and 1990s. The bill unfortunately has been delayed indefinitely.

In envisioning the development of law and legal science in Indonesia, Gautama introduced the term, Hukum Antar Tata Hukum, or HATAH. According to him, this term was derived from the term "Interlegal Law" introduced by English legal scholar, Alf Ross, and the term "Interrechts-ordensrecht", proposed by his own Professor, J. H. A. Logemann. This term clearly states that all legal systems in the young Republic are of equal importance, and the applicability of one legal system over that of another is based on the pursuit of justice and not on its superiority. In doing so, Gautama did not only contribute to the ongoing search for a national legal system, but also injected neutrality into sensitive social issues in post-colonial Indonesia. He later divided HATAH, a branch of legal science, into two strains. The external one has a foreign element and is comparable to private international law or conflict of laws in most countries. The internal one deals with legal issues that are uniquely Indonesian owing to its continuing legal pluralism.

By the time of his death, he may well have written more than 100 works on Indonesian law covering issues from mixed marriage, citizenship, nationalization, contract law, agrarian law, commentaries on landmark court decisions and legislation, intellectual property rights, arbitration and international trade, to corporate law. An Introduction to Indonesian Law, which he co-authored with Robert Hornick, was the first textbook in English on Indonesian law. It was published initially as a temporary edition in 1972, and later revised four times until 1983.

Gautama was also prominent as an advocate. He started his law practice by joining the law office of Professor Iwa Kusumasumantri and Mr A. A. Maramis. He later established his own law office in Jl. Merdeka Timur, Jakarta, a prestigious location for prominent advocates.

Since the beginning of his law practice, he had been a counsel for the Government of Indonesia. One of his famous cases was the "Bremen Tobacco Case", in which he defended the newly established state-owned Perusahaan Perkebunan Nusantara (PPN) Baru before a Bremen District Court in the then West Germany in 1958. PPN Baru took over the assets of two Dutch companies, Deli-Maatschappijen and Senembah-Maatschappij, whose tobacco plantations in East Sumatra had been nationalized by the Government in the previous year as a result of the rising tension over the protracted dispute between Indonesia and the Netherlands over West Papua. The act of nationalization did not conform to the norms then existing in international law, which required it to be followed by prompt, effective, and adequate compensations. The Dutch companies thus accused the Government of Indonesia of practically confiscating their properties. This case immediately attracted international attention, since this was the first act of nationalization by a former colony which came before a court in the West. Another interesting aspect of this case was that in defending Indonesia's position Gautama and his fellow members of the team of experts such as Professor Soekanto and Mochtar Kusumaatmadja, among others, were arguing against Professors Kollewijn, Lemaire, and Logemann, their former professors at FHUI. The Bremen District Court later found the nationalization move lawful, thus revising the norms of international law on nationalization.

Gautama was later involved, both as a legal counsel and a legal expert, in many other legal cases where the Government of Indonesia became a party or a respondent. Three famous cases (during the Soeharto rule) were the Kartika Thaher case involving the Indonesian State Oil Company which came before the Singapore court, the nationalization of Kartika Plaza Hotel, and the dispute between the Indonesian State Oil Company/State Electricity Company and the Karaha Bodas Company, the latter two being brought before international arbitration tribunals. Recounting his experience as an expert witness to his teaching assistants at FHUI, Gautama once said, "The loneliest place on earth is at the witness stand".

Gautama continued practising law and law teaching until he passed away on 8 September 2008 at the age of 80 in Perth, Western Australia where he had spent most of his final years, which probably explains why his passing received minimal attention from the media.

Go Ching Hai

(吴清海, Wu Qinghai, 1924-2011)
Engineer, inventor, Philippines

When Go Ching Hai was born on 8 June 1924, he was said to be quiet for a few minutes before breaking into a loud, reverberating cry, to the merriment of his parents and every household member. When he turned three, his father decided to move his family to the Philippines sometime in 1927 to settle in a small town called Matatalaib, Tarlac, and set up a small rice mill for the Cojuangco clan. A few years later, the family moved back to China. When the father died, the family resettled in the Philippines. Go Ching Hai was thirteen at the time.

When his older siblings got married, Go was left to fend for his widowed mother and younger siblings. He sought ways and worked in several odd jobs to make ends meet. He soon invented an alternative fuel for steam engines using coconut charcoal. Subsequently, he embarked on other profitable enterprises which came in quick succession to provide enough income to embark on more significant projects, such as running a paper factory, and manufacturing a thread spinner, an ice cream maker called Velvete and a dishwashing detergent similar to the modern-day household cleaning powder.

When the Americans liberated the Philippines from the Japanese, life went back to normal for Go. At age twenty-one, he decided to go back to university to devour books especially those on Confucius, which he read with great enthusiasm. It was Confucius who made him realize that "to live is to keep on dreaming".

He dreamt of a better life, and to realize that dream, he needed to earn and save money. To save on jeepney fare, he walked almost three kilometres from home to school and vice versa. He slept less so he could work more, or think of more and alternative solutions to a particular problem.

Go obtained a bachelor of science degree in mechanical engineering from the Mapua Institute of Technology in Manila. In 1950, shortly after graduation, he moved to Cebu with only 25 pesos in his pocket. He decided to stay in the house of a relative's and sought employment in an upstart company named Gotao Corn Mill. His main task there was to increase corn production, a challenge that Go Ching Hai faced with enthusiasm much to the satisfaction of his employer.

As an inventor, he was restless and prodigious. He never cared to patent any of his inventions as he wanted people to enjoy the fruits of his inventions and innovations.

His inventions started with machinery that dealt with corn products. In the beginning, he made a machine that ground corn kernels into a rice-like consistency. The harsh taste of the corn-rice induced him to invent a machine to improve the taste — the degerminator — which is now a vital piece of equipment in corn milling. It peels off the waxy coating of each corn kernel. Another invention of his was the aspirator. He found that when the waxy peel was removed, the germ or corn oil remained intact. The aspirator would then separate the corn by-products into three different layers from big grits to smaller grits to finer grits. These different grades are then sold for different uses, for example, the corn germ for making corn oil and the corn bran for feed additives.

Another innovation is something so simple that corn millers often remark the equipment is taken for granted. Go created a "bagger" for all the equipment and their variations. With one push of a button, a machine releases 50 kilograms of corn grits or cassava starch directly into a sack that also gets mechanically sewn up. Prior to this innovation, a corn miller had to hire six people to shovel, bag, weigh the product, and sew up the sack.

Corn millers from Aparri to Jolo (from the northern tip to the southern tip of the Philippine archipelago) would call on Go to build their factories. Millers, in particular, request for his "turn-key" procedure, where he would install a "turn-key" to make the machine produce only a certain amount of grain or corn per eight-hour run. This is important for millers because their budgets are quite fluid. When there is a lot of corn, millers simply turn a key and the machines come out with 800 cavans (50 kg. bags) every day. If there is a limited budget, the turn-key will make the machine produce only 200 cavans in eight hours. The turn-key enables millers to adjust their production levels without buying other equipment.

As a testament to Go's enduring inventions, the machinery he had invented in the 1950s and 1960s are still operational today. Some millers recount that Go's equipment was made so sturdy, e.g. a roller mill (which grinds corn kernels) can be dropped from three storeys high and only the cement ground would be damaged.

One major invention and the only one for which Go got a patent was the MV Martina, named after his wife. This is the predecessor to today's "roll-on roll-off" barge. The MV Martina was borne out of a challenge from friends to provide a solution to the problem of transporting vehicles across the Mandaue-Mactan channel in 1968, when the now famous Mactan-Cebu bridge was not yet in existence. It became an overnight favourite as the MV Martina was more than a superbarge. Not many know that it was due to the genius of Go that it came into being. Go was sketching on a piece of table napkin the blueprint for the barge, displaying his ingenuity with marine engineering. He designed the barge with two openings with a view to saving time and effort in moving the vessel, as well as unloading cargoes. For at least five years MV Martina was the only superbarge around.

Today, the roll-on roll-off barge, more popularly known as RORO, has made public transportation between regions easy. Prior to the popularization of the RORO, passengers needed to wait for days on end to find a boat travelling to their destination. Now, buses regularly ply routes across the vast Philippine archipelago. All that the buses have to do is get on a RORO to cross the various seas connecting the Philippine islands.

Inventing and seeking solutions were Go's lifelong passions. He established Hayco Engineering on a 1,256 square metre lot in Cebu City on 8 June 1950. Hayco Engineering used to design and build machineries for business clients all over the country. At present it only caters to the needs of other Hayco businesses maintaining the same quality of workmanship as that in the days when Go ran the business himself.

Being open to the possibilities of technological advancement, the company constantly kept itself abreast of industrial developments and market needs. In 1991, motivated by the need to be of greater service to the food industry and backed by its forty-year experience, Hayco Engineering started to diversify into other business ventures, such as food manufacturing via a new company called Geltech Hayco Inc. which has two production plants located in Cebu, Philippines.

Go had long been convinced about the value of soy as a versatile and nutritious food source. Inspired by his mother's ingenuity and resourcefulness in the preparation of dishes based on soybean especially during periods of scarcity, Go oversaw the production of soy-based food products through Geltech Hayco. In 1995, together with his wife and family, he introduced Meat Magic, an all-natural, protein-rich meat alternative based on soybeans and carageenan. Meat Magic, according to Go, helped prevent obesity, and kept high cholesterol at bay. It earned distinction in the 2005 Likha National Invention Contest for "Outstanding Creative Research by a Private Sector in Food and Nutrition". Go Ching Hai's genius, resourcefulness, and proactivity has extended to his family members who share a similar passion for seeking solutions to practically anything where no solutions supposedly exist.

Go's wife, Martina, synergized with him in almost anything he started or thought of doing. The couple appointed themselves "P1-a-year" supervisors in the construction of an edifice called the Cebu International Convention Center. Despite scepticism from the public, they saw the completion of the Convention Center on 1 December 2006, including the landscape within the compound, the surrounding centre islands, lights, and thirty flagpoles to be used during international summits. Since then Mandaue City and Lapu-lapu City have been welcoming summit delegates to ASEAN conventions.

In 2001 Go established the Go Ching Hai Foundation which aim at encouraging research and development to reduce poverty, helping the poor develop a sense of health awareness, providing education and livelihood training, and feeding the poor with nutritious and affordable food such as Go's pre-sweetened milk, high-protein soya-based rice topping, and corn grits and iodized salt.

Throughout his life, Go maintained one philosophy, "I only think of people and their welfare, of things that will make them happy and prosperous. When they are happy, I'm happy I benefit from their prosperity, too. If you are surrounded by poor people, how can you be happy." Go passed away on 7 September 2011.

Go, Josiah Lim

(1962–)
Marketing guru, Philippines

Born on 22 April 1962, Josiah Go (吳) is acknowledged as one of the Philippines' marketing gurus. He has his hands full not only as a marketing practitioner, but also as marketing educator, consultant, author, marketing resource speaker, lecturer, and trainer, and is a hands-on entrepreneur as well.

The year is 1991. A room is filled with enthusiastic chatter: marketing strategies, consumer behaviour, new products, new ideas. Grey-haired men in suits are giving out their calling cards. Women are shaking hands with former colleagues. It is a confluence of ideas and experience about marketing. Men and women with decades of experience in this field are exchanging insights about their ventures. Above the din of the crowd, a man tests the microphone and addresses everyone. He was a young man, so young that some of those in the crowd have been working in marketing even before he was born. And yet, at twenty eight, he had earned their respect. The man was Josiah Go, then, the youngest national president of the Philippine Marketing Association.

It was always clear that Josiah Go was to revel in the world of business. He graduated with a bachelor of science management degree from the De La Salle University in 1982, with a gold medal for community leadership. After earning his degree, he entered the corporate world. Having chosen to join one of the top thirty corporations of the Philippines, he was learning the ropes of business from experts of the field. However, his thirst for more challenges was barely quenched by this comfortable career path. He was determined to tread off the beaten path and make his own trail. The knowledge culled from the usual business career was not enough for him.

Propelled with the zest to learn, he ploughed through the available resource of marketing books in the country. But while reading all these materials, he realized that many of the ideas, case studies, and models presented in these books fitted only a specific context. They were not so reliable for, and suited to the Philippine experience. Inspired to share his own ideas that were culled from his experience and understanding of the Philippine market, Go decided to write his own books. At a time when little attention was given to nuances of the Philippine market, here was Josiah Go, proclaiming new ideas about how marketing worked in the country. This was a feat. Fortunately for him, his books were received positively. His ideas proved to be so valuable and insightful that several other marketing books were written and published.

As a further testament to the books' innovation and credibility, Go's books were endorsed by the Philippine Marketing Association and also supported by the Association of Marketing Educators. His fifth book, Marketing Plan Building the Profitable Preferred Brand published in 1997, is the first pre-tested, local marketing plan workbook.

Books were not his only platform for sharing his ideas. He served as a marketing professor at the Ateneo de Manila University, imparting his marketing ideas and innovations. His effectiveness as an educator was affirmed when he served a three-year stint as director for marketing programme. It was not a surprise either that he chose to return to his alma mater as a professorial guest lecturer at the undergraduate and, later, graduate school of De La Salle University.

An innovator at heart, Go knew that he must personally expand his own horizons to be updated on the changing market so he attended various advanced marketing and innovation courses at universities outside the country. He studied at Massachusetts Institute of Technology Sloan, the London Business School, University of Illinois in Chicago, Kellogg School at Northwestern University, Wharton Business School , the University of Marketing and Distribution Sciences in Japan, Blue Ocean Strategy — Initiative Centre in France, and New York, the United States. He has also earned the distinction of being the first Filipino to complete the Blue Ocean Strategy qualification course at INSEAD in France in 2006 and the first in Southeast Asia to teach it as a three-unit, full-semester course in the country.

To earn the esteem of colleagues and students, it is important that one practises what one teaches. This is what Josiah Go does by infusing his own business ventures with his own expertise. He is the chairman and chief marketing strategist of Mansmith and Fielders, Inc., the leading marketing, sales, and innovation training and consultancy company. Since 1995, he has also been serving as CEO of Waters Philippines, the market leader in the direct selling of home water purifiers, ion cleanse foot detox, and therapy shower in the Philippines.

To share with others what he himself has gained from hands-on experience and from his own unquenchable search for new knowledge and ideas, Go generously gives his time and advice to non-profit, non-government, cause-oriented organizations, which benefit from fresh marketing ideas to push their causes and advocacies.

In 2010, in celebration of his twenty-fifth year as an entrepreneur, he established Day 8 Business Academy Inc. an innovative social enterprise focusing on the training and development needs of small and medium-sized enterprises, giving small business owners a "Pay What You Want" scheme. This is a boundary-breaking first in the world of education — inspired from his interest in religious studies since 2002 — for which he applies his learning of helping the lost, the last and the least in society through his work ministry.

The academy does not charge tuition fees per se. Instead small business owners who attend various courses pay what they want or what they can afford. All proceeds go directly to charity. The academy's focus is to help small business owners succeed. This ripples outward as business owners are able to hire more people, who then buy more things, and ultimately help perk up the economy. Go thought of the academy because over 90 per cent of companies in the country are small businesses with no major school guiding them.

As a recognized leader among his peers in business education, he has won various awards and distinctions. In 1994, he was honoured by the Philippine Marketing Association as the youngest Agora awardee for marketing education and he was chairman of the Direct Selling Association of the Philippines in 2002.

In 2001, he was named one of the Ten Outstanding Young Men of the Philippines, one of only three in business education to be accorded this distinction in the more than forty-year history of the award-giving body. The following year, he was declared one of the Ten Outstanding Young Persons of the World, the first and only Filipino in business education to be given such award by the World Jaycees. Two years later, he was among the first batch winners of the Dr Jose P. Rizal Awards for Excellence organized by the Manila Times and Kaisa Para sa Kaunlaran. Remarkably, in 2007, he was given the rare Lifetime Achievement Award by the Association of Marketing Educators.

As a leading book author, Go has twelve best-selling marketing books continuing to spread his expertise. These books — suitable for the Philippine setting — are used by both industry practitioners and university students.

As the country's foremost marketing expert, he is consulted by countless top executives across the Philippines. An esteemed marketing consultant, trainer, and speaker, he consults with and trains many local and multinational companies both in the Philippines and abroad (India, Japan, Indonesia, among others) and has handled more than 500 seminar-workshops. His vast network for consultancy has covered almost all types of organizations, from small to medium to large-scale industries, ranging from business model innovation, market-driving strategy, profit strategy, and innopreneurship (or the marriage of innovation and entrepreneurship).

Go also continues to be involved in various advocacies aimed at youth empowerment and entrepreneurship. These advocacies include: the Young Market Masters Awards; the Market Masters Conference; the Marketing Rescue; the Mansmith Blue Freedom Fund, which is the first venture capitalist for young entrepreneurs dedicated to the Blue Ocean and Market-Driving Strategy ideas; and the MarkProf Foundation, which conducts annual search and training of top marketing management trainees.

There is no doubt that countless students, schools, companies, and marketing practitioners have benefited from Go's ideas. What is equally compelling is that these ideas not only pertain to the field of business, but are also ideas in tune with the people and society which business is meant to serve. As an educator, this is how Josiah Go wants these ideas to be.

Go Kim Pah

(吴道盛, Wu Daosheng, 1899–1983)
Banker, community leader, Philippines

Go Kim Pah's brand of personalized banking was unheard of in his time. This forward-thinking man made all his business endeavours customer friendly, and today, personalized banking is a byword in the Philippine banking system. The trust that Go earned as a businessman was so widespread that it helped him become a leader in the Chinese community. He was at the forefront of the anti-Japanese propaganda during the Second World War, and was one of the first leaders to be imprisoned. This, however, did not stop him from serving his country in all its times of need.

Like in many success stories of a poor child leaving his homeland for greener pastures, Go Kim Pah left China for Manila at age fifteen and immediately started working. For a boy who had only had four years of informal schooling, Go could not afford to be choosy. His first job was as an apprentice at Hong Huat Exchange, owned by a relative. Being an apprentice meant Go was a messenger, cleaner, training boy, gofer, and an all-around-boy who did any odd job he was given.

His main job, though, was to deliver "letters" — these are remittances of money from the Philippines to families waiting in the mainland for the precious and much-awaited financial support from overseas. This network of remittances was a crucial service unique to overseas Chinese long before bank transfers and foreign exchange services started.

Because of his diligence, honesty, and integrity, Go rose from the ranks to become manager of Hong Huat Exchange eventually. At twenty-two, he returned to China to marry a woman his mother chose for him. Like most immigrants, he left his wife in China and returned to the Philippines to continue working. He returned to China a few times before he saved enough money to bring his mother, wife, and sons to the Philippines.

When the owner of Hong Huat Exchange passed away, Go decided to open a similar type of business, albeit on a much smaller scale. He borrowed money and set up Kian Lam Exchange and Trading on 16 January 1927. The name of the business reflected Go's dreams — Kian Lam — to build in the south.

Just like for any other Chinese businesses, trust and integrity were the most important capital. Go's solid reputation as a trustworthy person allowed his business to flourish. The Kian Lam Exchange and Trading, just like the Hong Huat Exchange, functioned like a clearing house that helped spur economic transactions even without banks. The network of remittances served as an informal banking system, not just for overseas customers, but also for local businesses. Go succeeded in using his Kian Lam Exchange to tie up Chinese businesses throughout all the islands of the Philippines. For example, a copra businessman in Cebu, southern Philippines, might need to buy supplies in Manila. He need not give money to the supplier in Manila, but could use the Kian Lam Exchange to pay the Manila supplier from money owed him for copra someone in Manila purchased from him. This unprecedented network of exchanges was crucial to supporting Chinese trading and was carried out on a mind-boggling scale using only xin yong, or trust, as the key capital. The community itself played a role in exacting social sanctions against anyone who defaulted in payment through such exchanges. He would lose his credit standing immediately and other businessmen would be wary of continuing to do business with such a person.

Although Go was busy with his business, he kept abreast of national and international events. When the Sino-Japanese war broke out in China in 1937, he became very active in the anti-Japanese movement in the Philippines, especially in the "Boycott Japanese Goods" movement. Go appeared to be a regular businessman, but his remittance business provided a crucial mechanism for sending money home for the war effort in China. The money amounted to millions, and it went to buying airplanes and supplies needed to finance China's war with Japan.

When war was brought to the Philippines, the Japanese, immediately upon arrival, rounded up Chinese community leaders and executed several dozens of them in the first week alone. Go Kim Pah was arrested and imprisoned at Fort Santiago, along with thirty-five other businessmen. They were all loaded onto two trucks. All the passengers in one truck were killed in a cemetery. In the other, which carried Go, the men heard gunfire and awaited their turn to be shot, but they were instead brought to trial and sentenced to twenty years in prison for political crimes.

It was during his incarceration that Go learned to speak English from fellow prisoners. After three years, the prisoners were given amnesty. Go's business had to close down during the war, but he had safeguarded his assets well. When the war ended, he was able to get some of his money back and resurrect his remittance business.

The post-war years saw the rapid growth of Kian Lam's operations. It maintained offices in Xiamen, Shanghai, and Quanzhou. Aside from remittance operations, its other main function was to bring business to banks. Kian Lam would stand as guarantor to its clients when they opened letters of credit with the banks. This was usually carried out for clients in the business of importing textiles or foodstuff, or for those seeking loans to expand their trading business. The system allowed small and medium-scale businesses to operate even with just a minimum capital outlay.

When the Central Bank of the Philippines was established in 1949, Go saw an opportunity to play a bigger role in post-war nation building. At this time, he had been working hard in the Philippines for fifty years. It had been a long journey from his village in Fujian, where a young boy with no money and no certainty in his future, to a bustling building in Manila where hundreds of people entrusted him with millions of pesos.

Equitable Banking Corporation (建南银行) opened its doors in 1950 in the same building that used to house Kian Lam. In the early years of the bank, Go pounded the pavement and personally called on potential clients to open accounts at his bank. The bank's primary concern at the time was to continue to aid the country's recovery by providing credit facilities to finance various business endeavours, especially small- and medium-scale enterprises. His business stature and his approachable and humble ways were distinct advantages when soliciting clients. Friends in the community with firmly established enterprises would bank with him.

Likewise Go would also continue to support floundering businesses as testament to his commitment to personalized banking. He believed that the character of the borrower was a more accurate gauge than anything written on a document. This boosted, to a large extent, post-war rehabilitation efforts in the Chinese community, allowing many of the Chinese businesses to be among the first to rise from the ashes of war. The bank financed the setting up of many factories to manufacture textiles, shoes, and paper.

With Go's triumph in the business world, he set up the Equitable Bank Foundation in 1974 as his way of giving back to a country that he saw as his second home. His benevolence stems from the fact that he came from an extremely poor family. Scholarships are provided to students who exemplified leadership qualities and outstanding academic aptitude. The Go Kim Pah scholarship programme has allowed many deserving Filipino youths to attend the country's top-tier universities and vocational schools, enabling them to finish undergraduate, non-degree, technical/vocational, and graduate studies.

Go had seven sons and one daughter who continued his valued traditions while using Western banking methods and structures. The bank flourished and on 3 April 1997 Equitable Bank was listed on the Philippine Stock Exchange, and in 1999, the merger plan between the smaller Equitable Banking Corporation and the larger PCI Bank was approved, and Equitable Philippine Commercial International Bank achieved top-tier position in the banking world.

However in 2001, at the height of the impeachment trial of former President Joseph E. Estrada, Equitable Bank got into political trouble that affected its financial position. On 5 August 2005, the SM Group of Companies and Banco de Oro Universal Bank gained a 34 per cent share in the bank from the original founders, the Go family. On 6 January 2006, Banco de Oro Universal Bank submitted a merger offer to the bank — with Banco de Oro as the surviving entity. Today, members of the Go family hold nominal shares in the bank.

Go-Belmonte, Betty

(吴友德, Wu Youde, 1933–94)
Journalist, entrepreneur, philanthropist, Philippines

Betty Go-Belmonte led a group of journalists to found the Philippine Daily Inquirer in December 1985, when the late President Ferdinand Marcos called for snap presidential elections. In July 1986, Go Belmonte left the Inquirer and started The Philippine STAR. She is thus the only journalist in the Philippines to have founded two of the country's largest newspapers.

Born on 31 December 1933, Go-Belmonte was a diminutive woman who used her pen to fight and help fell a dictator, Ferdinand Marcos. Go-Belmonte was tolerant and easily forgave those who wronged her, but people often underestimated her political savvy and business acumen. In fact, as a news correspondent, she braved Martial Law and fought the Marcos dictatorship that suppressed freedom of the press. At the height of the nation's martial rule, arbitrary arrests, murders, torture, and abuses were rampant. Journalists and opposition leaders were disappearing one after the other, to be found dead later or never to be found at all. Major newspapers preferred to keep silent and stay alive rather than court the wrath of Marcos. Freedom of the press was irrelevant as daily newspapers passed through government censors. Throughout all this repression, Go-Belmonte continued to write stories the government did not want people to read. She wrote for the "mosquito press" or the biting and irritating alternative press that photocopied articles about Marcos family abuses for distribution.

The restoration of democracy after the successful People Power Revolution (popularly called EDSA I) of 1986, gave birth to the Philippine Daily Inquirer and later The Philippine STAR, two of the largest circulating newspapers in the country. Betty Go-Belmonte was co-founder of the first in December 1985 and founder and publisher of the second in July 1986. She was also deeply involved in the EDSA I and the resistance against Ferdinand E. Marcos. The Philippine STAR was an avenue for the continuous commitment to press freedom, and act as a vehicle for national development after years of plunder and oppression.

The Philippine STAR was unique because it did various charity work throughout the year, including helping sick children, building classrooms and libraries, giving free education to adults, conducting medical missions, giving gifts during Christmas, helping with relief during calamities and disasters, and recently helping preserve the environment. It was different from the other dailies as it prided itself with its bible journalism while upholding truth and fairness. Go-Belmonte believed that only with the Lord's guidance can an entity be true and succeed. These have become important ingredients of The Philippine STAR's tradition of excellence.

In fact, it is this adherence to faith that fed and empowered the volunteers of the EDSA People Power Revolution. Lacking the funds to have a full-time media bureau during the campaign for the snap presidential elections, the late President Corazon C. Aquino relied on volunteers. Go-Belmonte assigned her eldest son, Isaac, to take charge of printing campaign materials using the family's printing press at the family-owned The Fookien Times where she had first worked as a typesetter and for which she had done some editorial work (in Chinese) and taken charge of the printing advertisement. Daughter of Fookien Times (新闽日报) publisher Jimmy Go Puan Seng (吴半生) and brought up in a journalistic and fiercely nationalistic environment, she co-founded the People Power Movement Foundation and was likewise awarded by various institutions for her involvement with civic groups which cared for the people with disabilities, street children, out-of-school youth, and other marginalized groups.

Go-Belmonte was a religious, motherly, and very compassionate person. She was known for writing spiritual and uplifting articles she called "Angel Stories" in her column entitled, "Pebbles". Like the name of her column, Go-Belmonte was like a pebble — the most durable building block of any man-made or natural structure — the outcome of the long weathering of the elements — rain, sun and plant, animal, and human intervention. She thought of herself as a humble instrument of God. Other journalists were critical of her religiosity, often saying that it has no place in newspapering. Go-Belmonte faced the distrust and cynicism with her usual calm and equanimity, remaining steadfast in her belief that journalistic integrity is nothing but God's own message of honesty, truth, and fairness.

Even in the last year of her life, when she was afflicted with cancer and obvious pain, she continued to publish patient appeals and insisted that the paper should continue to help sick patients. After her passing, Go-Belmonte was hailed as one of the country's outstanding Chinese Filipinos by the Bahay Tsinoy Museum, where her portrait hangs. A station at the Metro Rail Transit line in Manila has even been named "Betty Go-Belmonte Station" in her honour, and blogs from young students who ride the commuter train daily reveal how they try to learn who the person was and to be inspired by her. A street in Quezon City near her ancestral house was named "Betty Go-Belmonte Street" as well, and a school in Quezon City was renamed "Betty Go-Belmonte School" in recognition of her indefatigable spirit in championing the rights of the poor and underprivileged. Also in honour of Go-Belmonte's compassion, Dr Jose Hernandez and Dr Pablito Magdalita of the University of the Philippines named a hybrid hisbiscus after her — the hibiscus rosa seninsis BGB — which they began cultivating in 1994, the year of her death. As for her significant entrepreneurial contribution to the field of journalism, Betty Go-Belmonte was given a posthumous award by the Philippine Center for Entrepreneurship in 2007 for being one of the Most Inspiring Manila Entrepreneurs.

Go-Belmonte's journalistic crusade and great love for the truth run in her blood. Her father, Go Puan Seng, was a Chinese immigrant who eventually became one of the country's leading newspapermen and fearless journalistic crusaders. Born in Xiamen, Fujian, Go came to the Philippines at the age of fourteen. He first worked as a reporter and later as an editor of the Kong Li Po (founded in 1912 to promote Sun Yat Sen's revolutionary cause). In 1926, together with renowned community leader Dee Ching Chuan, Go promoted the "Save Fujian Hometown campaign" among the Chinese in the Philippines through the newspaper, The Fookien Times, to save Fujian from the ravages of civil war. He then rose from the ranks and became editor, editor-in-chief, and eventually manager and co-publisher. He was with The Fookien Times for forty-seven years all together (publication of the paper stopped temporarily from the end of 1942 to 1945 during the Japanese Occupation).

After the 18 September 1931 incident in China, Go Puan Seng helped in the anti-Japanese campaign and boycott Japanese goods movement. On 7 July 1937, with the infamous Marco Polo Bridge incident that signalled the outbreak of Sino-Japanese war, Go increased the tempo of the anti-Japanese campaign and attacked Japanese aggression through his writings in the newspaper. General Douglas MacArthur warned Go Puan Seng that he (Go) would be the first Chinese-Filipino the Japanese would execute for writing anti-Japanese propaganda and true enough, Go's vocal anti-Japanese stance landed him in the Japanese blacklist.

Soon after the Japanese occupation of the Philippines in 1941, Go went into hiding in the mountain vastness of the Sierra Madre. His book, Born from the Ashes (also called Refuge and Strength), describes the 1,105 days when he was running for his life and how he was reborn. The Fookien Times was revived after the liberation with Go again serving as editor-in-chief until President Marcos declared martial law in 1971. Go continued his journalistic work through the publication of The Fookien Times Yearbook, now called The Fookien Times Philippines Yearbook.

Go Puan Seng's journalistic crusade became even more remarkable after he wrote a story in 1929 about a young Cantonese girl sold as a slave and brutally abused by a Chinese merchant in the Philippines. The two prominent community leaders who were named in the story filed libel charges against him. He was convicted and sentenced to two months' imprisonment and a fine of P300 pesos. On appeal to the Supreme Court, he was acquitted by no less a personage than Chief Justice George Malcolm and Go's case laid the groundwork for contemporary Philippines' libel laws. This is the Go family's legacy even as they continue to be bastions of truth and fairness.

After her death on 28 January 1994, Go-Belmonte's mission for respectable and credible reportage has been kept alive by her three sons Miguel, Isaac, and Kevin, who are now the president/CEO, editor-in-chief and corporate secretary of The Philippine STAR, respectively. Her only daughter, Joy, who is active in cultural and social development work, was elected vice-mayor of Quezon City in the 2010 elections. The work of Go-Belmonte's charitable foundation, The STAR's Operation Damayan, has been diligently continued and expanded by her son Miguel, who has inherited and imbibed a lot of his mother's compassionate qualities.

Goh Chok Tong

(吴作栋, Wu Zuodong, 1941–)

Economist, civil servant, politician, Singapore

Best known as the one who succeeded the man many regarded as Singapore's founding father, Lee Kuan Yew. Goh Chok Tong became prime minister in 1990 and secretary-general of People's Action Party in 1992. He was initially written off by critics of the People's Action Party (PAP) as a weak and transitory seat-warmer for Lee Hsien Loong, the eldest son of Lee Kuan Yew. Throughout his tenure as prime minister, Goh strove to shake off that image of a "seat-warmer. To this end, he initiated subtle changes in the PAP government. In doing so, he came into his own in the political arena. In contrast to his predecessor, Goh practised a more open and consultative style of leadership. He seemed to have a good grasp of the times and was keenly aware that Singaporeans lived in rapidly changing times. He also realized that this could likely mean that an increasing number of younger Singaporeans would want a say in the public policies that would affect them.

Goh's open and consultative behaviour is the result of his upbringing and education. Born the eldest of five children on 20 May 1941, Goh experienced hardship from a young age as his father died when he was nine years old. While his mother worked as a Chinese-language teacher, Goh and his siblings were raised by a grandmother, uncle, and aunt. He was an able student and made it through Pasir Panjang Primary School and Raffles Institution with good grades. As may be seen from his numerous extra-curricular activities as a student, his easy temperament and personable demeanour made him a responsible and consultative prefect, Boy Scout troop leader, swimming team captain, and chairman of the Historical Society. After obtaining first-class honours in Economics at the University of Singapore, he went to Williams College in the United States to pursue a master's degree in development economics. He later joined the civil service in 1964, but left in 1969 to work at Neptune Orient Lines (NOL). His leadership skills enabled him to climb the ranks and he was NOL's managing director from 1973 till 1977 when he left the company.

At this stage of his life, Goh was feeling the call of public service and had entered politics in 1976 on the PAP ticket. He was elected as a Member of Parliament for the Marine Parade constituency, which he still represents today. In his long political career, he served the government in many capacities, most notably as minister for trade and industry (1979–81), health and defence (1981–84), first deputy prime minister and minister for defence (1985), and then prime minister (1990–12 August 2004), by which time he had gained a reputation for his open and consultative style of leadership.

As if challenging his consultative leadership style, Singapore faced many crises during Goh's time as prime minister. Some of these crises included: the 1997 Asian Financial Crisis, threats of terrorism such as the 2001 plot to bomb embassies in Singapore by Jemaah Islamiyah, the economic recession of 2001–03, and the outbreak of Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome (SARS) in 2003. Goh rose to the challenges of these trying incidents and continued to be open with Singaporeans on handling the crises and how Singaporeans should come together to deal with these events. Under his premiership, Singapore launched several new initiatives reflecting the Goh administration's more open stance towards public opinion. His administration also introduced several major policies and policy institutions such as the Non-Constituency Members of Parliament (NCMPs) scheme, Nominated Members of Parliament (NMP) scheme, Group Representation Constituency, and elected presidency, to name a few.

Indeed, the institution of both the NMP and NCMP schemes may be considered one of the achievements of the Goh administration. The schemes have their roots in 1984 when Goh (who was deputy prime minister at the time) saw the need for alternative non-PAP voices in parliament. To bring this about, Goh proposed an amendment to the constitution. The upshot was the introduction of the NCMP scheme. The idea was that the NCMPs and the opposition MPs would voice discontent about government polices and check the PAP in parliament. Thus, the NMP and NCMP schemes came into being. The NMP scheme, which was approved by parliament in March 1990, allowed citizens without any political party affiliation to participate and contribute to parliamentary debates without going through the electoral process. The NCMP scheme allowed top opposition losers (that is, those who obtained more than 15 per cent of the votes in their respective constituencies) to participate in parliamentary debates. While both the NMP and NCMP schemes did contribute to debates in parliament, they garnered some negative press as well. This was because individuals who entered parliament under those schemes could not vote on the following issues: the amendment of the constitution, the distribution of public funds, vote of no confidence in the government, or removal of the president from office. Despite criticism of these schemes, Goh's initiative must be applauded because an NMP proposal by Walter Woon resulted in the introduction of the Maintenance for Parents' Act. The government's adoption of this act meant that Goh was somewhat successful in introducing an alternative non-PAP voice in parliament. These schemes further added to the image of Goh as an open and consultative leader. He was also lauded for forging his own leadership style.

Despite his reputation as an open and consultative leader, Goh could be firm and strict in matters of law. He demonstrated his mettle in the way he handled the caning of Michael Fay in 1994 for vandalism and theft. Against the face of American pleas for clemency, Goh remained firm in his decision that Singapore was right to try and punish Fay with due process of law. He reasoned that Singapore was a sovereign state, and as such, was not obliged to base its actions on the will of the American public or government. This incident clearly demonstrated Goh's principles. While he encouraged greater participation of Singaporeans in the political process, he could be as firm as his predecessor vis-à-vis the country's laws.

Local attention on the Michael Fay incident soon faded with the arrival of the Asian Financial Crisis and its attendant economic recession. Given his formal training in economics (he holds a bachelor's degree in Economics from the University of Singapore and a master's degree in Economics from Williams College in the United States) and his previous experience working in Neptune Working Lines as a planning and projects manager, and then managing director where he achieved impressive financial results during his tenure, it was no surprise that he managed to lead the country out of recession successfully. However, he stepped down as prime minister not long after that in 2004.

Goh is still active in politics and continues to serve Singapore as emeritus senior minister in Lee Hsien Loong's cabinet. As part of his duties as emeritus senior minister, he visits various countries to improve diplomatic relationships. In so doing, he is able to gain wider business opportunities for Singaporean businessmen. He also continues to encourage dialogue between Singaporeans and their Members of Parliament and is patron of the Institute of Policy Studies, a government think-tank where views of academics vis-à-vis local political issues are published. Due to his personable demeanour and open and consultative leadership style, he was briefly considered for the position of secretary general of the United Nations in 2006. While the post went to Ban Ki Moon, the fact that he was considered at all for the position demonstrates the high regard in which the world regards Goh Chok Tong and his style of political engagement.

Goh Choo San

(吴诸珊, Wu Zhushan, 1948–87)
Choreographer, ballet dancer, Singapore

Goh Choo San is best known as a classical and contemporary ballet dancer and choreographer who once worked with internationally renowned ballet dancer, Mikhail Baryshnikov. The youngest of ten children to Goh Kim Lok, an oil manufacturer, and Siew Han Ch'ng, Goh Choo San was born in Singapore on 14 September 1948, not long after his parents moved to Singapore from Medan in Indonesia. Despite sister Goh Soonee's efforts at teaching him dance, his earliest ambition was to be an airline pilot. However, his love for dance soon engulfed him so much so that he wanted to follow in three of his elder siblings' footsteps to make dance his career. However, his father urged him to complete his formal education at a university so that he would have something to fall back upon should his projected artistic career fail to come about. Accordingly, following his studies at Nanyang Primary School, Chinese High School, and Raffles Institution, Goh graduated from the University of Singapore with a degree in biochemistry in 1969.

However, in his honours year, Goh's feet itched to exert themselves on the ballet stage. Therefore, he responded to a magazine advertisement for a dance scholarship halfway through his honours year at the university in 1970, and left Singapore for Lausanne, Switzerland, to dance briefly with a Swiss student company. On leaving Switzerland, he moved to Amsterdam to study British ballet on a two-year scholarship with the Dutch National Ballet. His talent ensured that he was asked to stay when his scholarship lapsed. Thus, he began his formal career in dance with the Dutch National Ballet as a corps de ballet member before eventually becoming a very capable soloist. In his five-and-a-half years with the Dutch National Ballet, he demonstrated both poise and technical excellence in flawlessly executing the works of the company's resident choreographers, Toer van Schayk and Rudi van Dantzig, as well as in works by Balanchine and Petipa. During this time, he was strongly influenced by his teachers to pursue his interest in choreography. The upshot was his first choreographed ballet in 1973. This served to bolster his reputation as a dancer and choreographer in his own right, while enhancing the company's rich blend of classical and contemporary choreography. Indeed, the Dutch government recognized and lauded his work by awarding Goh with the creative arts grant for choreography in 1973 and 1975. This grant was in acknowledgement of Goh's choreography of two ballets for Dutch graduates as well as his organization of a choreographer's workshop. Unfortunately, the Dutch National Company did not have any vacancies for a resident choreographer.

His choreographed short ballet routines soon brought him to the notice of Mary Day, director of the Washington School of Ballet in Washington, D.C., who offered him a position with her newly founded Washington Ballet in 1976. Goh accepted the offer and soon became both the company teacher and resident choreographer with the Washington Ballet and grew in artistic strength alongside the company.

In his years with the Washington Ballet, his works became critically acclaimed for sophistication, as well as its strong Asian artistic style through which he blended classical and modern movements. Many reviewers and critics observed that his work connoted a usage of classical ballet vocabulary stemming from his Asian heritage. Instead of alienating the audience, his style of uniting both classical and modern dance movements was deemed "symphonic" because he preferred using numerous soloist dancers in a work rather than the traditional principal dancer/corps de ballet arrangement typical in classical choreography. By 1978, Goh had come into his own in the ballet world when he created his definitive work entitled, Fives, where he constructed fluid and dramatic movements to Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso. This, in turn, brought him to the attention of several important artistic directors of dance companies as he rapidly established himself as a choreographer capable of conceptualizing works of a very high quality. Mary Day must have shared this view because Goh was soon promoted to associate artistic director with the company. In his eleven years with them, Goh choreographed fourteen ballets for the dancers and brought international attention to the Washington Ballet company. Indeed, by 1984, the company conducted its first, large-scale overseas tour which went to Europe, South America, and Asia. All its performances, ranging from Fives, Variations Serieuses, Birds of Paradise, In the Glow of the Night, Unknown Territory, and Schubert Symphony featured Goh's choreography. To honour his contribution to dance, the city of Washington presented him with the Mayor's Award for Excellence in the Arts in 1986.

By 1979, Goh was not only creating one or two new works annually for the Washington Ballet; he was creating new works for other companies as well. Thus, he managed to work with most of the major dance companies in the United States and elsewhere such as the American Ballet Theatre, the Berlin Ballet, the Joffrey Ballet, the Pennsylvania Ballet, the Royal Danish Ballet, the Dance Theatre of Harlem, the Alvin Ailey Dance Theatre, and the Boston Ballet. Goh's biggest break came in 1981 when Mikhail Baryshnikov, artistic director of the American Ballet Theatre, commissioned him to create a work especially for him. This naturally placed Goh at the centre of the international ballet stage. Accordingly, Singapore honoured his talent and artistic endeavours in 1987 with the country's highest award for artistic achievement, the Cultural Medallion.

Amidst the international recognition of his works and artistic vision, Goh's health waned in 1987 and on 28 November 1987, he died from an AIDS-related disease, viral colitis, at his home in Manhattan, New York, at the age of thirty-nine. He left a US$500,000-legacy in his will to create the Choo San Goh & H. Robert McGee Foundation for young dancers and choreographers. The foundation tacitly acknowledged his links with the Washington Ballet where he first came into his own by stipulating that it was to be based in Washington. The foundation was also to collect applications for grants and scholarships from choreographers and dancers from around the world. Similarly, Goh made provisions for the money and fees for staging his ballets to be invested, and the resultant interest, distributed, as grants for choreographic works and scholarships. The annual Choo San Goh Award for Choreography was also part of the behest of his will.

His works continue to live on both internationally and in Singapore. In order to highlight Goh's links with country and the Asian influences in his choreography, the Singapore Dance Theatre added ten of Goh's works to their repertoire. In so doing, the company brought his unique identity as a Singaporean choreographer back to the country of his birth.

Goh Keng Swee

(吴庆瑞, Wu Qingrui, 1918–2010)
Civil servant, politician, Singapore

With a two-decade long public career in which he served as a key founding member of Singapore's ruling People's Action Party, as well as minister for finance, defence and education, Goh Keng Swee may truly be said to be one of the few who shaped modern Singapore's political and socio-economic landscapes. Goh is held by many to be Singapore's economic architect as he had been instrumental in economizing government spending and was a key player in changing Singapore from a trading economy to a broader-based economy in his capacity as finance minister.

Having gone through and survived the changing times where Singapore evolved from a colonial entity, with the Japanese Occupation in between, to full political independence, Goh, who was born on 6 October in Malacca in British Malaya, had experienced first-hand the best and worst of all these regimes. It was no surprise therefore that he had a clear vision of how he wanted Singapore to progress. As he had lived through the different regimes, he was more adept at picking out beneficial aspects of their time in power and readapting them for the benefit of Singapore's development. These skills of observation, re-learning, re-adapting the old for the new, were honed during his education at Anglo-Chinese School and Raffles College where he focused on social welfare issues. After the Japanese Occupation, he joined the civil service in the Department of Social Welfare. His outstanding performance there earned him a scholarship to study at the London School of Economics where he obtained a first-class honours in economics and won the William Fan Prize in 1951. Later, in 1956, he graduated with a Ph.D. in economics from the University of London. During his first foray into Britain, he met with Lee Kuan Yew and Toh Chin Chye, and discovered that they shared a passion for bringing about independence for Malaya. Accordingly, they formed a discussion group called the Malayan Forum, of which Goh was the founding chairman.

The call to enter politics actively to shape Singapore as he had discussed at the Malayan Forum emerged in 1958 when he left the civil service to work full time for the fledgling People's Action Party (PAP) in its Central Executive Committee. His vision for a future where Singapore was able to sustain itself through trade and industry certainly struck a chord with the PAP and he soon rose to become the party's vice-chairman. In 1959, he successfully contested the Kreta Ayer seat in the Legislative Assembly elections, and joined the first government of Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew as minister for finance. In this role, he was to assume stewardship of Singapore's economy, and in the following decade, Goh acted as the chief architect of the country's economic development. As part of his scheme to create jobs for Singaporeans in the aftermath of World War II and prevent people from falling in with left-wing groups of the time, he introduced an industrialization programme by transforming the swamps of Jurong into the country's first industrial estate. To encourage foreign investment, the Economic Development Board (EDB) was formed in 1961 to demonstrate the government's commitment to overseeing the country's development. He also included tourism in the Ministry of Finance by taking it out of the Ministry of Law and National Development where it had been overlooked.

Under his leadership, a major hotel building programme to raise the number of rooms from 2,800 to 13,100 by 1972 was implemented. Funds for the overseas promotion of Singapore were increased from S$900,000 to S$3 million, and to encourage tourists to stay in Singapore for several days, he successfully called for the construction of a Bird Park at Jurong, as well as an aquarium and a zoological garden.

These attempts to foster growth in Singapore's economy in the 1960s were at times overshadowed by the communist threat arising from agitators who recruited from Chinese language-medium schools and trade unions. The rise of the communists led to a schism within the PAP with the pro-communist faction trying to wrest control of the party from the moderate wing. Goh, who belonged to the moderate faction, was especially targeted for his call for Singapore to merge with Malaya. Goh recommended the merger because he saw Malaya as a rich hinterland that would help Singapore economically. Furthermore, a merger with Malaya would also curb the rise of communism amongst Singapore's mainly Chinese population. The merger soon proved to be problematic for Singapore and the country was expelled from the Federation of Malaysia. Subsequently, Goh played a key role in orchestrating Singapore's departure from the Federation in 1965.

When Singapore was fully independent in 1965, Goh was appointed minister for defence. As he had done with the economy in the 1950s, he revitalized the Defence Ministry by strengthening Singapore's military and domestic security capabilities. A key policy of his making was the creation of National Service, which was a compulsory conscription system for able-bodied young men into the military. This was as much for the protection of Singapore against external forces as it was a means of providing the young people of Singapore with a sense of belonging to their country. His legacy in this respect continues to live on for young men are still required to be inducted into National Service. Later, in 1979, he was moved to the Ministry of Education where he developed aspects of the Singapore education system with a streaming programme where students could learn at their own pace, and with a religious education programme.

Despite his retirement from politics and his position as deputy prime minister in 1984, Goh Keng Swee's legacy lives on. The measures he took to develop the Singapore economy are still in place today as they have shaped the country into a vibrant financial and business hub. Similarly, his contributions to the tourist industry, such as the Jurong Bird Park and the promotion of Singapore as a holiday destination with comfortable amenities and many things to do and see, have cemented the island as a top holiday spot for Westerners and Asians alike. Although his policy of religious education was dropped from the Singaporean education curriculum, the streaming of students continues to be part of the education policy with education extended to all students who are, in turn, allowed to learn at their own pace. To commemorate his achievements and contributions, he was awarded the prestigious Order of Temasek (First Class) in 1985 for his work in the development of Singapore. To encourage young economists to follow in his visionary footsteps, the Goh Keng Swee Scholarship Fund and the Goh Keng Swee Professorship and Master's Scholarships in Economics by the National University of Singapore (NUS) were established in 1992 and 1998 respectively.

Goh Keng Swee died on 14 May 2010 in Singapore after a long illness. He is remembered as a leader who laid the foundation stones of Singapore's economy and defence forces.

Goh King Chin

(吴景进, Wu Jingjin, 1943–)

Entrepreneur, community leader, philanthropist, Brunei

Pehin Kapitan Lela Diraja Goh King Chin is a successful entrepreneur in the automobile business, and also very concerned about national issues, especially the welfare of his fellow Chinese and immigrants. He is also a philanthropist who donated millions to the community.

Goh's father, Goh Hock Kee (吴福记), was a shareholder of the company Chop Hock Kee (和记), in Tutong. Goh King Chin is the eldest of eight siblings. In his early years, he began his education at Chung Hua School Tutong (都东中华学校). After graduation, he furthered his studies at Sultan Omar Ali Saiffudien (SOAS) College, a prestigious school during his era — where he was classmate with His Majesty Sultan Haji Hassanal Bolkiah Mu'izzadin Waddaulah Sultan and Yang Di-Pertuan of Brunei Darussalam. After graduating from SOAS College, he took up employment in the government sector as a custom and excise officer from 1964 to 1970.

In 1970 Goh decided to change his career path by going into business. He established a company called Goh Hock Kee Motors (GHK Motors), named after his father. The company was involved in the management of motor vehicles and spare parts and later flourished after it became the agent of several car companies, namely Daihatsu and Mitsubishi from Japan, Daewoo from Korea, and European and China manufacturers. Goh's resources and ideas have facilitated his business, which, in turn, has won him a national reputation in the commercial field. By 1990 he decided to upgrade and transform his company into one with an international business philosophy and policies. As a result, it was converted to GHK Motors Sdn. Bhd. Since then he has been very much pre-occupied with his automobile business. To expand his business further, Goh invested in a number of ventures, the most noticeable being the setting up of GHK Auto Assembly Plant Sdn. Bhd. in 1998 for the prefabrication of various types of commercial vehicles. It was the first auto prefabrication plant in Brunei, opened officially on 31 July 2000 by the minister of communication. In July 2003, Goh acquired 100 per cent equity in the MBA Insurance Co. Sdn. Bhd. for Brunei operations, and this venture was integrated as part of the GHK Group of Companies. In 2007 Goh was appointed vice-chairman for the Brunei Times.

In the community, he was director of the Chamber of Commerce until 1994 and is currently director of Chamber of Commerce and also honorary adviser of Chung Hwa Middle School Bandar Seri Begawan, Brunei Darussalam (汶莱中华中学) and Chung Hua School, Tutong. For his fellow Chinese in Brunei, Goh proposed, as a member of Legislative Council, that residents of Chinese descent born in Brunei should automatically be given citizenship when they reach the age of fifty-five. During the sixth day of the 2nd National Congress Meeting, he said that the peace and harmony experienced by Bruneian Chinese residents were the result of His Majesty's remarkable management and ruling of the country, that Bruneian Chinese respected His Majesty and the Brunei Government greatly, and that they also wholly supported the Brunei Islamic policy. He also stated that the Chinese residents were willing to contribute to and support the development of the country, and requested that the relevant authorities consider his proposal.

In the same meeting, Goh suggested that entrepreneurs or investors from foreign countries be given permanent resident (PR) status. He pointed out that foreign entrepreneurs or investors in Brunei were less likely to give full financial contributions to Brunei, and were very likely to transfer their funds overseas if they could not be sure of their status in the country. He argued that with a stronger sense of belonging, these investors would greatly support small- and medium-scale business development with their funds, which would in turn also provide plenty of business opportunities to the residents of Brunei. Goh further proposed that the government grant foreigners married to local women in Brunei PR status because, to his knowledge, there were people married to female citizens of Brunei for over twenty years and yet were still not granted PR status. Goh openly requested that the government modify its immigration policy to adapt better to the current situation of the country, rather than rely on an old policy established during the British Colonial period.

In response to Goh's proposals, Pehin Adanan of the Ministry of Home Affairs stated that from 1958 to 2005, there were 42,600 or more people who received the PR status, and that local women who married foreigners could also apply to the relevant authorities to have their children naturalized in Brunei. He stressed that every country has its own immigration and national registration policies. Those born abroad but holding PR status in Brunei for more than twenty-five years can apply for citizenship to the National Registration Bureau, while those born in Brunei and holding this status for more than twelve years can apply as well.

In April 2004 Goh was bestowed and appointed by the sultan as Pehin Kapitan of Brunei Chinese Community. In September the same year, the sultan reappointed him as a member of the Legislative Council. On 15 July 2006, during His Majesty's birthday celebration, he was bestowed the honorary title of "Dato Paduka", in recognition of his remarkable contributions to society. At the age of sixty-three, Goh is a spirited philanthropist who is involved in numerous charitable activities contributing to the community. In 2003, he donated $2.6 million for the construction of hawker stalls at Beribi, Gadong, which are specifically designed to accommodate the business of the poor and underprivileged villagers.

Goh is married to Datin Chang Nyuk Kee (张玉枝) who has borne him two sons and two daughters. Their son, Goh Kiat Hing (吴吉兴), took up the position of Director in the company, while their daughters, Poh Ling (宝玲) and Poh Yeek (宝玉), are involved in its administration.

Goh Poh Seng

(吴宝星, Wu Baoxing, 1936–2010)

Physician, writer, cultural activist, entrepreneur, Singapore

Dr Goh Poh Seng was a distinguished member of the first generation of writers in English (originally Malayan, then Malaysian, eventually, Singaporean) and is thus one of the four honoured in the permanent Singapore Literary Pioneers Gallery at Singapore's National Library. Acclaimed by Asia Magazine as "one of Asia's finest living poets", he was the only one who wrote in all four main literary genres — drama, poetry, short fiction, and the novel. Apart from creating a substantial body of work, he has the distinction of publishing Singapore's first novel in English, If We Dream Too Long (1972) and pioneering the use of the local variety of English in dialogue in drama and the novel. His novel won the inaugural National Book Development Council of Singapore Award for Fiction in 1976 and has been translated into Russian, and Tagalog. His third novel, Dance of Moths, also won the award in 1996. Goh was a man of great energy and remarkable vision whose politically and socially engaged plays, novels, and poetry, and whose passion for fostering a post-colonial Singaporean cultural identity, contributed substantially to the development of Singaporean literature and culture. Although a full-time physician, he managed to write and stage plays, write novels and poetry, form a cultural association, privately start and edit a journal, set up his own publishing firm, and serve influentially on various national cultural and other public bodies, eventually winning the prestigious Cultural Medallion for Literature national award in 1982. He subsequently became a private "cultural entrepreneur", his Hujong Enterprises promoting rock music and poetry readings through the then new concepts of the live music disco and bistro. When his businesses failed because he fell foul of the then strict local regulations, he emigrated disappointed and disillusioned to Canada in 1986. He continued to practise medicine and write, publishing two more poetry collections and novels, giving poetry readings in North America, and earning himself a reputation as an Asian Canadian writer as well. In 1995, diagnosed with Parkinson's Disease, he retired as a doctor, and began writing full-time. He published his last novel, completed his first collection of autobiographical short stories, Tall Tales and Misadventures of a Westernized Oriental Gentleman, and began on the first of four projected volumes of an "imaginary autobiography" entitled Bite the Bitter Wind, but did not live to complete this.

Goh was born to a middle-class family, grew up in Kuala Lumpur, Malaya, and was educated at the Victoria Institution before leaving for further education in Ireland where his interest in writing was encouraged. He even took a year off from medical studies at University College in Dublin to pursue his literary interest in London. Upon graduation, he returned to then Malaya, and after his marriage, moved to Singapore to practise medicine.

Caught up in the nationalist fervour of a newly independent Singapore and inspired by the literary culture of Dublin where he had begun to write and publish, Goh in 1964 founded and edited an early literary magazine, Tumasek, and then an association of like-minded writers and supporters, Centre 65, for promoting the arts in Singapore through "evenings of poetry and music", painting exhibitions, talks, and forums. When he was unable to find a publisher for his first novel in English, If We Dream Too Long (1972), he founded Island Press. This also published his two poetry collections, Lines from Batu Ferringhi (1978) and Bird With One Wing (1982), and hoped to help other writers publish their works. Active in public service, Goh was from 1967 to 1972 Chairman of the National Theatre Trust, and vice-chairman of the Arts Council, responsible for promoting and implementing Singapore's post-independence cultural policies and the arts, supporting orchestras, dance companies, and journals such as Poetry Singapore. He also served on the boards of the People's Association, the National Youth Leadership Training Institute, and was a director of the then Singapore Tourist Promotion Board.

A man with ideas ahead of his time, Goh envisaged a city with a vibrant nightlife and proposed plans for regenerating the derelict Singapore River vicinity as a cultural centre showcasing traditional arts and crafts, with restaurants and shops day and night. This is now a reality. He opened Singapore's first live music disco, Rainbow Lounge, promoting local rock bands and music, and sponsored the first David Bowie concert in 1983. He also pioneered poetry readings at his bistro, Toulouse Lautrec.

When invited back as a "pioneer writer" to grace the Singapore Writers Festival in 2007, he struck a chord with the public still, and a new edition of If We Dream Too Long (2010) was subsequently published to meet this awakened interest.

Motivated like most writers of his generation by a compelling, nationalistic mission to create "a literature of our own" and believing that Singaporeans "need our own literature in order to know about ourselves", his work is pervaded by a distinctive poetic sensibility alert to language as both artistic medium and ideological tool of the sharply observant conscience. Thus his plays, early novels, and poetry, seriously engage with contemporary issues and anxieties of the developing society and region in which both the author and his characters live, as indicated by their very titles: The Moon is Less Bright (1964) a play set during the Japanese Occupation; If We Dream Too Long (1972), a novel about a restless, alienated young English-educated clerk who drifts through 1960s' Singapore unable to realize his dreams; Eyewitness (1976), with its introspective poems meditating on current events ("Vietnam"), on the contemporary landscape as social comment ("Singapore"), or as metaphor for a colonized condition ("Exile in a Cold Land"); and The Immolation (1976), a novel about resistance to foreign intervention in an unnamed Southeast Asian country from the guerrillas' perspective, which also interrogates at the same time, idealistic commitments to causes.

His later novels continue the theme of the individual's existential quest for meaning and fulfilment in a seemingly indifferent universe. Dance of Moths (1996) explores this through the interwined lives of two men who, in contrasted ways, are irresistibly and fatally drawn to the search like moths to light, while in Dance With White Clouds: A Fable for Grown-Ups (2001) a successful businessman leaves everything behind, including a loving family, to begin a new life — ironically only to achieve what he had before, except with different people, in a different country, and not without pain. The spirit of his last novel is similar to that of his last poetry collection, as reflected in its title, As Though the Gods Love Us (2001).

> Meanwhile, the gods > drain our blood, > eat our flesh, > feast on our bones
> as though they love us.

As for poetry, it was "as always, a continuing passion"; as even his best prose shows, he had a poetic sensibility, a keen eye for landscape, and significant, telling detail wherever he was. The best of his poetry sings with lyric grace without loss of his characteristic passionate social and moral engagement as in "Spring Moon Blues":

> SPRING MOON BLUES
> How to live now, my dear, > with the moon so full
> on this warm Spring night?
>
> You know how it is > when hours are disposable, > traded away for surface, for safety,
> something misleading,
> which, in the end,
> proves unworthwhile,
> reached without risks,
> without true striving,
> when always, always the mountain > can only be climbed by daring, > only by daring.
> Have we really forgotten?
> So how to live now, my dear,
> with the moon so full
> on this warm Spring night?

He was a compelling reader of his own works as evident from the many international invitations to read in England, Russia, India, Korea, Hong Kong, Mexico, Australia, New Zealand, the United States, and Canada. His poems have also been widely anthologized or published both in Singaporean and international journals such as The London Magazine, Poetry International, Commonwealth Poems of Today, and New Voices in the Commonwealth. They have also been translated into Chinese, Malay, Tagalog, Russian, and German.

Goh died of complications from Parkinson's Disease, leaving behind his wife, Margaret Goh, and four sons.

Goh Then Chye

(吴天才, Wu Tiancai, 1936–)

Poet, educationalist, translator, historical material collector, Malaysia

Wu Tian Cai, who was born in 1936 in Kuala Lumpur, was an educationist in Chinese education and taught in secondary schools as a Chinese language teacher in Chong Hua Secondary School in Klang, Hua Lian Secondary School Taiping in Perak, and De Xing High School in Singapore. He also served as a lecturer and head in the Department of Chinese Studies at the University of Malaya. He was one of the few Chinese writers who was proficient in both the Chinese and Malay languages. Important Chinese-related posts he held in various organizations include serving as president of The Association of Translation and Creative Society (马来西亚翻译与创作协会), translator of Chinese Poetry for the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) in Asia of Chinese Poetry, consultant committee member of the Multiracial Translation Committee of Dewan Bahasa dan Pustaka, committee member of literary terminology in Dewan Bahasa Dan Pustaka (语文局文学术语委员) and committee member of the National Bureau of Unity.

Wu furthered his studies at the Nanyang University of Singapore (Nantah), majoring in Chinese Studies in the Department of Chinese Studies after his secondary education. He obtained his Bachelor of Arts degree from Nantah and continued to do a Master of Arts degree at the University of Malaya.

Wu has been a writer as early as his secondary school days. He published his articles in newspapers by using the name Situ Juanjuan (司徒涓涓). He used to publish his articles in the Oasis Column in the Southern Evening Press (南方晚报). Other pen names or pseudonyms he used included Lu Mang (鲁鍹), Ru Zi Niu (孺子牛), Jiang Qi (江琦), Ding Ping (丁平), Jiang Ding (江订), Ding Feng (丁锋), and Shi Feng (石枫). He was also a poet since the 1950s and has published a few collections of poems, namely Liushui Xingyun zhi Meng (流水行云之梦), Linghun di Beige (灵魂底悲歌), Hua zhi Lian (花之恋), Xinfeng zhi Xing (信奉之星), Xin Yongyuan Xiangzhe Ni (心永远向着你), Liming di Xingshan (黎明底星山), and Xingguang Shanshuo Jiangtao Song (星光闪烁江涛诵). He also wrote literary criticisms and published three collections, which include Malai Bandun Xiaolun (马来班顿小论), Cuo Lun Malai Bandun (脞论马来班顿), and Yanjiu Mahua Xinwenxue Zhongyao Lunwen Zhiyin (研究马华新文学重要论文指引). His recent research collections are Jiang Shan Yanjiu Lunwenji (江山研究论文集) and Jiang Shan Yanjiu zhuanji (江山研究专集).

As a translator of the Malay Language to the Chinese language and vice versa, Wu Tiancai has translated two books. The first was the translation of Chinese Modern Poems into the Malay Language (中国新诗选) and the second was The Collection of Modern Poetry in Malaysia (马华新诗选). With his wide knowledge of Malay, he succeeded in publishing three other translation works namely: (1) Pantun Melayu; (2) Pantun Peribahasa Melayu; and (3) Bintang Mengerdip Tersenum. In the translation of Chinese Poems in the Malay Language, Wu was the pioneer.

Wu is also a literary critic, but his interest is limited to the study of the articles by Jiang Shan (江山). He has published two books in this field, namely Collection of Essays on Jiang Shan (江山研究论文集) and Special Collection of Essays on Jiang Shan (江山研究论专集).

Wu is also a famous collector of historical materials on Malaysian Chinese literature, as well as Modern Chinese literature in China and Taiwan. To date, he has published four books of this kind, namely: (1) Classification Catalogue on Malaysian Chinese Literary Articles (马华文艺作品分类目录), (2) Complete List of Modern Poem Collection in Taiwan (台湾新诗集总目), (3) Complete List of Modern Poem Collection in China (中国新诗集总目), and (4) A Brief Introduction To Taiwan Contemporary Poets (台湾当代诗人简介).

In addition to teaching and writing, Wu is also active in promoting cultural activities. Other than the posts he held mentioned above, he was also the editor of the magazine, Nusantara, which was published by Dewan Bahasa Dan Pustaka; the head of the publishing and historical material preserving section of the Malaysian Chinese Cultural Society (大马华人文化协会出版与史料保存组主任), editor in Eastern Literary Publisher (东方文艺出版社) and a committee member of the research section on Malaysian Simplified Chinese Characters.

Wu's publications total more than thirty books, inclusive of books in both the Chinese and Malay languages and also dictionaries. Due to his good work in the various fields, his life history has been included in a book entitled Dictionary of World Great Writers (世界文学家大辞典), which was published in China in 1988.

Gokongwei, John Jr

(吴奕辉, Wu Yihui, 1926–)

Entrepreneur, philanthropist, Philippines

John Gokongwei, Jr built his empire from scratch. Considered one of the five taipans in the country, Gokongwei has gone from offering candles, threads, and soaps in the 1940s, to world-class Filipino products and services such as snacks, beverages, telecommunications, real estate, finance, and transportation. More than being a great entrepreneur, Gokongwei also distinguished himself as a philanthropist. In recognition of his philantrhopic work, the February 2008 issue of Forbes Asia named him one of the four heroes of philanthropy of the country (48 in Asia).

Throughout his career as an entrepreneur, Gokongwei has responded keenly to the shifting nuances and needs of Filipino consumers and upgraded what he offers them. He has formed corporations on the foundations of integrity, hard work, and industry. Each valuable product and service embodies his vision: Filipino products that are received, patronized, and respected in Asia and around the world. He has made it his life's abiding vision to restore belief and hope in what the Filipino can contribute to his own country, as well as to the entire world.

John Gokongwei, Jr was born to a wealthy Chinese-Filipino family on 11 August 1926, the eldest of six children. He spent his early years in Cebu, Southern Philippines. There, he and his family enjoyed a comfortable, even lavish, lifestyle. His grandfather was known to be the wealthiest man in the city. His father owned many businesses.

Growing up, Gokongwei divided his time between his huge house and his prestigious school, the San Carlos University. He excelled in class and was surrounded by many friends. Occasionally, he would treat them to free movies in the chain of movie houses his father owned — even the first air-conditioned one.

This life of comfort and luxury was shattered by the sudden and untimely death of his father from complications due to typhoid. Everything they held dear — the huge house, the chain of businesses, the lavish life — were taken from them by banks, to which his father owed money. He and his young mother were left with nothing more than a humble house and five young ones to feed. His mother then sent his younger siblings to China, where the cost of living was significantly lower. For the first time in his young life, he had to work to sustain himself and his family.

The young Gokongwei chose to make the best of it. At age fifteen, he rode his bicycle to the market at 5 a.m. every day. He carefully chose his products — those most needed: soaps, threads, and candles. As he succeeded in selling these, he and his mother were able to send money to support his siblings in China. More than that, he was able to save enough to improve his business.

At seventeen, he upgraded to his new product of choice: tyres, on a batel, a small but sturdy boat. He travelled for two to three weeks from Cebu to Lucena in Quezon Province in Southern Luzon, navigating stormy weathers and rough seas. From Lucena, he rode trucks headed for Manila, enduring discomfort for five to six hours. Still, he trudged on, selling his tyres and then buying other products to sell in Cebu. In spite of the difficulties, he spent his spare time reading books about the lives of great men: Disraeli, J.P. Morgan, Bismarck, Alexander the Great, Rockefeller, and Ford.

When the war broke out, people from all walks of life faced loss and destruction. To survive, they had to rely on their wits. Gokongwei's adaptability and responsiveness to change became all the more sharpened. By the end of the war, he, with the help of his brother, was ready to venture into his first business, Amasia Trading. This opened the opportunity for him to trade basic necessities of post-war Philippines: fruits, used clothing, old newspapers, and magazines. They established the business in Binondo (Chinatown), Manila.

He was not alone in managing the business as his brothers and sisters had now returned from China. They established an efficient routine and effective delegation of tasks. By the 1950s, Amasia had begun expanding its products to include whisky and cigarettes.

Even with the brisk business, Gokongwei felt unsettled. In 1957, he dreamt of changing from trading to manufacturing. The only problem was — he did not have enough means to do so. This prompted him to sell his ideas to a bank that would finance them. He visited bank after bank, until the chairman of China Bank, Dr Albino Sycip, recognized his potential and gave him a clean loan of 500,000 pesos. John Gokongwei, Jr.'s dreams were fuelled. His vision propelled him forward and he has never looked back.

Universal Corn Products emerged as a new threat to strong and established manufacturers of glucose and cornstarch. He learned to play by the rules of much tougher players, lowering the cost of the product to compete and survive. In the 1960s, he realized that the cut-throat competition became counterproductive. It was time to take on greater challenges. Inspired by the strategy of branding by consumer corporations such as Procter & Gamble and Nestle, Gokongwei created Blend 45, the poor man's coffee.

It was not long before Blend 45 was followed by a string of snack food items that became staples for the Filipino palate. Jack'n'Jill snacks have become synonymous with merienda (morning or afternoon snack time). In five decades, Gokongwei has expanded into different fields: textiles, retail, real estate, banking, telecommunications, aviation, and petrochemicals.

While expanding his business, Gokongwei was determined to further his studies. He went to De La Salle University to complete his MBA. He also went to Harvard University for a three-month business course. These helped him build on the theoretical aspect of experiences and strategies that he had developed over the years.

His journey was not without its share of great trials and triumphs. Who would have thought that Filipinos from all walks of life would fly? But Cebu Pacific Air offered aviation services that allowed every Juan to fly. In telecommunications, Sun Cellular Network lured a considerable share of subscribers by offering cheap yet invaluable services — a fixed rate in exchange for unlimited text messages and calls. Who would have imagined that a beverage could represent rest and relaxation? C2 Iced Tea has quenched the thirst of Filipinos, leaving them "Cool and Clean". Each of these products and services competed valiantly against those of daunting multinational consumer institutions. Inch by careful inch, they have earned their rightful place in the Filipino psyche as great products.

In 2001, Gokongwei announced his retirement and turned over the management of his business to his youngest brother, James, and his only son, Lance. Even so, he continues to participate in key decisions and in setting goals for J.G. Summit as its chairman emeritus. Various branches of his empire is ably run by his children. Robina Gokongwei Pe is in charge of the Robinsons Retail Group, while Lisa Gokongwei Sy manages Summit Publishing, producing local versions of much coveted international titles such as Cosmopolitan, FHM, and Good Housekeeping. Its local publications have also garnered a following from Filipinos all over the country.

More than a great entrepreneur, Gokongwei has also distinguished himself as a philanthropist. He established the Gokongwei Brothers Foundation in 1992. Since then, it has set up a Technical Training Center offering scholarship programmes for upgrading technical knowledge and skills. To support education and literacy of youth, it offers The Children's Library, a multimedia resource centre open to public schools. These libraries are strategically located in branches of Robinson's Malls and in areas in public libraries. He has likewise donated financially to various schools, such as the University of San Carlos, Xavier School, the De La Salle University, Sacred Heart School, and the Immaculate Conception Academy. In 2002 the Ateneo de Manila University John Gokongwei School of Management was launched. For all these efforts, the February 2008 issue of Forbes Asia named Gokongwei as one of the four heroes of philanthropy of the country.

As John Gokongwei, Jr. looks back at his life, he also looks forward to helping countless Filipino entrepreneurs. He has given back to this country that he deeply loves by investing in education, investing in the future. In the 2002 launch of the Ateneo de Manila University John Gokongwei School of Management, he had this to say to hopeful Filipino entrepreneurs: "Choose to be an entrepreneur because then YOU create value. Choose to be an entrepreneur because the products, services, and jobs you create then become the lifeblood of our nation. But most of all, choose to be an entrepreneur because then you desire a life of adventure, endless challenge, and the opportunity to be your BEST SELF."

Gotianun, Andrew L. Sr.

Considered one the country's taipans, Andrew L. Gotianun Sr. founded one of the Philippines' top real estate enterprises that is now considered a leader in the industry, helping to develop top-of-the-line housing and communities. With uncanny foresight, Gotianun entered the real estate industry way before the real estate boom in the country. As well, all his companies practise corporate social responsibility long before it became a byword in multinational corporations. In 2010, Forbes ranked Gotianun the fourteenth richest Filipino, with a net worth of US$500 million.

Born on 24 November 1927, Gotianun is a descendant of the Go clan based in Cebu. He is the grandson of the brother of Don Pedro Gotiaco who arrived in Cebu in the late nineteenth century from Xiamen, China. Gotiaco started selling rice and worked hard to become one of the wealthiest taipan during those times.

World War II was a difficult time for all Asians, especially the Filipinos. But for enterprising young men, there was always opportunity amidst the rubble of war. And this was how a leader in the real estate industry, Gotianun, started. In his teens, he spent his time salvaging ships in Cebu during and after the war. Every salvageable part was taken to be sold as either scrap metal or spare part for other machinery. Ships that could still be saved were rehabilitated for sale. Every centavo earned went to augmenting the meagre family income. Gotianun took this responsibility very seriously as his father had died quite young.

His business savvy is reflected in the evolution of his enterprises over the decades. He heeded the call of the times, and sometimes, foresaw the call of the times. With his young wife, Mercedes, he moved to Manila in the 1950s to seek better opportunities. Using borrowed money, the couple set up the Filinvest Development Corporation (FDC), a used-car financing enterprise. Twenty years later, it expanded into a major lending company, Filinvest Credit Corporation (FCC), which went into partnership with foreign institutions such as Chase Manhattan Bank, Westinghouse Electric Corporation, and Ford Philippines. By the early 1980s, FCC had become one of the leading consumer finance companies in the Philippines in terms of assets.

Gotianun also established the Family Bank and Trust Company and Insular Bank of Asia and America (IBAA). He was forced to sell the two banks to rivals at the height of the financial crisis in the mid-1980s, following the assassination of former Senator Benigno Aquino Jr. Family Bank merged with the Bank of the Philippine Islands (BPI), and the BPI-Family Bank became the biggest savings bank in the country. IBAA merged with the Philippine Commercial and International Bank to later become one of the country's biggest private commercial banks.

In 1967, Gotianun added real estate to FDC with the establishment of Filinvest Realty Corporation, which engaged in the development of residential subdivisions. Where others saw decline and downturn in the economic crisis, Gotianun saw opportunity. After unloading all his stocks in his two banks, he used the proceeds to buy large tracts of real estate at very low prices. This was an ingenious move as the real estate boom in the Philippines was just beginning, so the FDC was already a recognized leader in the real estate business and had been capitalizing on property development by the time it peaked.

With the success of his business enterprises, and with his children securely at the helm, Gotianun and his wife thought of retiring in the 1980s. The whole family moved to Canada for a time while continuing to travel back and forth to the Philippines. After the 1986 People Power Revolution, Gotianun returned to the Philippines and went into the Philippine Investment Development Corp. with the proceeds of his bank sales and real estate investments. With political stability, his fortunes rose again — real estate prices increased manyfold as there was a very high demand for low-cost housing. Gotianun therefore decided to focus on real property development. He also joined the government's low-cost housing projects, using only small capital, but gaining quick returns and enabling even middle-income employees to acquire their own homes. Using a new subsidiary, Filinvest Land Inc. (FLI), Filinvest became synonymous with housing.

FLI's success came with its innovations in housing concepts which included the addition of a second storey on homes situated on small lots, without requiring occupants to vacate their homes; and the "Entrepreneurial Village", which is the result of a collaborative effort with the government to allow entrepreneurs with small- and medium-size businesses to live and work in a residential development with access to government agencies that assist small businesses. FLI was also a pioneer in the development of very large master-planned township developments that allowed for a convenient mix of commercial, industrial, and residential uses.

Filinvest's name resounded the most strongly when it was able to win a bid over the old Ayala family and the Gokongweis to acquire the 244-hectare Alabang Stock Farm in Muntinlupa. This huge project necessitated another subsidiary, Filinvest Alabang Inc., that took on the ambitious endeavour of transforming an underutilized property into a model for urban development, dubbed the "Makati of the South". Today, Filinvest Corporate City has single-handedly revitalized the Alabang area and transformed it into a premier satellite city and central business district that is changing the quality of life for people in the south. And to date, Filinvest has developed more than 1,800 hectares of land, and provided home sites for more than 100,000 families, which makes it one of the largest home providers in the Philippines today.

Long before the concept of corporate social responsibility became a byword in the business landscape, Gotianun and the Filinvest Group had been quietly and steadfastly practising it. The Gotianuns and the whole Filinvest Group had been actively supporting the Educational Research and Development Assistance (ERDA) Foundation since its establishment in 1974 by a French Jesuit priest, Father Pierre Tritz, who became a naturalized Filipino due to his love for his new home, the Philippines, and its people. ERDA provides scholarships to children who are too poor to go to school. The Filinvest Group provides much needed support for ERDA's needs — scholarships, books, school supplies, livelihood training, and pre-school classrooms. Instead of a grand and lavish party to celebrate its fiftieth anniversary, FDC held a Fun Run for the benefit of ERDA scholars. For every runner who finished the run, FDC pledged to send a child to school for one whole year and take care of his or her school fees and supplies. Filinvest was able to raise 2.8 million pesos, an amount that changed the lives of elementary and high school scholars of ERDA forever. The success of this maiden venture inspired FDC to hold yet another Fun Run in 2009. With the invaluable support of the FDC family, its business partners, and clients, the company raised a sum of 5 million pesos, which again brought the less fortunate kids at the ERDA Foundation closer to their dream. Together, Filinvest and ERDA continue to build dreams and make a difference, one child at a time.

Another example of FDC philanthropy was seen after the country was struck by super typhoon Ondoy in September 2009. Filinvest donated a total of 20 million pesos' worth of food, medicine, and clothing materials to more than 10,000 families in the affected areas. Employees of Filinvest Land even decided to forgo their annual Christmas party and donated the funds to the Philippine National Red Cross and families that were directly affected by the calamity. EastWest Bank, a subsidiary of FDC in the banking and financial services, also donated 16 million pesos' worth of textile items to flood victims through the ERDA Foundation, Caritas Manila, and ABS-CBN Sagip Foundation.

Gozali, Hendrick

(吴协和, Wu Xiehe, 1939–)
Film producer, Indonesia

Hendrick Gozali is a leading Indonesian film producer with a number of award-winning Indonesian films and popular TV serials to his credit since the New Order period.

Hendrick Gozali was born Wu Xiehe into a trader's family in Jakarta on 28 November 1939. His parents came from Fujian (Hokkien) province in China. The couple had eight children altogether. Gozali is the sixth son. It is not surprising that when he adopted an Indonesian name during the New Order period, he used Gozali, as his family name, Wu, is pronounced "Go" in Hokkien.

Gozali first went to Sin Hwa Chinese School in Pasar Baru (Jakarta) where he studied until his graduation in 1956. During his primary school and middle school days, he performed in school plays and being also fond of sports, was a member of the Sin Hwa alumni basketball team. From 1956–59 he studied at Zhonghua Zhongxue (Hua Zhong High School), also in Jakarta. However, unlike most graduates of left-wing Chinese schools then, Gozali did not return to his "motherland". Instead, he stayed in Indonesia and worked for an electronics company, and later, a plastic company.

According to Gozali's own account, it was by coincidence that he became involved in the film industry. His elder brother, Wu Xuejian (Alex Gouw), went to Hong Kong in the 1960s to work in the film industry and later together with Gozali, established Goldig Films (协利电影) film company. Gozali himself also formed his own company, the PT Tekun Film, to import Hong Kong movies to Indonesia. In 1969 he met Turino Djunaidi, a well known Indonesian producer and film director, from whom he learned a lot about film-making and the industry and with whom started to cooperate to make Indonesian movies. Their first film called Bernapas Dalam Lumpur (Breathing in the Mud), was produced in 1970. It focused on the life of lower class Indonesians trying to meet their daily needs. The film's main star, Suzana, later became a popular actress. The film was very well received and won praise from a number of film critics. The then governor of Jakarta, Ali Sadikin, was pleased with it as well and exempted it from the municipal recreation tax as a means of encouraging the national film industry. According to Gozali, this was the first national film to receive such exceptional treatment. Later he co-produced four other films with Turino and each of them was a huge box office success. Gozali started thinking it was easy to make movies and wanted to establish his own film company. By coincidence, he met his ex-classmate from Sin Hwa Chinese School whose father was the proprietor of Garuda Film Company. This classmate told him that his father would like to retire and was willing to sell the company. Gozali later became the director of the Garuda Film Company.

His first independent film, Bony and Nancy, tells the story of the friendship between a girl and a dog. It received good reviews, but was a box office failure. He noted in his own article that it was not easy to make a film which involved human beings and animals, and that he did not realize Muslims do not keep dogs, and consequently, it was difficult for the film to be appreciated by a mainly Muslim audience. After that movie, he made another entitled, Ranjang Siang Ranjang Malam (The Bed for Day and the Bed for Night) which depicts the story of a girl who was forced to become a prostitute. The film was not well reviewed by critics, but was a box office success. Gozali thus faced the dilemma of making a movie that would receive good reviews and also achieve commercial success. He worked with a reputable movie director, Teguh Karya, who was a peranakan Chinese, and produced Ranjang Pengantin (Bed for the Bride). This film not only received five Citra awards (the equivalent of the Oscar in Indonesia), including the best movie of the year in 1975. It was thus a box office success. Gozali finally believed that it was possible to make a good film that was also successful at the box office. During the 1970s and 1980s, Gozali's Garuda Film Company made more than forty movies, at the rate of at least two to three a year.

he feels proud of is November 1828. The movie depicts the story of the Diponegoro War (1825–30) during which a Javanese prince resisted the colonial rule of the Dutch. Gozali was the co-producer of the movie; Nyoo Han Siang, a businessman who was interested in promoting Indonesian films, was listed as its producer, and Teguh Karya was the director. The movie won six Citra awards, including best film of the year, 1979. In one of his articles commemorating his friend, Nyoo Han Siang, Gozali talked about the making of this movie and the difficulties he encountered. The movie exceeded the original budget and was behind schedule. However, Gozali and his team managed to finish it at the last minute and brought it to Hong Kong for processing and editing. The team eventually succeeded in submitting the film in time to participate in the Indonesian Film Festival in 1979.

The second Indonesian movie that Gozali made together with Nyoo Han Siang was Rembulan dan Matahari (The Moon and The Sun), directed by Slamet Rahardjo, one of the co-stars in November 1828. This is a movie about the Indonesian superman. The set in movie was an Indonesian village and received three Citra awards. However, both movies that Gozali made with Nyoo Han Siang won prizes, but did not make money. Nevertheless, they planned to make a third movie on Chairil Anwar, the pioneer of Indonesian modern poetry. They also planned to invite W. S. Rendra, a leading Indonesian poet and play director, to be the lead character in the film. The plan, however, was eventually abandoned as Nyoo Han Siang passed away due to illness.

Gozali has produced many award-winning movies. Apart from the above-mentioned titles, his other popular box office successes include: Buah Terlarang (Forbidden Fruit), Perempuan dalam Pasungan (A Woman in Stocks), Jangan Ambil Nyawaku (Don't Take My Life), Sorga Dunia di Pintu Neraka (Heaven and Hell), and Seputih Hatinya Semerah Bibirnya (The Call of Love), and others.

Entering the 1990s, the Indonesian movie industry declined to its lowest point. Gozali observed that most of the movies were of low quality and began to shift his attention to making television serials, producing a number of them, including Jacklyn, Cerita Cinta (Love Story), Dua Pelangi (Two Rainbows), Indahnya Cinta (The Beauty of Love), and Panah Asmara (Arrow of Love).

He has now retired and passed on the baton to his son and daughter, who are also interested in the film industry. He is now active in the various Chinese school alumni associations in Jakarta.

Gunarsa, Singgih D.

(Go Ge Siong, 吴启祥, Wu Qixiang, 1934–)
Psychologist, university professor, Indonesia

Singgih Dirga Gunarsa or Go Ge Siong is a pioneer in child development psychology and sports psychology in Indonesia.

He was born on 12 August 1934 in Sokaraja, Banyumas, Central Java. His father, Go Tjwan Giok, and mother, Phoa Giok Lan, were second-generation Peranakan. When Go Tjwan Giok was fourteen years of age, he was taken by his uncle to China where he lived for eight years. He then returned to Sokaraja and worked for N.V. Koli as a clerk. One year later he went to China again, stayed for eight months this time, and returned to Sokaraja to work for the same company. While in China, he married a Chinese girl with whom he had a daughter. He left them behind when he returned to Indonesia where he married a young Peranakan girl, who would be Singgih Gunarsa's mother. Go Tjwan Giok eventually brought his Chinese wife and daughter to Indonesia, resulting in tension between his Chinese and Peranakan wives. Gunarsa's relationship with his half-sister was fine.

According to Gunarsa, his mother tongue is Javanese, but he is also able to speak some Hokkien and Mandarin. As a child, he was sent to a Dutch School for indigenous Indonesians (HIS) where he learnt Dutch. The school charged lower school fees than a Dutch School did for the Chinese (HCS). But Gunarsa did not stay long at HIS because of the Japanese invasion, which forced him to study at a Chinese-language school in Sokaraja until Primary 5. After the Japanese surrender, he stopped his schooling for a while. In 1948, at the age of fourteen, he was accepted by ALS (Algemene Lagere School) in Sokaraja as a Primary 5 student. Shortly thereafter he was transferred to a Christian Primary School, also in Sokaraja, from which he graduated in 1950.

Gunarsa then went to Purwokerto to attend the Christian SMP and continued his studies in Jakarta at the SMA-K Pintu Air. Upon graduation he was accepted by the Medical School of the University of Indonesia (FKUI). Although, he failed his first year examination because he was unable to prepare well for it due to a motorcycle accident, he was given an opportunity to take an entrance exam of psychology, which was part of the Medical School of UI, and was accepted. This was the beginning of his journey in psychology.

While studying at FKUI, Gunarsa was also a teaching assistant, as well as a part-time lecturer in psychology for the staff of the Jang Seng Ie hospital (later Husada Hospital). In September 1963 he obtained a Drs (doctorandus) degree after submitting a thesis on "Mentally Retarded Children and Their Parents' Perceptions of Them". Apart from teaching at the university, he also assisted at the Ministry of Social Affairs which in turn gave him an opportunity to study at the Tavistock Institute in London on a non-degree programme. His overseas experience made him aware of the importance of further research, so after returning to Indonesia, he decided to pursue a Ph.D. degree with Professor Slamet Imam Santoso as his promoter (thesis supervisor). Professor Fuad Hassan helped him get a fellowship from the Asia Foundation which enabled him to spend three months at the University of Hawaii on literature research. At the end of the three months, Gunarsa presented a report on "Children's Apperception Test: Indonesian Adaptation and Its Application to Indonesian Children" to the Department of Psychiatry, University of Hawaii (14 December 1972). Thirteen months later, on 12 January 1974, he successfully defended his Ph.D. thesis entitled, "Children's Apperception Test (C.A.T.-A.I.) sebagai Test Proyeksi Untuk Assessment Kepribadian Anak dan 11 Dalil" and was awarded a Ph.D degree.

Prior to obtaining this, Gunarsa had published a number of research papers which earned him a good reputation. He continued his studies and writings between 1974 and 1980, and participated in several international conferences, including the First Asian Workshop on Child and Adolescent Development (University of Surrey, Guild-ford, the United Kingdom, July 1975), and the 21st International Congress of Psychology, Paris (July 1976). He also organized the first Asian Workshop on Child and Adolescent Development (AWCAD) in Jakarta in July 1978, the success of which encouraged other Southeast Asian countries to follow suit.

Gunarsa was also active in international organizations. He was area chair for Indonesia (1976–77) of the International Council of Psychologists, and executive committee member of the International Society for the Study of Behavioral Development (ISSBD, 1977–79; 1979–81). Moreover, he was active in the Indonesian YMCA, 1967–2000, and was elected the Indonesian representative of Christian Children's Fund (CCF).

His teaching, research, and other academic activities were well recognized and in April 1981, he was awarded a full professorship at the Faculty of Psychology, University of Indonesia. His inaugural speech was "Memadu Rangsang Lingkungan untuk Memacu Perkembangan Anak" (Environment and Child Development). It was a rare honour at the time for a member of the teaching staff, especially a non-indigenous Indonesian, to be promoted to full professor at the University of Indonesia.

Gunarsa loves sports. He played football, basketball, and badminton. His love of badminton motivated him to serve as psychologist for the Indonesian national badminton team for thirty years during which he often accompanied the team on important international competitions. He was also a good basketball player and joined a few basketball teams, including that of the University of Indonesia. It was his association with sportsmen and sportswomen that made him a pioneer in the research on sports psychology, a new area of research in Indonesia. In 1999 he even received an award for his contribution to sports psychology in Indonesia. Gunarsa also received many other awards for his contribution to the Indonesian state and society, including the medal, Satya Lancana Karya Satya Kelas 1 (1989).

He retired at the end of 1999 and was made professor emeritus by the University of Indonesia the following year. While he was teaching full time at UI, he served as a member of Tarumanegara University Foundation (Jakarta). After retirement from UI he became a full-time staff at the Tarumanegara University and was made a full professor. Tarumanegara University also made him professor emeritus when he was seventy.

Gunarsa has authored and co-authored at least twenty-three books, including Psikologi Perkembangan (Development Psychology, 1972); Dasar dan Teori Perkembangan Anak (Foundation and Theory of Child Development, 1981); Psikologi Olahraga (Sports Psychology, 1989); Psikologi Praktis: Anak, Remaja dan Keluarga (Practical Psychology: Children, Teenagers, and Family, co-author, 1991); Reorientasi Perkembangan dan Prospek Profesi Psikologi di Indonesia (Reorientation of the Development and Prospects of Psychology in Indonesia, 1996), Psikologi Olahraga: Teori dan Praktik (Sports Psychology: Theory and Practice, 1996), The Children's Apperception Test — Adaptasi Indonesia, Manual (The CAT: Indonesian Adaptation, A Manual, 2004).

He married Juul, a psychology graduate in 1964 and they have three children.

H

Hà Lãn Hùng

(何嬾熊, He Lanxiong, 1913–93)

Hà Lãn Hùng was originally from Tân Hội (新会区) district of Guangdong province, China. On the year of birth of Hùng, the Tây Đề Niên Giám (西堤年鉴), records his year of birth as 1919, but according to his wife, Đinh Lan Phương (丁兰芳), it should be 1913. Hùng's real name was Duy Hùng (何维熊) and he also had another name, Nhĩ Sơn (耳山). When he was young, his paternal grandmother, Lý Liên Tử (李莲子), taught him traditional painting. When he reached the age of thirteen, he went with his father to a painting exhibition by famous artists who belonged to the Hỗ School of Painting (沪派) that was usually associated with Shanghai city. While there, Hùng was fortunate enough to have been noticed by Vương Nhất Đình (王一亭) — then leader of the Hỗ School. Đình took Hùng in as a disciple and taught him the essence of the school. From then, Hùng progressed very quickly and soon became very famous in Guangdong province. He even participated in the organizing committee for the Exhibition of Traditional Paintings to raise funds for the Xinhai (Tân Hợi 辛亥) Hospital in Guangdong province. Hùng was also taught seal carving by a famous practitioner called Dịch Hy (易熹). He therefore learnt both carvings and painting and later excelled in them.

During the Sino-Japanese War, Hùng migrated with his family to Hong Kong and met up with Đình. After this reunion, Hùng continued his studies under Đình, which took him completely into the Hỗ School. But Hùng did not stay in Hong Kong for long. He soon migrated to Vietnam and, at the beginning, lived in Hanoi, where he taught at the Chinese Secondary School (中华中学). Together with another man called Hoàng Nãi Sí (黄乃炽), they opened a branch of the Chinese Secondary School.

In 1945 Hùng moved to Saigon, where he also taught, there but at the same time, he maintained contact with fellow painters and artists in China. After the Japanese surrendered, he joined an artist group called Bồi Phong Hoạ Xã (培风画社), which was based in Hong Kong. He collaborated with them in organizing an exhibition of calligraphy and paintings of overseas Chinese in Vietnam, for the purpose of contributing to the national salvation fund to rebuild China. At this exhibition, the owner of Khải Sinh (启生), a factory which was making hats in Chợ Lớn (Cholon 堤岸), bought a painting by Hùng entitled, Tiên Viên đồ (仙猿图). The purchase caused a big stir because the price was a hefty five thousand dollars. After this landmark achievement, Hùng continued to organize many other exhibitions showcasing his paintings on the southern provinces of Vietnam so that overseas Chinese might have the opportunity to contribute to their country of origin.

Other than his achievements in painting, Hùng was well known for his carvings. Many contemporary artists such as Dung Cảnh Đạc (容景铎), Trương Quýnh Sơ (张炯初), and Lưu Kinh Sơn (刘荆山), who migrated from Guangzhou city to Chợ Lớn had requested Hùng to carve their seals. Through these requests, he established personal friendships with them. In May 1960 the Pacific Association of Freedom organized an exhibition in Saigon on the works of Ngô Tử Thâm (吴子深), who was then known as one of the Four Great Artists of the Republic of China. While in Saigon, Thâm met Hùng and they had a very good exchange of views. And through that, they forged a good friendship despite their age differences. In 1966, at the Global Exhibition of Overseas Chinese Art organized in Taiwan, The Taipei Central Museum (台北中央博物馆) bought two of Hùng's paintings. In 1971 the same museum organized a sculpture and seal-carving exhibition and again acquired two works by Hùng. Earlier in 1968, the magazine, Good Friends' Pictorial, published in Hong Kong, introduced the seal carvings of Hùng, and published a brief biography of his artistic career as well. In 1974, to celebrate the sixtieth birthday of Hùng, his students collected all his seal carvings and published a book called Hà Lãn Hùng Ấn Phổ (何嫺熊印谱) — the only publication on seal carvings that has emerged from Chợ Lớn in fifty years of cultural activities among the Chinese in Vietnam.

Hùng also taught literary writing and painting in various Chinese secondary schools in Saigon such as, Quảng Triệu (广肇初中学校), Tuệ Thành (穗城初中学校), Lĩnh Nam (岭南中学), and Diệu Hán (耀汉中学), and often organized exhibitions for charity.

He frequently reserved his rest days on weekends for creative work, and also gave lessons at his home. This dedication produced many disciples of fame, such as Mạc Tú Hoàn (莫秀环), Vương Kim Kiều (王金娇), Nguyễn Thị Hảo (阮氏好), Lao Toản Khanh (劳钻卿), and Từ Nhược Hư (徐若虚). As a person who was also passionate about writing, Hùng often wrote his own poetry in his paintings. He published a few collections of poems that were noticed by literary circles before 1949, including three anthologies — Tị Nạn Thảo (避难草), Nam Lưu Tập (南留集), and Mai Tập (梅集).

His wife, Đinh Lan Phương, who was also born in the same district in China as he was, learnt how to paint from Hùng. In 2002 three years after Hùng's death, Phương brought one of his works called Xuân vũ đồ (春雨图) to an exhibition in Hong Kong. It was a fairly large exhibition organized by the Hà clan association for the first time. The painting, completed in 1954, has made a lasting impression for its style, which is typically that of the Hỗ School. It is simple and delicate, neither restricting itself to certain themes in the works of the Lĩnh Nam School, nor conveying a clear sense of white space one would find in the paintings of the Capital School. Two earlier landmark exhibitions held in 1973 and 1974 by Hùng and his students, as well as the published collections of their works, show that he was successful in establishing the Hỗ School in Vietnam.

(Han Hoo Tjwan, 韩浩泉, Han Haoquan, 1930–)

Leading Indonesian architect, Indonesia

Han Awal (Han Hoo Tjwan) is an architect and a committed educator. He has won three national awards associated with the Indonesian Association of Architects (IAI) for the design of the University of Atmajaya (awarded in 1984), and the conservation of the National Archive Building (2000) and the Bank of Indonesia (2009). He is also the recipient of UNESCO Asia — Heritage Award of Excellence in 2001 (with Budi Lim and Cor Passchier) for his conservation project. In 2007, the Professor Teeuw award committee decided to focus on architecture, seen as part of the fields of Humanities and the Social Sciences. Han Awal, with Ajie Damais and Wastu Pragantha Tjong, were awarded the Professor Teeuw award for their contribution to fostering cultural exchange between Indonesia and the Netherlands through architectural conservation of buildings from the Dutch era.

In the 1960s, Han Awal (and a group of German-Dutch educated Indonesian architects) brought home the idea of European modernism and produced consistently well designed buildings of modernist aesthetic that show sensitivity to their tropical context. Among his peers, he was one of the very few to receive commissions for large scale projects at the beginning of his career, such as the planning of the Atmajaya University complex (1962–64) and the revitalization of Kota Inti in Perniagaan Street (1963) (see Soerjono Herlambang). For the Atmajaya University he demonstrated the idea of contextual design by creating "the park with towers" that would give the appearance of the clover leaf Semanggi bypass of the Soekarno era. For the revitalization of Kota Inti, he introduced (perhaps for the first time in Indonesian architectural culture) the concept of "mixed use" where commercial and public services intersect with residences. All these were considered innovative and unique at the time. Han Awal's works have spanned half a century and he continues to shape the architectural discourses of the subsequent generation of architects. A modernist at heart, he nevertheless significantly stresses the importance of old buildings and vernacular settlements from different cultures, and points out how to conserve them for the future of the Indonesian built environment.

Han Awal was born into a Peranakan Chinese family in Malang in 1930 and baptized as a Catholic in 1959. He was already interested in the art of spatial arrangement since childhood, influenced perhaps by his grandfather who worked for a local theatre as a stage decorator. By the time he graduated from high school (at RK HBS Albertus Malang), Han Awal was already determined to pursue his interest in architecture (even though there was no architecture school yet at the time). The scholarship from the archbishop of Malang allowed Han Awal to study at the Technische Hoogeschool in Delft in the Netherlands in 1950. The conflict between Indonesia and the Netherlands over West Guinea (today's Irian Jaya), however, pushed him to leave Delft for the Technische Universitat Berlin in Berlin, Germany, then known as one of the centres for the development of modernist architecture in Europe.

Han Awal was clearly absorbed by the professional training in Europe, but he was equally concerned with the struggles of Indonesia after decolonization. Back home, the political circumstances around the 1950s were marked by the struggles to give the liberated Indonesia a proper "national" form. It was then also a trying time for ethnic Chinese over issues of identity in postcolonial Indonesia. All these historical circumstances seem to have shaped (consciously or unconsciously) the intellectual life of Han Awal and they have found their way into his creative works as an architect.

He was, in a way, a product of his "exile", in the sense that his identity was significantly formed while he was away from home. His professional training came in tandem with his search for an identity for himself as well as for his Indonesia. In Europe he joined an organization that was concerned with the position of ethnic Chinese in Indonesian nationalism. In some way, his architecture training came as a solution to the dilemma of identity. He manages to show that he is not only a "ethnic Chinese Indonesian", but also an "architect" who, by virtue of his professional training, is capable of contributing to the course of Indonesian nation building. We can see here the process of a Chinese Catholic forming an identity by way of becoming an architect and an Indonesian. This process is individual as well as collective and social.

During the course of his studies in Europe, Han Awal met a generation of Indonesian architects who came from various ethnic backgrounds (such as Liem Bianpoen, Soewondo B. Sutedjo, Mustafa Pamoentjak, and Soejoedi Wiryoatmodjo). Together, they considered themselves not only engineers, but also intellectuals who (through their expertise) sought to find a "form" for the young nation of Indonesia. They constituted a group called ATAP (the roof), which signified their attempt to address issues of identity in architecture and the crisis of housing in Indonesia (see Soerjono Herlambang). They knew that they lived in the modern world by which their nation has been produced. Yet they also knew that as they were trained in the West, their challenge was not so much about knowledge transfer but more about the specific needs of Indonesia. Each of them in his own way sought to find a way to make their knowledge relevant for the specific context of Indonesia. Han Awal himself developed a special affinity for the language of modernist architecture as it speaks for the universal while embodying the specific functionality of human life. A modernist by intuition and inclination, Han Awal approaches architecture with a strong sense of place and locality. Like his immediate peers from the 1960s, Han Awal believes that architecture and space are constitutive elements for social change and nation building.

Returning to Indonesia in 1960 after obtaining his Diplom-Ingenieur (German equivalent of an M.S. degree), Han Awal took up practical training at the office of Kwee Hin Goan and the late Soenaryo Sosro where he continued his interaction with senior architect Liem Bwan Tjie (1891–1966). He assisted in several projects, including the design of CONEFO (today's parliament building complex — Gedung MPR/DPR [1964–72]), which was led by architect Soejoedi. To establish PT Han Awal and Partners in 1970, Han Awal finally settled in Jakarta where he by then had already designed many buildings — ranging from individual houses, schools, and churches to hospitals, pharmaceutical factories, and scientific research centres as well as conducted research on housing for the poor, and contributed his knowledge to universities in various cities of Java.

Han Awal is one of the first Indonesian modernists of the post colonial era who believe in the power of architecture and space in registering social change. He was a product of his time — a time when architectural choices were seen as intertwined with views of societal reform. For instance, the Catholic University of Atmajaya (which won an IAI award in 1984) was designed not only for the functionality of studying, but also to encourage students to interact outside the classroom. The plaza-like lobby at the ground level is the place for the teaching of "national subjects" as part of the efforts of nation building. The unifying open space, however, is not only meant for the glorification of unity under an authority, but is a space for the production of a "public sphere", where a critical body of students could interact, assemble, and even demonstrate against authority — a use of space that found expression in the students' protest of May 1998.

At a later stage of his career, starting from the 1980s when many buildings (of heritage value) had been torn down to make way for the rapid development of the city, Han Awal registered the importance of urban memory through a series of conservation and documentation of important buildings, such as the Cathedral of Jakarta, the Emmanuel Church, Bank of Indonesia, the church and parish house in Muntilan, and (with architects such as Budi Lim and Cor Passchier) the National Archive. He also contributed to the founding of the Centre for the Documentation of Architecture.

Han Awal continues to work prolifically while giving many students and young architects a space in which to flourish and contribute to the growth of the discipline. It is difficult to imagine how the practice of architecture in Indonesia could have developed without him providing his edge of discipline, commitment, and vision.

Han Min Yuan

(韩勉元, Han Mianyuan, 1936–)
Businessman, community leader, Brunei

Han Min Yuan is a prominent businessman in Belait District who made his fortune in the early part of his life as an entrepreneur in winery, in contrast to the majority of early immigrants who became ordinary shopkeepers. Out of the savings from his profits, he has diversified into investment in real estate and the wholesale of coffee powder through his network of coffee shops run by his fellow Hainanese throughout the state. Han was no ordinary immigrant to Brunei. He was educated in Wen Chang County (文昌县) in Hainan and very much influenced by his father, Han Bin Rao, who had been a teacher for some time before he ventured into the business of winery. Not only is the younger Han well read in Chinese history and literature, but he also has a gift for literary writing, especially poems in the traditional styles. Typical of traditional Chinese intellectuals, he is skilled in Chinese calligraphy and this skill is widely recognized as among the best in Brunei. Han Min Yuan is also an outstanding and influential community leader, who devotes much of his time, energy and money to community service, particularly to Chinese schools and associations.

After the founding of the People's Republic of China in 1949, emigration from mainland to Southeast Asia dropped drastically. This was due to tighter control and restrictions imposed by the British Colonial Government in Hong Kong. In 1953, on the instruction of his father, Han, aged seventeen, and accompanied by his mother, made his way to Brunei out of a sense of filial piety. He found the journey treacherous and frustrating because both of them were travelling out of their birthplace for the first time. Not accompanied by an experienced guide, they found that his ability to communicate only in the Hainan dialect was no passport to places such as Guangzhou, Shenzhen, and Hong Kong, and, above all, on board a ship bound for the nanyang (Chinese name for regions south of China, particularly, Southeast Asia). Han soon realized that once outside his Hainan-speaking sphere, he was hardly mobile and certainly not in the British Colony of Brunei where Cantonese-speaking folks were the majority.

In autumn the same year, Han qualified for admission into a secondary school designated by the local government. However he did not pursue this because the day after his arrival in Brunei, when he had settled down in Tutong District, halfway between Brunei Town (now called Bandar Seri Begawan) and Kuala Belait, his father had said to him: "Drop your idea of going to school. Follow me, it will be much better than studying in university." This command changed the course of his life.

His father was indeed a learned intellectual from China, a first-rate teacher, but definitely not cut out for business. After the Japanese were trounced by the Allied Forces in 1945, he decided to quit teaching. He started a winery in Tutong after acquiring the know-how in a winery in Kuching, Sarawak. By the time the son took over, it was on the verge of bankruptcy.

Undaunted, the younger Han plunged headlong into the world of business. His dream of continuing his secondary school education in Brunei no longer disturbed his peace of mind. He worked hard, from dawn till dusk, and very often right into the night. He personally performed the chores of preparing the water, steaming the rice, distilling the wine, cleaning the bottles, bottling, and labelling, right up to distributing the products to dealers and customers. He slogged and toiled away without any grudges. After six years, he had accumulated enough capital to move his operation to Seria, a booming oil town where he expected his sales to increase by expanding his plant.

1959 saw his rapid rise in Belait District. His brand of top quality wine, "Three Stars Fu Lu Shou", soon became well known throughout the state. It was so popular that very often rising demand outstripped its supply. For thirty-one years in Seria, his business was strong. Then quite unexpectedly, in 1991, seven years after the independence of Brunei, the government banned all alcoholic drinks on religious grounds. This was considered a step necessary in furtherance of its M.I.B. (Melayu Islam Beraja) Policy.

Circumstances compelled him to wind down his business but his charitable spirit kept him busy, helping out almost full-time in the affairs of the Hainan Association, and also as chairman of the management committee of Chung Cheng Middle School in Seria.

The Hainan Association, founded in 1939, is the oldest and — in terms of membership and size of its building — the biggest association in Belait District. Its building has gone through major changes in the course of its history. The present site is the scene of a seven-storey structure in the course of construction, expected to be completed soon.

Han is one of the pillars of this association. As its chairman since 1992, having been elected as a committee member (1967), secretary (1969), vice-chairman (1986–87), and chairman (1978) prior to that, he finds the present reconstruction project to be the most taxing and challenging. In his younger days, at the age of twenty-six, he had led the youth of the association to form a voluntary organization called, "Chinese and Western Music and Drama Society". Its activities attracted wide interest and support. He could sing and dance, act and direct. He was so versatile and active that he was considered the key figure of this society. Hence, every year in the early 1970s, the society was invited to put up performances to celebrate the birthday of His Highness the Sultan and for other major events such as fund-raising concerts for the construction of National Sport Stadium.

Han's outstanding leadership and perseverance were also recognized when he co-chaired the 10th Congress of World Federation of Hainanese Associations held in Brunei in October 2007. Almost all the Hainanese in Brunei were involved, and the three-day event attracted thirty-four associations from twenty-three countries and regions.

Han is a staunch supporter of Chinese education. He was elected school superintendent (1976–77) in the management committee of Chung Cheng Middle School in Seria, a booming oil town more populous than Kuala Belait, ten miles away. His talent and calibre were appreciated after his father was elected chairman for the first time in 1970. From then on, his responsibilities gradually grew and, by 1986, he was elected chairman. In that position, he wholeheartedly served the school for four years. Although his business was badly affected by a government regulation in 1991, he continued to pay contributions to the school. In 1996, Chung Cheng Middle School, in appreciation of his tremendous contributions, honoured him as its permanent honorary chairman. This was the first time such a position of great honour was created in the management committee of the school.

His interest to serve the public is wide ranging. He was the founder and regular contributor of Wu shu Wen Yuan (《五属文苑》), a monthly edition of art and literary writings published in Miri Daily (《美里日报》) and See Hwa Daily (《诗华日报》), both Chinese dailies from Sarawak, with a circulation in Brunei. This publication was jointly sponsored by the five dialect-based associations namely, Cantonese, Hainanese, Fuzhou, Hakka, and Taipu, and each association's chairman or his representative takes turn to lead the editorial team of the bulletin, which has been in existence since 1998. As of May 2009, it had published 122 issues regularly without fail. It plays an important role in promoting Chinese literature and culture and also provides a training ground for students and youth who wish to enhance their skills in writing.

In Brunei, Han plays important roles in various organizations such as the Chinese Chamber of Commerce Kuala Belait, Chinese Charitable Institute, Seria Town, and Country Consultative Committee.

Han hails from Hainan, and like all Hainanese, he cares for his land of birth and has done quite a bit to contribute to his homeland. He has been appointed officially and by private bodies on a number of occasions to honorary positions such as adviser and researcher to South East Asia Study Centre of Hainan University, vice-chairman of The Confederation of World Hainanese Associations, and joint chairman of the 10th Congress of World Hainanese Associations. He was twice conferred the award of "The innocent son that loves Hainan" (爱琼赤子) by the Hainan Provincial Government. His role in promoting understanding, friendship, and mutual interest among fellow Hainanese worldwide is clearly acknowledged.

He has been residing in Brunei for fifty-three years so far and is permanent resident, but not a citizen. He is holding a passport issued by the British Government in which he is described as a British Overseas Citizen, a dubious status he has held since the days when Brunei was a British protectorate.

Han is happily married to Fu Liang Ying and they have three children — two sons and a daughter.

Hàng Vay Chi

(杭慰瑶, Hang Weiyao, 1950–)

Business leader, promoter of Chinese education, Vietnam

HàngVay Chi is one of the five pioneering developers of industrial parks in Vietnam, who responded swiftly to the industrialization initiatives of the Vietnamese Government and successfully developed industrial parks. He has about 300 employees on the payroll of his management offices and 1,300 workers in his factories, and is a keen player in the global market.

Chi is a man who acts swiftly on his vision and entrepreneurial instincts. He admits that he is not a "technical man", but is always keen to map and maximize the use of local resources with global market opportunities. He never loses sight of global trends and keeps abreast of current information and market movements — a factor which has certainly defined his successful moves in business.

In the mid-1990s when export processing zones were just a nascent industrial phenomenon and industrial parks were less known in Vietnam, Chi took a bold step forward and proposed his idea of establishing an industrial park to the authorities. His proposal was received with caution by friends, but the local government rendered full support and the execution of his business plan went smoothly. He was given an international visa which allowed him to travel far and wide around the world and as frequently as he wanted. This was a privilege only enjoyed by government officials at the time. Capital-wise, his investment was aided by the founder and chairman of the Malaysia-based bank, Public Bank Berhad (大众银行), Tan Sri Dato' Sri Dr Teh Hong Piow (郑鸿标), who supported him with a substantial loan. The Malaysian bank was one of the earliest foreign banks that ventured into Vietnam; Vietnam is also one of the three countries where the bank's subsidiaries and associated companies are located. Chi did not have to look far to build his international customer base as he had strategically established his business network even before his conception of the industrial park.

His parents had fled Guangxi province in China and arrived in Saigon in the 1940s during World War II and his family has lived for more than seventy years in Vietnam since then. Chi was born in 1950 in Saigon, the present Ho Chi Minh City. He received his primary, secondary, and high school education at the Huicheng schools, which were located at the present-day Mạch Kiếm Hùng School. Huicheng Secondary School (惠城中学) was the second Chinese-medium school to be founded in Saigon in 1910. The schools were established, as well as supported, by Saigon's Cantonese native-place association, Hội Quán Huệ Thành (Huicheng Huiguan 惠城会馆), before the unification of Vietnam in 1975. Chi's wife is an ethnic Chinese of Fujianese heritage.

Chi enjoyed reading when he was young and used to frequent a library of Chinese books (中华图书馆) located in Phùng Hưng Street, the current location of the printing house of the Saigon Liberation Press. At the age of seventeen in 1967, he was already working as a correspondent for the Japanese press, but he later pursued his tertiary education at the Vietnam Economics University. After graduation, he covered economics and war news as a correspondent, and claimed to have contributed articles to the six Chinese-language papers that existed in Saigon then, as well as to the Singapore-based Chinese-language paper, Nanyang Siang Pau. He explained that the prolific presence of foreign-based press in Saigon and the ample opportunities for him as a correspondent then was due to great interest in the world on the war that was taking place in Vietnam. After the unification of Vietnam in 1976, the pen that he used to write war stories became a tool for signing business documents and bank cheques — as he figuratively summarized the trajectory in his career following the political and economic changes in his country.

From 1972 to 1975, Chi was general manager of Tân Nga Electric and Cable Group, the largest electrical cable and wires company in Saigon at the time. After Vietnam's unification, he became manager of Sở Công Nghiệp — the Bureau of Industries — in Ho Chi Minh City for two years. In 1979, he started a production unit with seven workers making instant noodles. In the next decade, which saw a gradual liberalization of economic policies, he dabbled in the timber and wicket furniture export business and in a rice export company, which exported to the Middle-East and Indonesia. Later he also started a hotel called "Universal" which had forty-five rooms. When rooms for rent and hotels for foreigners were rare and needed special permits, his hotel received numerous Asian guests, mainly Taiwanese who frequently travelled to Vietnam. These Taiwanese guests would later make up 70 per cent of the tenants in his industrial park.

In 1996, Chi inaugurated his first 45-hectare industrial park in the rural commune of Thuận Giao, Bình Dương province, creating the infrastructure for small- and medium-sized light industries, such as exporters of shoes, garments, and plastic. He named it "Việt Hương Industrial Park 1". In 2004, construction on a 250-hectare land area was completed for the second industrial park, "Việt Hương Industrial Park 2". The new industrial park received attention from a more diverse group of investors and larger enterprises, thanks to the lifting of the U.S. trade embargo against Vietnam in 1994 and the restoration of diplomatic relations between two countries in 1995, which led to the reopening of the U.S. embassy in Hanoi 1996. However, competition has since become tougher for Chi as the number of industrial parks in Vietnam grew from ten at the time he inaugurated his first industrial park to 150 today.

Another industrial park situated along the border of Long An province in the Mekong Delta is in the pipeline for Chi. The industrial park will occupy 500 hectares of land and will cost US$100 million in total investment. Following the numerical order of the company's investments, it will be named "Việt Hương Industrial Park 3". The investment will specially cater to producers of textile, garments, yarn, and raw materials. The entire investment is believed to create 30,000 new jobs.

Chi's interest in creating this special zone for textile and garments is part of a larger business strategy. He currently owns a garment and a textile factory called Việt Long and Việt Hồng, which employ 1,000 and 300 workers respectively. The textile business was established in 2006 and the garment, in 2008. The garment and textile sector has proven attractive for Chi as he claimed there are currently only two big players in the southern region of Vietnam. His factories produce jeans only for export to his American customers, such as JC Penny and Perry Ellis. The domestic market in Vietnam consumes only the denim and jeans fabric that his factory produces. Based on his observation and calculation that every youth in Vietnam desires a pair of jeans, he continues to see great potential in his role as a jeans manufacturer. He acknowledges, however, that manufacturers in China are injecting more competition into the global and domestic markets, and believes that innovative technology is the way to counter the competition. To further participate in infrastructural development, he has ventured into the construction industry and owns two construction companies, with a subsidiary that deals in interior design.

As Chi establishes more industrial parks, his experience and confidence grow. He recognizes that branding and service are two areas that have concomitantly become an integral part of his business. In the future, he hopes to list his group of companies on the Vietnamese stock market when it expands and becomes more established. Although his company, Công ty Cổ phần Việt Hương, bears the words "joint-stock company", it is a privately owned enterprise in essence. Two years ago, his younger daughter, who studied finance in the United States, began assisting him in his business. His elder daughter, who studied nursing in the United States, is currently working in a hospital in San Francisco.

In addition to managing his portfolio of businesses, Chi finds time to support the Chinese Language Centre, informally called Qixiu School (胡志明市启秀华文中心), currently located at the secondary school, Trường Phổ thông Nam Kỳ Khởi Nghĩa, in Ho Chi Minh City. The Qixiu Chinese Language Centre is the typical post-unification (1975–76) Chinese language school that one can find in Vietnam. Its pre-unification prototype was established by Huaxian (花县) migrants from Guangdong province. Both former and current organizations have been managed and supported by the Guangdong bang (clan). Chi has been chairman of the said Chinese Language Centre for eighteen years. He hopes to retire in the future as a writer or teacher in Hong Kong, China, and/or Vietnam, although he does not know when.

Hann Khieng

(韩强畴, Han Qiangchou, 1949–)

Engineer, entrepreneur, Cambodia

Hann Khieng is a prominent corporate leader and is a well known figure in the Chinese community for his contributions to the education sector of Cambodia. Hann was born on 3 May 1949 to Hann Kongti and Hann Kit Houy, in Mittapheap District, Sihanoukville. His parents had immigrated to Cambodia due to the civil war in China. They became farmers after settling down in Cambodia. When he was a young boy, Hann's family was poor and there was no school in the village where they lived. His father tried to find ways to provide him with a Chinese education but he still ended up in a Cambodian school in a neighbouring village. After he had studied there for a few years, his father managed to save some money to send him to Juimin School in Kampot District to attend Chinese language classes. He was one of the luckier kids in his village to be able to continue his studies outside his town.

A second generation Cambodian Chinese of Hainanese descent, Hann has spent a noticeable part of his life overseas. In the 1970s, when Cambodia was ravaged by war, the U.S.-backed Lon Nol government started to look for young male Cambodians to join his army for the war. Hann could not escape and was forced to join the 13th battalion.

In 1972 he married Lim Sokly and had three children with her. In 1975, after the collapse of the Lon Nol government, thousands of refugees started pouring across the Thai border into Thailand. Hann seized this opportunity to seek asylum in Thailand with his children, but had to leave his wife behind due to her poor health. It was in 1978 when several countries offered refugees from the camp a fresh start that Hann and his children gained resettlement status in New Zealand. They lived there for five years before migrating to Australia in 1985. Thereafter, they obtained permanent residence status in Australia. While Hann was living in New Zealand, he had started a McDonalds Fast Food Restaurant franchise in Palmerston North. Between 1986 and 1988 he expanded his business in Melbourne to include a business in dry-cleaning and laundry in Sunshine Road, and another fast food restaurant in Ringwood Road.

Meanwhile in Cambodia, after more than two decades of war, the political situation began to stabilize in 1992 and calls for rebuilding the country spread internationally. Hann responded and returned to Cambodia to start a new life. As a returnee to his homeland, he said: "Cambodia is my home, I was nurtured in this land, now that the war was over, I have to come back to help my country." Hann felt that the first task for nation recovery was to repair and rebuild the country's infrastructure. This was what pushed him to invest in the rock business because rocks are one of the essential construction materials for the repair and reconstruction of building and roads. Soon he joined his Cambodian and foreign counterparts to establish Cambodia Stone Crushing Industries Co. Ltd. Consecutively; he went into joint ventures with friends to set up Lean Kheang Import-Export Co. Ltd, and Sun Khieng Import-Export Co. Ltd.

In 1995 Hann ventured into civil engineering when he partnered Malaysian and Cambodian counterparts to establish Muhibbah Masteron Cambodia J.V. Ltd (MMC) and Muhibbah Engineering (Cambodia) Co. Ltd (MEC). He is currently executive director of MEC. Hann also chanced upon a joint venture project with a French partner to secure a concession agreement from the Cambodian Government to build the Phnom Penh International Airport. This was followed by the task of managing the airport for a period of twenty-five years. Subsequently the royal Government of Cambodia in 2000 included the development of the Siem Reap Angkor International Airport in the concession. In mid-2006, Sihanoudvilla Airport was also included in the concession and the management period was extended up to 2040. To date, the investment in the airport concession totals US$150 million.

In June 2007 Hann signed a US$4.5 billion land reclamation contract with the Chinese Government to reclaim a 680-hectare piece of land for estate development at Sihanouk Harbour, and to construct a 16-kilometre highway that runs from Phnom Penh city to Phnom Penh International Airport. His company was also entrusted with revamping Boulevard Mao Tse Toung and the National Theatre building. He also cooperated with the Asian Development Bank (ADB) to repair and reconstruct highways no. 1, no. 2, no. 5, no. 6, and no. 7 that covers a total distance of 600 kilometres. In the process of repairing and reconstructing Boulevard Mao Tse Toung, instead of profiting from the project, MEC poured in US$170,000 on a goodwill basis for the construction work.

Hann also contributes extensively to social services and is an active member of the Association of Hainan. In 1992, while he was reviewing a school revamp plan at the association, the poor facilities of Jichen Chinese schools were pointed out to him. This school built and managed by the association had been damaged during the war. He immediately decided to donate US$50,000 to help repair and rebuild the school facilities. In recognition of his contribution to the school's reconstruction, he was made permanent adviser of the association. In 2006 Hann also responded to a call by the Embassy of China for donations to a Cambodian educational fund for the Chinese community in Cambodia known as the Cambodia Chinese Education Foundation. He generously gave US$10,000.

In recognition of his contributions to Cambodia, Hann has been given several national and international awards. To name a few, for example, he was bestowed the title, Oknha, by King Preah Bat Norodom Sihanouk Varman on 5 July 1999, through Royal Degree no. NS/RKR.0799/143. An oknha is equivalent to "lord" in England. It is a respectable title bestowed by the king on someone who has rendered an honourable service to the nation. On 1 July 2003, he was awarded the Gold Medal of Sthapnacheat for "Building the Nation", by the Royal Government of Cambodia under Sub-degree no. 606. Next, the Confederation of Asia-Pacific Chambers of Commerce and Industry on 19 May 2004 gave Hann Khieng the CACCI Platinum Award for his entrepreneurship in contributing to the economic growth of Cambodia. Then on 16 March 2006 he received the Medal Monisaraphoan, Class Assarith, from the Royal Government of Cambodia under sub-degree no. 176. Last but not least, he was bestowed the Medal Monisaraphoan, Class Moha Sereiwadh, by the Royal Government of Cambodia in January 2008.

In 2007 Hann partnered the K.T. Pacific Group (represented by Senator Kong Triv) to sign a contract with China Petrochemical Corporation to build a petroleum factory with an estimated annual capacity of 200 million tonnes of petroleum to enhance the oil demand in the country. Production commenced in 2009.

Currently Hann holds the following key positions in different organizations: deputy director of the Council of China's Foreign Trade; vice-chairman of the Cambodia Chamber of Commerce; vice-chairman of the Phnom Penh Chamber of Commerce; vice-chairman of the Cambodia SME Sub-committee; honorary resident of the Federated Association of Chinese of Cambodia; honorary member of the ASEAN Federation of Engineering Organization, and vice-president of the Chamber of Professional and Micro Enterprises of Cambodia.

Hardjonagoro

(Go Tik Swan, 吳德宣, Wu Dexuan, 1931–)
Expert on Javanese culture, Indonesia

Go Tik Swan Hardjonagoro (also spelled Hardjonegoro) is a leading expert in Javanese culture, especially batik and Javanese daggers (keris, also known as tosan aji). The Sunan (ruler) of Surakarta has conferred on him a Javanese title and name for his contributions to Javanese culture.

Born in Surakarta on 11 May 1931, Go lived as a child with his grandfather on his mother's side, Tjan Khay Sing, who was a migrant from China and a leading batik manufacturer in Solo. His grandmother was a Peranakan Chinese originating from Surakarta. Go was sent to the Dutch Neutrale Europese Lagere School (NELS) in Surakarta for seven years. It was an elite school and most of his classmates were members of the Solo royalty with whom Go continued to be friends after they left school. When he was still at his birthplace, his grandfather was a close friend of Gusti Hadidjojo and Prabuwikoto, two well known experts in keris in Surakarta from whom Go learned a lot about the artefact. He also learned Javanese traditional dance from Prabuwinata, a leading dance teacher. After his primary education at a Dutch school, Go was sent to Semarang to study at MULO and Voorbereiden Hogere School (VHS).

Despite his Dutch education, Go was especially interested in Javanese culture and chose to enter the Faculty of Arts, University of Indonesia (FSUI) in 1953. However his father, Go Dhiam Ik, and mother, Tjan Ging Nio, wanted him to study economics and become a businessman so that he would be able to live a comfortable life. Go did not follow his parents' advice and persisted in studying Javanese culture. As a result, he and his parents were not close. They only reconciled after he became well known.

Go studied under two well known Javanese professors at UI, viz. Tjan Tjoe Siem, a specialist in Javanese Studies who was also a Muslim, and Poerbatjaraka, a leading expert in Javanese ancient history and culture. However, due to his involvement in dances and batik, he only studied up to the third year of the university course, and thereafter pursued his own interests in dance, designs, making batik, and collecting Javanese antiques. When he was still a university student, he took part in many Javanese dance performances and headed the cultural section of the Students' Council at the FSUI. In 1955, he put up a dance performance in the presidential palace which made an impression on President Soekarno, and hence became a frequent visitor to the palace. His performance of Javanese dances was made into a documentary by the Indonesian State Film Company (Perusahaan Film Negara, PFN) and shown in the cinemas as a publicity film.

President Soekarno was aware of Go's background in batik and suggested to him that he create an Indonesian batik (Batik Indonesia) rather than the regional batiks such as Batik Solo, Batik Yogya (Yogyakarta), Batik Pekalongan, Batik Lasem, and Batik Ceribon. Go, who was an admirer of Soekarno, thus felt that it was his duty to create "Batik Indonesia". He conducted surveys at various places and visited the mausoleum of a Javanese saint for inspiration. Eventually he produced the so-called "batik Indonesia" by incorporating the characteristics of the Palace Batik (Batik Kraton, that is, Batik Solo-Yogya) and the northern coastal batik (Batik Pekalongan). He made the Batik Kraton more colourful rather than just black or white-based and succeeded in transforming the Indonesian classical batik by perfecting the colours and improving the techniques of making it.

In the 1960s he won a competition in Javanese decorative arts sponsored by the Jakarta municipal government. He held many exhibitions on batik and the keris within and outside Indonesia. In 1964, he was even sent by President Soekarno to hold a cultural exhibition at the New York World Fair. When Soekarno was detained in Bogor Palace after the 1965 coup, Go visited the former president who was then accompanied by only Hartini. Worrying about Go's safety, Soekarno asked him not to pay another visit. That was the last time the two men saw each other.

In September 1972 Go was ordered by the Sunan of Surakarta (Susuhunan Paku Buwono XII) to visit the palace in traditional Javanese dress, to be honoured as a bupati anom kraton (palace regent), and be conferred the title, Kanjeng Raden Temenggung (KRT), and the Javanese name, Hardjonagoro. He was the first Peranakan Chinese to be given that honour for his cultural expertise. The fame of Hardjonagoro as a batik designer and expert won him many invitations. In March 1979 he was invited to the United States by the Textile Museum in New York to give a keynote speech on traditional batik. On that occasion, Hardjonagoro also presented twenty pieces of his own batik works to the Metropolitan Museum of Arts in New York through the Indonesian embassy. The director of the New York Museum was so pleased that he wanted to present Hardjonagoro with a gift in return and asked him what gift would make him happiest. Hardjonagoro said that he would feel happiest if he could visit Mecca and Medina. The director then arranged for him to travel to Saudi Arabia before returning to Jakarta. In 1984 Hardjonagoro went to Mecca again to perform a small haj (pilgrimage).

Hardjonagoro lives in a big house near the Surakarta palace. It was the property of his grandfather who gave it to Hardjonagoro's mother, and Hardjonagoro inherited it from his mother. Since the 1960s he has rebuilt the same house many times and has made it into some kind of a museum. All his important artefacts and exhibits are kept there. He has even prepared a will that he would donate all of his collections to the state with two conditions: first, everything is to be taken over by the state after he passes away, and second, all of his collections should be kept in Solo. "This is to show his love for his birthplace."

Hardjonagoro's parents in Bandung eventually came to visit him and were reconciled with their son as he had brought the Go family a good name. They even wanted him to celebrate their golden wedding anniversary with them. Hardjonagoro was so happy that he requested that he perform a Javanese traditional ceremony in Surakarta with them during which they would not have to wear Javanese costumes. His parents had no objections. It was a happy family gathering.

Hardjonagoro runs a batik factory and is the curator of Museum Radyapusaka, a Javanese museum built by a high official during Pakubuwana IX's reign in 1890. His rich experience has been recorded in his autobiography entitled, Jawa Sejati Otobiografi Go Tik Swan Hardjonagoro (A True Javanese: Autobiography of Go Tik Swan Hardjonagoro) as told to Rustopo, a professor at the Institute of Arts in Surakarta. The book was published in 2008.

Harsono, FX

(Oh Hong Boen, 胡丰文, Hu Fengwen, 1949–)

Founding Member of New Art Movement, artist, Indonesia

FX Harsono is hailed as one of the most important contemporary Indonesian artists who emerged during the Soeharto period, first as an innovator and social critic, and later as an artist in search of an identity.

FX Harsono was born on 22 March 1949 in Blitar, East Java, and given the Chinese name, Oh Hong Boen. His father, Oh Hok Tjoe, ran a photo studio; his mother, Lim Swan Nio, a devout Catholic, was a housewife. Harsono or Oh Hong Boen, was baptized when he was a baby and given the name, Fransiskus Xaverius (FX). But he continued to use his Chinese name until the Soeharto government's name-changing regulation in 1966, which saw Harsono, his parents, and his siblings changing their Chinese names to "Indonesian names". He then used his baptized name and gave himself a new Indonesian name, Harsono.

As a boy, Harsono was sent to a Chinese school known as Jiao Yu in his birthplace for two years before being transferred to Hua Jiao where he studied for another year. In 1957 there was a government regulation stipulating that from 1958 onwards, Indonesians of Chinese descent (WNI) would not be allowed to attend Chinese-medium schools and Harsono was affected by this regulation. In 1958, when he was in Primary 4, he was transferred to a Catholic Primary School called Santa Maria. Although he had been sent to Chinese schools for a few years, he could only remember his name in Chinese. Born into a Peranakan Chinese family where the home language was the Indonesian local language (in his case, Javanese) and Indonesian, Harsono was brought up in a Peranakan Chinese environment and was hence little exposed to the totok Chinese culture.

At the Catholic school in Blitar, Harsono learned drawing and painting. He took part in church-related activities and, when he was at the SMA Katolik Diponegoro, joined the Catholic students association. During the political upheaval in 1965, he was in the first year of SMA. After the banning of the Communist Party of Indonesia (PKI), all non-communist and anti-communist students and youth organizations were grouped under KAPPI (Kesatuan Aksi Pelajar dan Pemuda Indonesia, Indonesian students and Youth Union) and organized to safeguard churches and demonstrate against the Soekarno government. He later came to realize that the Soeharto government (1966–98) was much more repressive than that of the Old Order (1959–65).

In 1969 Harsono was admitted to the STSRI ASRI, or the Sekolah Tinggi Seni

Rupa Indonesia (STSRI) ASRI (Indonesian College of Art ASRI), in Yogyakarta where he studied fine arts. It was in this college that he began to develop his talent in art. He and his fellow students were also exposed to new ideas. More importantly, they were exposed to politics. STSRI ASRI was then under the control of established artists who were very conventional and wanted to depoliticize art. In 1974 the First National Exhibition of Indonesian Visual Art (Pameran Besar Seni Lukis Indonesia 1) was held in Taman Ismail Marzuki, Jakarta. Harsono and his fellow artists declared "The Black December Manifesto" in opposition to the jury's decision that favoured the works by established artists. The manifesto urged artists to be "oriented towards social, cultural and economic realities", and to "explore various creative ways to arrive at new perspectives in Indonesian new painting". This revolutionary idea conflicted with the traditional view held by the college. As a result, the signatories to the manifesto from STSRI ASRI were suspended from attending the college. However Harsono had by then completed his diploma course.

In August 1975, this group of young artists, including five from ITB and seven from STSRI ASRI (which included Harsono), held an exhibition in Taman Ismail Marzuki, Jakarta, where they officially announced the formation of the Gerakan Seni Rupa Baru (GSRB New Art Movement), advocating the elimination of the distinctions between painting, graphics, and sculpture, abandoning the elitist view on arts, and creating a new Indonesian art form in which Indonesian characteristics and contents would be highlighted. The GSRB disbanded itself in 1979 due to internal conflict, but its ideas had spread and Harsono and his group continued to produce significant works. In 1985 Arief Budiman and friends advocated the category of contextual art/literature in Indonesia, and in 1987 they included GSRB in the category of contextual art. Indonesian artists thus began to be aware of this new concept.

As mentioned earlier, during the Soeharto era, the government's attempt to depoliticize art was unsuccessful. Harsono and his generation of artists wanted to depict social injustice and repression through their art. Harsono produced his works using the new concept and new techniques and his works impressed many artists in Indonesia. Between 1987 and 1991 he studied at the Institut Kesenian Jakarta (Jakarta Institute of Art) and obtained his BA degree in 1992. Since 1973 he has participated in numerous group exhibitions with like-minded young artists.

Increasingly he felt the injustices in the New Order and the military suppression, and he continued to produce works depicting this situation. A number of these works, such as "The Relaxed Chain" dated 1975, "Power and the Oppressed" dated 1992, and "Voice without Voice/Sign" dated 1993–94, impressed the critics. His works during the Soeharto era were mainly social commentaries which made the authorities uncomfortable. However he took the view that it was his mission as an artist to expose the sufferings of the population.

The 1998 anti-Chinese riots, followed by the fall of Soeharto and the dawn of Indonesian modern history, had a profound impact on Harsono. The anti-Chinese sentiment did not go away and Chinese Indonesians were still targeted. Although he was assimilated culturally, Harsono began to search for his own identity. Thus, after the fall of Soeharto, many of his works dealt with Chinese culture in Indonesia. There was an impressive work (2011) in which he was depicted holding an ink brush and writing his name in Chinese characters hundreds of times as they were being washed away by the rain.

Apparently he had spent time to reflect about Chinese Indonesians during the Soeharto period and came to realize that the Soeharto government systematically eradicated Chineseness in Indonesia by changing Chinese names to "Indonesian names", banning the pillars of Chinese culture, forgetting everything Chinese, and discriminating against ethnic Chinese.

Harsono began to be recognized outside Indonesia as one of the nation's top contemporary artists in 1992 when he took part in a group exhibition in Australia. Since then he has become a frequent participant in group exhibitions in Japan, South Korea, China, the Netherlands, Italy, Canada, and the United States. He has also held thirteen solo exhibitions since 1994, three of which were held overseas: In 2009 Vanessa Art Link in Beijing organized an exhibition on "Surviving Memories"; in 2010 he was invited to hold an exhibition at the Singapore Museum titled, "Harsono: Testimonies", which displayed his major works before and after 1998; in 2012, Tyler Rollins Fine Arts presented Harsono's first solo exhibition titled, "Writing in the Rain", in New York City.

Since 2005 FX Harsono has been teaching at the Faculty of Art and Design, the University of Pelita Harapan, Tangerang, West Java. He is married to Hesti Purbaningsih, an ethnic Javanese. They have two daughters and one son.

Hasan, Mohammad Bob

(The Kian Seng, 郑坚盛, Zheng Jiansheng, 1931–)

Timber king, Soeharto's cabinet minister, promoter of sports, Indonesia

Mohammad Hasan, better known in Indonesia as Bob Hasan, was a leading businessman during the Soeharto era, the last minister of trade and industry in the Soeharto Pembangunan VI Cabinet, and a jogging enthusiast who promoted athletic activities in Indonesia.

Bob Hasan is a Chinese Indonesian who was born in Semarang, Central Java, in February 1931. He changed his name to Mohammad Hasan when he converted to Islam. There is no information about his education background. However his association with the Indonesian military started early as an adopted son of General Gatot Subroto, the former commander of the Diponegoro Division in Central Java. The general introduced him to Soeharto who later succeeded Gatot to head the division.

After Soeharto became president, Bob Hasan began to expand his business, mainly in the forestry sector. According to Adam Schwarz, by the 1990s, Hasan had held control over some two million hectares of forests, mainly in Kalimantan. He was also president of several associations: Asosiasi Panel Kayu Lapis Indonesia (Apkindo, the Indonesian Plywood Association), Indonesian Rattan Association, Indonesian Sawmills Association, and Asosiasi Pengusaha Hutan Indonesia (APHI, The Indonesian Forest Concessionaries Association). As such, he succeeded in influencing, if not controlling, the plywood industry in Indonesia and beyond as Indonesia was then exporting three thirds of the supply of plywood to the world.

According to Zibenjia, the Chinese edition of Forbes, Hasan had control over two groups of companies: the Bob Hasan Group and the Pasopati, the major shareholder of which was Sigit Harjojudanto, President Soeharto's eldest son. Tempo, however, stated that Hasan owned and had investments in twenty to thirty companies which included Kalimanis Plywood, PT Pasopati Holding Company, PT Wasesa Lines, PT Karana Shipping lines, PT Hutan Nusantara, and PT Lifetime Assembly of Watch and Electrical Equipment. The companies were engaged in a variety of businesses such as chemicals, paper manufacturing, steel, construction, transportation, hotels, and insurance.

Bob Hasan is a sports enthusiast and has been sponsoring athletic activities in Indonesia. He was elected by the SIWO/PWI Jaya (Indonesian Journalists Association, Jakarta) as the best promoter of sports (Pembina Olahraga Terbaik) twice — in 1980 and 1984. He has also served as chairman of PASI (Persatuan Atelit Seluruh Indonesia or Indonesian Athletes Association) since 1978. In January 1984 he was elected deputy chairman of the Asian Amateur Athletes Association (AAAA). Five months later he received a gold award from the West German Athletes Association for "his promotion in enhancing the relations between Indonesian and West German athletes". In 1985 Hasan and two other Indonesians were awarded "Best Promoter of Sports" by the Soeharto government. In 1994 he was elected a member of the International Olympic Committee (IOC).

Hasan's involvement in sports was accidental. According to Tempo, he began taking up athletic activities after he had suffered a back pain. A friend of his suggested that he took up exercises so he began to do some running and the pains went. Since then he has been running at least five kilometres a day. "If I don't run, my whole body aches," he says. His love of running led to his contact with PASI and since 1978 he has served as its president. The first thing he did in this role was to popularize running. He hoped that through his promotion of the sport Indonesia would produce good athletes who could compete in the international arena. His efforts bore fruit: a number of well known athletes in Indonesia were able to compete in the 1984 Olympic in Los Angeles although they did not do too well. Hasan admitted that Indonesian athletes were still behind other ASEAN athletes, especially those from Malaysia and the Philippines. He suggested that athletic activities be included in the school curriculum so that Indonesia would be able to produce world-class athletes. He also sent Indonesian athletes overseas for training, invited foreign coaches to train them and donated million of dollars to promoting sports, especially athletic events in the country.

Although popular in the sports arena, Hasan was disliked in business circles. Still, President Soeharto, who had refused to appoint Chinese Indonesians to his cabinet, eventually did appoint one — Bob Hasan. In early 1998, a few months before he stepped down under international pressure, Soeharto reshuffled his cabinet and announced the line-up of the new cabinet on 16 March 1998, with Hasan as his new minister of trade and industry. Soeharto was criticized by many domestic and foreign observers who did not think Hasan was capable of salvaging the Indonesian economy which was in crisis. In fact, the cabinet was dissolved after two months and five days, being the shortest Soeharto government ever and coinciding with the downfall of Soeharto on 22 May 1998.

After Soeharto was forced to step down, Hasan was involved in a series of court cases. He was the first member of the Soeharto group who was put on trial. According to The Jakarta Post, on 2 February 2001 the three judges of the Central Jakarta District Court found Hasan guilty of misusing US$75million in the funds belonging to the Ministry of Forestry. He was sentenced to two years' imprisonment by the court and ordered to pay a 15 million-rupiah fine and return 14.1 billion rupiah to the state. The prosecutors had earlier sought an eight-year prison term for Hasan, along with a 30-million-rupiah fine and an obligatory repayment of US$243.7 million in state loses.

They therefore appealed to the Jakarta High Court against the verdict. Hasan was then sentenced to six years in prison and ordered to pay compensations amounting to US$243.7 million. This sentence was upheld by the Supreme Court. In March 2001, Baharuddin Lopa, then minister of justice and human rights, sent Hasan to Nusakambangan Island, a maximum security prison, "to deter other corruptors". Hasan's sentence was however, reduced several times and he was supposed to be released by 3 January 2005, but was freed on parole on 19 February 2004. After his release, he continued to be active in promoting Indonesian sports, especially athletic events and was re-elected chairman of PASI for a seventh term. He then proposed a programme to improve the performance of Indonesian athletes by giving subsidies to promising male and female athletes, and searching for young talents. In addition, he also obtained a commitment from the state bank to give subsidies to all other athletes. He remains as chairman of PASI until today. On 30 October 2011, an eighty-year old Hasan launched his first book, Why Am I Healthy? (Mengapa Saya Sehat?) at the Stadium Senayan in Jakarta. His old acquaintances, many of whom had retired from the military, as well as businessmen/women, medical professionals, and athletes came to celebrate the occasion. He stated that he was not really interested in writing an autobiography, but merely wanted to "share his experience on how to live a healthy and balanced life which I have been doing all along".

Hasan is married to Pertiwi and they have two children.

Hau Chiok and Sy Chiu Hua

(施荣宣, Shi Rongxuan, 1932–)
Painter, Philippines
(林玉琦, Lin Yuqi, 1946–)
Artist, Philippines

Hau Chiok, the eldest of four siblings was born in Huafeng, Jinjiang, Fujian, on 3 March 1932. A first-generation Chinese Filipino, Hau had always been fascinated with painting. As a child, he copied drawings from art books or other people's paintings and won first prizes for drawing in primary school. His businessman father had told Hau to focus on learning how to do business instead of wasting money on paint and paper as he was expected to carry on with his father's business.

A filial son, Hau did as he was expected even though his heart was not in it. Despite his father's opposition, views and objections, he developed his craft, first doing it part-time and later on by teaching. Mostly self-taught (in the academic aspects), he studied painting in the 1960s under Ling Nan school master Zhao Shao Ang of Hong Kong, and Singapore master finger-painter Wu Zai Yan. He also started teaching art at Minjiang Art Studio.

In 1980 he founded the Philippine Contemporary Chinese Art Association and the Ling Nan Art Association of the Philippines. He and his wife, Sy Chiu Hua (林玉琦), are frequently invited to demonstrate and introduce Chinese art on television, and radio stations and through newspapers, websites, universities, and museums.

Hau has been described as a "beacon of tranquility". There is refinement in his paintings, simplicity, coupled with a "delicate skill in rendering subjects without sacrificing vigor". His paintings constantly show a Filipino theme. This seemingly paradoxical quality is what defines Hau: a rare Filipino "master of Chinese painting" practising his art in this hybrid milieu. For him, an artist draws inspiration from life and nature and the environment he lives in. Hau's reflections on society and the era he lives in come out through his paintings, a result which is as individual as his own self.

It is important for Hau that his students be imbued with Chinese philosophy, and are able to perceive something deeper than just a view; otherwise they cannot do full justice to a painting.

An example is a painting of an eagle devouring chicks. The eagle is a metaphor for people who take advantage of the weak, in this case, the chicks. Thus, the painting is not simply a painting, but prods the viewer to further reflection. On various occasions, Hau has served as director, secretary general, consultant, and judge at various art museums and art organizations in the Philippines and abroad. His works are often featured in different magazines and books and have been exhibited both locally and internationally in museums. His painting, "Tiger", was published in Selected Works of Famous Overseas Chinese Artists in 1985. World News, a Chinese-language daily newspaper in the Philippines, began serializing (since 1987) his "Techniques of Chinese Painting" bi-weekly.

In adulthood, he has won several art competitions. He received an award for excellence in the field of Art and Culture in the 2004 Dr Jose P. Rizal Awards for Excellence organized by The Manila Times and Kaisa Para sa Kaunlaran. In 2006, he attained the title of "Chinese Contemporary Master" from the World Federation of Overseas Chinese Organizations in Beijing.

Hau's partner in life fittingly is an artist herself. Sy Chiu Hua (林玉琦) has won multiple awards in numerous international competitions (2003–05). She is a second-generation Chinese who was born on 4 August 1946 in the Philippines and whose father hails from Nan'an, Fujian. She began painting as a hobby and first studied Chinese painting under several masters — Yang Geng Tang and later Hau Chiok, Taiwan's Hu Nian Zu, and Singapore's finger-painter, Wu Zai Yan. Her family had initially expressed doubt and scepticism when she ventured into fine arts after studying pre-medicine at the University of the Philippines (U.P.) (1964–68) as they questioned whether she could make a living out of a non-business career. She proved them wrong and stands out as an artist today.

Sy understood why her parents reacted that way. She reflected on the different generations of Chinese-Filipinos and how their needs changed with each succeeding generation. First-generation Chinese in the Philippines needed opportunity and survival. But for her, of the second generation, times have become more stable and roots have been established. It is no longer survival that her generation needs, but a reaching out for more. She achieves this through painting, which for Sy, fills a need to express herself visually as an artist.

Sy describes art as a form of expression. Cave art and or images in old ceramic pieces all show the urge to express through a medium. The subject is actually a microcosm of the world and the universe; through the artist's eyes we see the subject in a new light and perspective. The Chinese view of heaven-man in harmony, and the idea of painting from the heart are fundamental and vital.

Sy's art is a blend of both Chinese and western influences. Exposed to both, she incorporates and derives the best from each. She once described painting as a series of steps, or progression; once a painter has executed a certain form, there is no need to repeat it. The painter moves on to the next turning point.

Sy's work started to gain recognition from 1980s onwards. In 1988, her works were published in Family of Artists. After she graduated magna cum laude in 1989 with a Fine Arts degree in painting from U.P. She taught courses on Chinese Society and Culture, as well as Asian Art History at the U.P. and De la Salle University in Manila. She also became a member of the Philippine Association of Art Educators and Philippine Association of Chinese Studies, and has served as director, consultant, and judge to many art organizations and museums in the Philippines and abroad.

In 2002, together with Hau, she was featured in Folk Influences on Modern Philippine Art. In 2006 her works were included in the Works of Famous Chinese Masters and the following year, her paintings were featured in Leading Contemporary Masters.

It seemed inevitable that these two artists would meet through their mutual interests. In 1965 Hau was teaching Chinese painting part-time on Sundays and Sy, a pre-med student, enrolled. This meeting proved propitious and on 21 January 1968, they were wed. A lifetime of married life and art began. Together, they became the power couple in fine arts.

Hau continued with his part-time painting exhibitions and teaching. In 1971, at the invitation of a gallery curator, they started teaching at the Gallery Blue in Rustan's Makati on Sundays. Later they taught at Silangan Art Gallery at Rizal Park, and were subsequently invited by Margie Reyes Lopez to teach in Goldcrest, Makati. They opened a workshop in Greenhills in 1970, which they maintained until 2000. About 3,000 students of fifty-six nationalities have taken art lessons with them, and many have pursued art as teachers and artists, among them Filipino Ceasar Cheng — who is now active as an artist and art teacher — and other Filipino artists such as Marivic Rufino, Susan Fetalvero Roces, Nely Jao-Chua, Tensie Bello, as well as others from Korea, India, Japan, Pakistan, the United States, the United Kingdom, Australia, and France. These students are also actively involved in the art scene, holding exhibits and organizing their own students into art groups. One example is Jane Evans, whose group has around 800 members.

Hau and Sy founded the Philippine Chinese Art Center in 1975, engaged in different art activities and taught Chinese painting and calligraphy. About ten years after his father died, in 1980, Hau quit the family business and began to paint and teach full-time. Painting full time resulted in what seemed like a tidal wave of exhibitions, with students and other commissions following hot on the heels of these. The couple's teaching career would span forty years.

Interspersed with their teaching are art exhibits, which often led to further paintings. They organized exhibitions with the cultural office of the Chinese embassy in the Philippines. In 1985, under the Philippine-China Cultural Exchange Program, they were invited to exhibit at the Beijing National Art Museum by China's Ministry of Culture. Their book, The Album of Collected Paintings, was published the same year.

They also organized numerous art exhibitions of artists from other countries, among them, The "Xi'an Art Academy Exhibition" and "Tribute to Yangtze River — Exhibition from Chongqing". Their latest, organized by their students with the cultural office of Philippine Chinese embassy, is an exhibition from the Guangzhou Memorial Hall of the Lingnan School of Painting at the Metropolitan Museum of Manila (2010), with a reciprocal exhibition in Guangzhou, China. In 1986, they began co-editing the Philippine World News' art column "Yi-Lin", and China Times' "Mo-Yan" and continued to do so for about a decade. In the 1990s they were invited to lecture and exhibit in such venues as the Arthur Sackler's Museum, Harvard University, the Shanxi Art Museum, Xiamen University, and Quanzhou Hua Qiao University. In 2000, they exhibited at the Chongqing City Museum with their students, and went on a sketching tour around China.

Having painted for almost fifty years, they have a total body of artworks that is impressive. Sy estimates their artworks to be in the thousands, comprising sketches, drawings, Chinese brush paintings, and calligraphy, oil and acrylic paintings. They have held more than forty solo and joint exhibitions, both locally and internationally, as well as more than sixty group exhibitions with students and other artists in the Philippines and abroad. Today, they continue to paint and write.

As a tribute to them, their students have organized themselves into an international art studies group on Chinese arts. Some have developed their own styles — another testament to their mentoring excellence of bringing out the best in their students. They moved to Canada in 2007 and have not taught actively the last ten years. Still, their students visit them whenever the couple is in Manila. Now in Calgary, Canada, they are focusing on writing art books on techniques of Chinese painting for different object/subjects. Hau's The Techniques of Painting Lotus and Sy's The Painting of Orchids came out in January 2011. Several volumes on painting bird, insects, and fish are also expected in 2011. These books, based on their years of teaching students, are but another way of enabling people to learn painting.

While their Canadian experience is proving to be as exciting as their Philippine experience, they are not abandoning Philippine subjects. Sy is currently working on a series called Filipiniana, based on her many previous sketches and materials.

The couple has five children who are professionals. Their eldest daughter, Caroline Sy Hau (施蕴玲, 1969–), is also renowned in her own right. She graduated from U.P. with a Bachelor of Arts degree in English, summa cum laude. She is a writer and a professor at Kyoto University and has authored, co-authored and edited several books.

Hiaguang-iam Iamsuri

(蚁光炎, Yi Guangyan, 1879–1939)

Community leader, businessman, philanthropist, Thailand

Hiaguang-iam Iamsuri was a well known leader of the Chinese community in Thailand in the 1930s. He was elected chairperson of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce in 1936 and held important positions in various associations. He was even appointed a senator of Guangdong Province in China. As a leader of the Chinese community, he was active in the anti-Japanese movement in the late 1930s. Besides donating generously himself, he initiated a campaign to boycott Japanese goods in Thailand and various fund-raising events to gather funds for the Chinese government. He was also active in propagating anti-Japanese ideas.

Hiaguang-iam was born in 1879 to a family of poor farmers in Chenghai, Guangdong. His parents and elder brother died when he was three and five years old, respectively. He was thus brought up by his sister-in-law and two sisters. After attending the village school for three months, the young Hiaguang-iam had to quit because his family could not afford to send him to school any longer.

When he was seventeen years old, he left his hometown and tried to seek a living in Cambodia. He worked in his relative's distillery for six years before relocating to Thailand. There he first worked in a cousin's pickle factory, and later moved to the port, where he worked as a labourer. He was eventually given more responsibilities because of his excellent work performance. Soon afterwards, he was assigned the task of paying taxes at Customs because he was reliable and knew how to speak Thai. Through this job, he gained fame among trading companies in the region. Many commissioned him to work and he built his reputation and network through this process. Later, he started to provide shipping services with three small cargo ships.

Years later, he set up the Liushun Company with five friends. It specialized in the transportation of goods to other parts of Thailand. When the other shareholders wanted to quit, he became the sole owner of the company and changed its name to Liushunxing. As transportation technology improved, traders began to use bigger vessels to ship their goods. This posed a problem to businessmen in Bangkok as its harbour was not deep enough for bigger ships to enter. In view of this, Hiaguang-iam initiated a business to transport goods from the ships to the docks using smaller vessels. As the first to enter the business, he was able to gain a major share of the market. He later changed the name of his company to Guangxingli when his business further expanded. With his success in the shipping business, he ventured into other business, including rice mills and rice liquor production, among other things.

Hiaguang-iam was extremely influential in the Chinese community in Thailand during the first half of the twentieth century. He was elected chairperson of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce from 1936 to 1939 and founded the Teochew Association of Thailand with other community leaders. Many considered him to be Seow Houtseng's political heir in Thailand. After Seow began to fade from the Thai political scene, Hiaguang-iam became the leader of the Teochew Association clique and initiated the restructuring of the Poh Teck Tung Association (the present Poh Teck Tung Foundation). After Poh Teck Tung was officially registered as the Poh Teck Tung Foundation, he was elected chairperson of its board of directors three times consecutively. Under his leadership, a first aid team was set up under the Poh Teck Tung Foundation. He also initiated a fund-raising event to raise funds for the building of a midwifery clinic under the Poh Teck Tung Foundation.

Being a Chinese community leader, Hiaguang-iam was actively involved in the anti-Japanese movement of the late 1930s. He initiated a campaign to boycott Japanese goods in Thailand and several fund-raising events in support of the Chinese government. He also founded Zhongyuan Bao with fellow members of Teochew Association of Thailand as the mouthpiece for the anti-Japanese movement within the Chinese community in Thailand. He encouraged youths to enter the Chinese Nationalist army, and sponsored the cost of their journey to China. Aside from this, he was also known to have donated generously to the Chinese government. For example, he donated $100,000 to build a base in Fohai, Yunnan.

Hiaguang-iam was highly regarded by the Chinese government. He was appointed a senator of Guangdong Province, and participated in the first senate conference in Guangdong in May 1939. After the event, he went to other parts of China, such as Shantou, Chongqing, and Yunnan, and met many high-ranking officials in the Chinese government during this trip. When he returned to Thailand in October 1939, he was determined that China would win the war against Japan, and advocated investment in the south-western region of China.

He was not only supportive of anti-Japanese movements, but also of the education of fellow Chinese in Thailand. After he was elected the fifteenth chairperson of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce, he initiated the establishment of the senior high section of Chung Hwa School, and organized a fundraising event for that purpose. When the new section commenced in 1938, he donated money to build the school's library. In addition to this, he was known to have supported many Chinese schools in Bangkok financially and to have given donations to Assumption College.

Hiaguang-iam was assassinated on 21 November 1939 in Yaowarat. He was shot four times and was declared dead in the hospital. The Thai police announced sixty-five hours after the incident that the murderer, Wang Bin, was caught. The mastermind of the assassination was found to be Chen Cilin, the son of a bank owner. Both Wang and Chen were given twelve-year prison sentences. However, many believed that the Japanese military forces were responsible for Hiaguang-iam's death.

Ho Ching

(何晶, He Jing, 1953–)
Chief Executive Officer, Temasek Holdings, Singapore

Ho Ching is best known for her leadership of the government-linked Singapore Technologies Group, and Temasek Holdings, the Singapore Government's investment arm; and for being married to Lee Hsien Loong, Singapore's third prime minister. As the chief executive officer of Temasek Holdings (Pte.) Ltd., Ho oversees a portfolio valued at over US$100 billion and has consistently been listed by the world's leading business magazines as among the world's most influential women.

Ho was born in Singapore in 1953 to Ho Eng Hong and Chan Chiew Ping. She was educated at Crescent Girls' School and then the National Junior College where she won a President's Scholarship to study at the University of Singapore (now National University of Singapore) where she obtained a First Class Honours degree in Electrical and Electronic Engineering in 1976. As a government scholar, Ho's first job posting was to the Systems Integration & Management Team (SIMT) of the Ministry of Defence. The SIMT was later merged with the Electronics Test Centre (ETC) to become the Defence Science Organisation (DSO) in 1977. In 1980, Ho won a Loke Foundation Scholarship to pursue her graduate studies at Stanford University where she obtained a Master of Science degree in Control Engineering in 1982. She became deputy director of the DSO the following year, and held the post till her resignation from the Ministry of Defence in 1986.

In 1987, Ho joined the Singapore Technologies Group (ST) and served in several senior engineering and executive positions before being made managing director of the Group on 1 February 1994. The following year, she received the prestigious Engineering Alumni of Singapore's Distinguished Alumni Award. In her acceptance speech, Ho thanked her mother for encouraging her in her pursuit of engineering, a field she chose because she wanted to take her future in her own hands. Ho shocked the corporate world when she announced her resignation as managing director of Singapore Technologies in November 1995. This followed her disagreement with ST's executive chairman, Yeo Ning Hong, over her proposal to pay $1 million in bonuses to the managing directors of ST's subsidiaries. Her resignation was short-lived as she was back as managing director of the ST Group by the end of the year.

In 1997, Ho succeeded Yeo as president and chief executive officer of the Group, a post she held till 1 December 2001. Within the Singapore Technologies Group, Ho chaired several of its key companies: Singapore Technologies Engineering Ltd (1997–2002); SembCorp Industries (1998–2002); Chartered Semiconductor Manufacturing Ltd (1996–2002); ST Capital Ltd (1998–2002); StarHub; and ST Assembly Test Services. She was also second deputy chairman of the Economic Development Board from 1996 to 1999, having first been appointed to the board in 1995. Other key posts Ho has held include deputy chairman, Productivity and Standards Board; and chairman, Institute of Molecular Agrobiology.

On 1 December 2001, Ho was promoted to the post of deputy chairman of the ST Group and on 1 May 2002, assumed the specially created post of executive director of Temasek Holdings (Pte.) Ltd. The appointment was controversial, but was defended by Prime Minister Goh Chok Tong in Parliament who argued that her appointment had been for the public good. Temasek chairman S. Dhanabalan first proposed Ho's appointment in Temasek, but this was met with objections by then Deputy Prime Minister Lee Hsien Loong as he feared the public would react negatively to his wife's appointment. It was Goh who helped overcome these objections. On 1 January 2004, Ho was appointed chief executive officer of Temasek.

An efficient, methodical, and extremely hard-working executive, Ho is known for her forthrightness, and her hands-on management style. An intensely private person — even her birth date has never been publicly disclosed — she is not known for her flamboyance or style, but rather for her command of detail and attention to fundamentals. Even Ho's charitable work is low key. Since 2000, she has given more than $1 million to charity through the donation of her shares to various charities. The world knows Ho for transforming Temasek from a Singapore-focused investment outfit into a leading investor in Asia. In 2007, Temasek's portfolio grew 27 per cent from US$80 billion to US$108 billion, thanks to its aggressive investments in the banking and telecom sectors. Despite these impressive figures, Ho has taken brickbats for Temasek's US$3.8 billion investment in Thailand's Shin Corp whose earnings fell 43 per cent in 2007, following the coup that ousted Shin Corp head and Thai Prime Minister Thaksin Shinwata.

Since 2002, Ho has appeared regularly in international rankings of influential women. In 2002, Fortune magazine listed her sixth on their list of the fifty most-powerful businesswomen outside the United States of America. In 2007, Time magazine listed her as the world's third most powerful woman after German Chancellor Angela Merkel and Chinese Vice-Premier Wu Yi. American Secretary of State Condoleeza Rice was ranked fourth in its survey.

Ho has been awarded the Public Administration Medal (Silver) and the Public Administration Star for her contributions to the public sector. She is married to Singapore Prime Minister Lee Hsien Loong. They married on 17 December 1985 when he was a newly elected member of parliament for Teck Ghee constituency and they now have two sons. Ho, who has a sister and two brothers, lists reading, music, and volleyball among her hobbies.

Ho Kwon Ping

(何光平, He Guangping, 1952–)
Leading businessman, Singapore

Ho Kwon Ping is a well-known businessman and a one-time political activist and journalist. He was born on 24 August 1952, in Hong Kong, the elder son of well-known industrialist and diplomat Ho Rih Hwa (何日华, 1917–99) and well-known bilingual author and columnist Li Lienfung (李廉风, 1923–2011). He has one brother, Kwoncjan 何光正 (an architect) and one sister, Minfong 何明芳 (a writer). Ho Kwon Ping grew up in Thailand where his father had large business interests and was also a diplomat. He attended an American school during his primary and secondary school years. At age 16, he parents sent him to Taiwan to study Chinese at Tunghai University. From there he proceeded to Stanford University where he remained for three years. During this time, he was introduced to the ideals of Marxism and revolution in the Third World and became involved in radical student activities. He was suspended for a year at Stanford. Thereafter, he left for Cornell as a transfer student but feeling displaced, decided to return to Singapore.

After completing his national service as a combat engineer, Ho enrolled at the University of Singapore where he majored in economics. While still reading for his degree, Ho became a correspondent for the Far Eastern Economic Review (FEER). In 1977, while in his second year at the University, he was detained under the Internal Security Act for two months for writing 'pro-Communist' articles for FEER. When he was released, he decided to marry his girlfriend, Claire Chiang 张齐娥, whom he got to know while studying at the University of Singapore. Chiang was a sociology honours student who went on to teach sociology at both the University of Hong Kong and the National University of Singapore. Ho did well in his studies, and emerged the second best student of his cohort in 1978, winning the Singapore Employers' Federation silver medal.

Ho immediately proceeded to Hong Kong where he had already secured the post of assistant editor at FEER. He and his wife Claire, settled in a village on Lamma Island known as Yung Shue Wan or Banyan Tree Bay, and it is after this idyllic place that the couple later named their resorts company. After three years at FEER, Ho grew tired of journalism and was preparing to take up a position at INSEAD, the business school in Fontainbleau, France when he received news that his father had suffered a stroke. He abandoned his plans to go to France and returned home to take up the reins of the family business, Wah Chang 华昌, which had been founded by his maternal grandfather, Dr Li Kuo Ching.

His first major business decision lost Wah Chang a great deal of money. Ho thought that the company would make a nice bundle by building China's biggest-ever jack-up rig.

Unfortunately, his timing was wrong as they commenced construction when the market was at its highest and instead of selling it for US$33 million, it was sold for US$18 million. It was an expensive decision and Ho wanted to resign from the company. His father told him that he could not quit as he had to stay around to recoup the losses. Lesson learnt, Ho began diversifying the company. Within a decade, Ho was featured in the top business magazines and newspapers and even made the cover of Fortune International magazine. In 1981, he was made President of Wah Chang International Corporation Pte Ltd.

In the mid 1980s, Ho made his first foray into the hotels and resorts business. It began in 1984 when Ho went to Phuket, Thailand to look for a piece of land to build a possible summer home. He bought a small piece of land and then walked along the beach and came across an abandoned tin mine. The Thai tourist authorities had written it off as being impossible for resort development. Since it was cheap and had a 'wild its beauty expanse of lagoons', Ho bought the land. This became the Dusit Laguna Hotel which opened in 1987.

The Banyan Tree Resort Group, which became synonymous with Ho and his wife Claire Chiang, was established in 1995 with its first hotel opening in Phuket, This was quickly followed by resorts in the Maldives and Bintan. Today, the Banyan Tree group owns and operates 17 resorts in 8 countries. Chiang herself is a familiar figure in social and civil society circles, having previously served as Nominated Member of Parliament (1997–99) and President of Society Against Family Violence (SAFV) (1995).

Beyond his immediate business interests, Ho has served as chairman of: MediaCorp (since 2004); the Singapore Management University Board (since 2000); Singapore Power (1994–2000); the National Environment Council (1995); and Standard Chartered Bank (main board). Ho is also actively involved in civil society, holding leadership positions in numerous organizations, including: Practice Performing Arts Ltd (1993–95); and Governor, Singapore International Foundation (1995).

Among his many awards are: Innovation Award (HICAP, 2003); Travel Personality of the Year (Travel Trade Gazette Travel Awards, 2004); 100 Global Leaders for Tomorrow at the World Economic Forum (2005); and Business Week's '25 Stars of Asia' (2005): Entrepreneurship Award (London Business School, 2005); Lifetime Achievement Award (Advertising Hall of Fame Awards, 2005); Lifestyle, Hospitality & Retail Entrepreneur of the Year (Ernst & Young Entrepreneur of the Year Award, 2006); CEO of the Year (Singapore Corporate Awards, 2008); and Hotelier of the Year (Stylemaker Awards, 2008); Hospitality Lifetime Achievement Award (China Hotel Investment Summit, 2009); and Meritorious Service Medal (Singapore Government, 2009).

Ho and his wife have three children: Ren Hua, Ren Yung, and Ren Chun.

Ho Kwong Yew

(何光耀, He Guangyao, 1903–42)
Architect, Singapore

Ho Kwong Yew was the first local-born Asian to become a registered architect in Singapore. He passed the first professional examination conducted by the Board of Architects when the Architect's Ordinance was introduced in 1927. Naturally gifted, highly intelligent, and motivated, Ho was able to surmount the class and ethnic inequalities of colonial society to carve out a successful career, albeit which was tragically cut short during the Japanese Occupation of Singapore. Ho was at the forefront of the local architectural scene, producing numerous outstanding modernist buildings, including private residences, shophouses, industrial, institutional, and religious edifies in both Singapore and Malaya. His practice was succeeded by his sons, Kok Hoe, Kok Kit, and later Kok Yin, under the name, Ho Kwong Yew & Sons, and was active till the late 1980s.

Born into a middle-class family that owned a tailoring business, Ho Kwong Yew received his education at the Anglican Church-affiliated St Andrew's School in Stamford Road. His talent in drawing caught the notice of the headmaster, Rev. J. Romanis Lee, who recommended him for an apprenticeship with the colonial Public Works Department (PWD) on his graduation in 1922. At a time where institutionalized architectural education was non-existent in Singapore, this rare opportunity kick-started Ho's professional training. He worked under the PWD government architect, H.A. Stallwood.

By 1924, Ho had honed his skills enough to be gainfully employed as an assistant draughtsman in the Municipal Architect's Office. There he worked under S.D. Meadows and A. Gordon on two significant projects, namely the Fort Canning Military Headquarters Building, and the new Singapore Municipal Building (later known as City Hall) fronting the Padang. Extant building plans of the latter testify to Ho's impeccable draughtsmanship. Through these projects, he gained a great deal of experience in reinforced concrete (RC) technology, then newly introduced in Singapore. Two years later, Ho left government service to join a private architecture and engineering practice, Chung and Wong, as a partner, working on a number of residences such as the famed Jade House in Nassim Road (demolished).

The turning point in his career came when he decided to set up his own firm in 1933, at the height of the Depression years. By then he was also a registered civil engineer and a member of the Institute of Structural Engineers in Singapore. With his great flair for design and in-depth technical knowledge of RC construction — then the reserve of mainly expatriate engineers — Ho experimented with architectural modernism in a repertoire of works that departed radically from his earlier eclectic historicist designs.

One of his definitive works is the Chee Guan Chiang mansion in Grange Road, designed for an established Straits Chinese family headed by prominent entrepreneur and financier Chee Swee Cheng. Stripped of overt ornamentation, the streamlined aesthetic was feted by the local press as a harbinger of a "New Modern Architecture in Singapore". The sweeping curves of the verandahs and daring cantilevered flat roofs flaunted his deft use of cutting edge RC construction techniques. Another iconic work was the Tai Chung Building in Circular Road, with its prismatic form, distinctive turret, and razor-thin sunshading fins that gave modern expression to the traditional shophouse. His own office-cum-residence in Yan Kit Road (demolished) featured possibly the earliest purpose-built roof garden in a residential townhouse.

Ho's most well known and original work was arguably the Haw Par Villa, built for the Aw brothers of Tiger Balm fame in late 1937 (destroyed in 1942). With a commanding view over the sprawling Haw Par Gardens in Pasir Panjang, the house is distinguished by a cluster of RC dome-roofs with gravity defying cantilevered fins. The image of lightness was completed by the generous expanse of slender steel-framed windows that dematerialized the building facades. The interiors, on the other hand, reflected the flamboyance and eclectic sensibilities of the owners. The fantastical juxtaposition of geometric motifs and decorative themes was inspired by art nouveau and even late Baroque architecture, complementing the colourful, allegorical gardens.

Ho's works were clearly influenced by the Modern Movement in Europe, with an emphasis on geometric, unadorned building forms that signified a break from the past. Nevertheless, he was equally fascinated by ornamented traditional architecture. Ho's first overseas trip in 1930 brought him to Hong Kong and Canton, his ancestral home-town. Having visited historic Chinese temples, he professed deep admiration for the skilful craftsmanship of traditional builders.

Amongst Ho's works, the Holy Trinity Church in Horne Road (1940), built to house the Foochow and Hokkien-speaking services of St Andrew's Mission, appears at first to be uncharacteristic and even enigmatic. Sporting a series of Chinese-themed roofs, its ethnic-modern expression goes beyond skin-deep mimicry of tradition, true to Ho's disciplined approach to structure and craft. The "Chinese" roofs sit on a modern composite structure of triangulated truss and dougong bracket systems, the architecture an effortless reconciliation of tradition and modernity.

Other than commercial and residential buildings, Ho also did much work for institutions, including the assembly hall and library for Nanyang Girls' High School (1934), St Theresa's Home of Little Sisters of the Poor (1938), and the 1939 Tung Shin Hospital Administration Building (in Kuala Lumpur).

As a self-made man, Ho earned the respect of his European colleagues in both government service and the private sector. He became the first Asian to be elected a council member of the Institute of Architects of Malaya (IAM), entering a hitherto European-dominated arena. In fact, he won an open competition for the official seal design of IAM's predecessor, the Singapore Society of Architects Incorporated (SSA). The seal continued to be used by IAM when it replaced the SSA, well into the post-war decades.

As one of the rare handful of local-born Asian architecture professionals in pre-war Singapore, Ho enjoyed the support and patronage of the Chinese elite. At the same time, he was deeply concerned about local community welfare and maintained a keen interest in China's political developments, especially during the tumultuous 1930s. His social circle included mainland and overseas Chinese literati and intellectuals, such as Lim Bo Seng with whom he shared a passion for photography. Famed Chinese artist Xu Beihong was a frequent guest at his Yan Kit Road residence, where he produced a vivid portrait for the family. In a way, the Holy Trinity Church design signalled the burgeoning sense of identity among the domiciled Chinese-speaking community. It heralded the series of "Chinese-Modern" works in the post-war years, such as the Nanyang University and the Singapore Chinese Chamber of Commerce.

Ho's promising career abruptly ended in February 1942 when he was arrested by the Japanese military and never returned. Nevertheless his pioneering legacy lives on in the progressive, imaginative works he created.

Ho Minfong

(何明芳, He Mingfang, 1951–)
Writer, journalist, lecturer, Singapore

Minfong Ho is an award-winning writer of short stories and young people's fiction. The latter tends to be socially and politically engaged, featuring people living in poverty and set during periods of conflict in Southeast Asian countries, with mainly young female protagonists whose convictions and personal qualities enable them to triumph over their circumstances and bring about change in both their own lives and their societies.

A Singaporean, Ho currently lives, and is mainly based, in the United States. She speaks three languages — Chinese, Thai, and English. Although an English-language author, she considers Chinese her first language and the "language of her heart", Thai, a "functional" "language of her hands" and English, the "language of her head".

Born in what used to be called Rangoon, Burma, to the entrepreneur and former Singapore ambassador to Thailand, Ho Rih Hwa (何日华) and the writer, Li Lienfung (李廉风), she was raised in Thailand, near Bangkok, attended the Bangkok Patana School, the International School of Bangkok, and Tunghai University in Taichung, Taiwan (1968–69). She then studied at Cornell University in the United States where she completed her B.A. (Honours, 1973) in economics. Ho also has a master's degree in Fine Arts from Cornell University for which she had submitted what was to become her second novel, Rice Without Rain. She was a journalist with The Straits Times, a Singapore newspaper (1974–75), and a lecturer in English at Chiengmai University, Thailand (1975–76). She worked with the Catholic Relief Services as a nutritionist and relief worker on the Thai-Cambodia border, which became the setting for her novels, The Clay Marble and The Stone Goddess.

Ho's novels are set against backdrops of real events, such as the student movement in Thailand in the 1970s, or among Cambodian refugees on the collapse of the Khmer Rouge regime at the turn of the 1980s. Yet her novels are generally optimistic as the protagonists' strength of character, beliefs, and determination to overcome their tragic circumstances usually prevail.

Ho has said that she began to write while at Cornell University, partly out of homesickness and partly to counter conventional notions about Asia. She first achieved prominence with the short story, Sing to the Dawn, submitted to the annual short story contest organized by the U.S. Council for Interracial Books for Children, and won the award in the Asian American Division of unpublished Third World Authors. Encouraged to expand the story into a novel, Ho realized that fiction could be a form of political expression and activism. She set out to represent contemporary realities in stories located in Southeast Asian countries, choosing as protagonists, strong young female characters. In Sing to the Dawn, Ho challenges the traditional notion of submissive oriental girls through a heroine who fights to retain her right to further education in the city after bettering her brother in a competitive scholarship exam. In Singapore, Sing to the Dawn has been widely used as a lower secondary literature text. The musical based on this novel premiered at the National Theatre in Singapore as the opening event for Singapore's Festival of Arts in 1996. A full-length animation film version of Sing to the Dawn was released in 2008.

Rice Without Rain depicts the poverty and struggles of the Thai peasant class caught up in the political turmoil generated by idealistic student activists from Bangkok. The Clay Marble, based on her experiences as a United Nations relief worker helping Cambodian refugees on the Thai-Cambodian border, captures the courage and resilience of a teenage girl and her brother, refugees escaping the Khmer Rouge regime, who eventually choose to return to help restore their homeland.

In addition to her novels for young adults, Ho has written for young children. Her picture book, Hush! A Thai Lullaby (1996) won a Caldecott Honor award, and was followed by a sequel, Peek! A Thai Hide-and-Seek (2004). In collaboration with a Khmer friend, Saphan Ros, she wrote two Cambodian folktales, The Two Brothers and Brother Rabbit. Tapping from the reservoir of Chinese Tang poems that she learnt from her mother, she translated sixteen Tang poems in Maples in the Mist (1996).

The Stone Goddess (2004) is a story of a Khmer girl trained in classical Cambodian dance who survives the shifting realities of the Khmer Rouge regime and refugee camps, and finally emigrated to the United States, through her dedication to the dance form.

Many of Ho's short stories have been included in anthologies published in Singapore (e.g. "Tanjong Rhu" in Tanjong Rhu and Other Stories; More Than Half the Sky; Island Voices: A Collection of Short Stories from Singapore) and the United States (e.g."Winter Hibiscus" in Stories in the Stepmother Tongue; "Rhizomes" in In My Grandmother's House; and "The Green Armchair" in First Crossing). Her short stories were compiled and published in Singapore as Journeys (2008).

Ho has received many awards and much recognition for her fiction. Sing to the Dawn was awarded First Prize, Council of Interracial Books for Children, 1975. Her short story "Tanjong Rhu" won First Prize, Annual Short Story Writing Competition, Ministry of Culture, Singapore, 1982. The Clay Marble won the AsiaWeek Magazine Short Story competition, Hong Kong, 1983. She was placed second in the prose section, Commonwealth Book Awards, Commonwealth Book Council, the United Kingdom, 1987. Rice Without Rain won the National Book Development Council of Singapore Book Award for Fiction, 1988; the Parents Choice Award, 1990; was an American Library Association (ALA) Best Book for Young Adults, and on the New York Public Library's list of Books for the Teen Age, 1991. The Clay Marble was similarly recognized by the National Council on Social Studies/ Children's Book Council (NCSS-CBC) and featured as a Notable Children's Book in the Field of Social Studies, and in the Best Books selection of Parents Magazine, 1991; in "Pick of the Lists", American Booksellers Association (ABA); Notable Children's Trade Books in the Language Arts; and was a Children's Book of Distinction in Hungry Mind Review, 1992. Hush!: A Thai Lullaby was distinguished in Horn Book Fanfare; was designated an ALA Notable Book, and a Children's Book of Distinction in Hungry Mind Review; and was a Caldecott Honor Book, in 1997. Maples in the Mist: Children's Poems from the Tang Dynasty was similarly designated an ALA Notable Book, listed in the Best Books selection, New York Public Library, and recognized as a Children's Book of Distinction in Hungry Mind Review, also in 1997. Brother Rabbit: A Folktale from Cambodia was in "Pick of the Lists", ABA, 1997.

She was awarded the S.E.A Write (Southeast Asian Writers) Award, as well as the Singapore Cultural Medallion, and the Montblanc-National University of Singapore Centre For The Arts Literary Award in 1997.

Ho was the inaugural writer-in-residence at the National University of Singapore's Department of English Language and Literature in 1984; is a member of the Authors Guild, PEN America, and has conducted writing workshops in middle schools and high schools in the United States, and international schools in Switzerland, Indonesia, Thailand, Poland, and Malaysia. She is married to an American, John Dennis, and has three children.

Ho Peng Yoke

(何丙郁, He Bingyu, 1926–)
Historian on Chinese Science and Technology, Malaysia

Born in 1926 in Papan, Perak, as Yantian (燕恬) to He Qihan (何其汉) and Ng Yeen Kwai (吴贤贵). Ho was given the literary name of Bing Yu (丙郁) — rendered in the local style as Peng Yoke — when he entered school in 1933.

He studied at St Michael, Ipoh, and sat for the Cambridge School Certificate at age fifteen but was too young to gain admission to Raffles College. Always conscious of improving himself, he then studied engineering technology through a British correspondence course while teaching English in his father's school. Before the Japanese invasion, he joined St John's Ambulance and in 1947 was awarded a Defence Medal from the British Administration. In 1943 he learned and excelled in Japanese, then taught the language, counting some of his ex-teachers among his students. The language was to serve him well in his future career as an academic.

Without the benefit of a formal education in Chinese, he improved his Mandarin by listening to Chinese songs and the conversations between his father and some visitors. After the war, he entered Raffles College on a government scholarship to read science. As before, his referee was Dr Wu Lien-teh. In 1949, he became a Physics Honours student at the University of Malaya (UM), graduating with First Class Honours.

His entire career was devoted to academia and scholarship. Upon earning the M. Sc. in UM in 1951, he became an assistant lecturer (1951–54) and lecturer (1954–60) in Physics. 1953 saw a major shift in his academic specialization when he began doctoral research on the history of science of China by working on the chapters of Jinshu (晋书) and Suishu (隋书) on astronomy. This switch had been possible only because of his training as a physicist. From being a doctoral student under the advice of Joseph Needham, he later became one of the key academic collaborators of the latter at Cambridge University. By 1960, he had become reader in History of Science in the Physics Department, but felt that advancement beyond this point would be difficult.

It was because of this feeling that he took up the inaugural chair in Chinese Studies at the UM campus in Kuala Lumpur in 1964. He thus became, in his own words, "the only professor of Chinese in the world specializing in the history of Chinese science". There he gathered a gallery of eminent sinologists from Europe, America, Taiwan, and Hong Kong, and within a few years, built the department up into one of the best in the world. During his tenure as chairman of the department, he also sat in the University Council (1965–68) and served as dean of the Arts Faculty (1967–68).

While serving in UM, he rendered genuine service to the country. After the 1960 riots, he sat in the National Consultative Council as one of two representatives from institutions of higher learning. For a time he also doubled as the director of the Tunku Abdul Rahman College. But his commitment to research overshadowed prospects of high office. A request to have his name included for consideration as the new vice-chancellor of UM in 1968 was politely declined by him. Instead, he opted to work with Needham in a research that led to Parts 3 and 4 of Volume 5 in the Science and Civilisation in China series. Tan Siew Sin also "sent word to persuade me to join the Cabinet". Again he declined politely, citing a lack of interest or expertise in politics and his preference to remain as an academic.

Ho vacated the chair in UM in 1973, leaving behind a legacy of scholarship and academic excellence and a department well on its way to becoming a major centre of Chinese Studies in the world. In the same year, he became the foundation professor and chairman of the School of Modern Asian Studies at Griffith University, Brisbane.

Even away from Malaysia, he still had the interest of the country in mind. In late 1973, he wrote a personal note to Tun Razak to report on changes in China after his visit with senior officials of Griffith University, Australia. China was an enigma in the early 1970s and relations with it were sensitive and controversial. He volunteered to inform the Tun what he "gathered from the people I met in China on the attitude of China towards other countries and towards the Overseas Chinese". China's policy towards the Overseas Chinese was to encourage them to take up citizenship in the countries where they live and to let them know that normal relation between China and Malaysia seemed possible in the near future.

After serving the first five years in the School of Modern Asian Studies as its chairman, he had laid a solid enough foundation for Griffith University to claim a place in the world of Asian Studies. He then went on secondment to the Hong Kong University to head the Department of Chinese Studies from 1981–87. The last phase of his career was directly linked to his lifelong association with Joseph Needham at Cambridge University. As director of the Needham Research Institute from 1990 to 2001, he consolidated its financial standing on a sound footing.

A scholar of international acclaim, he displayed academic talents that truly belonged to the world of scholarship, unhampered by political boundaries. In his own words, he was a roving scholar whose academic career spanned three continents and four countries, as well as Hong Kong and Taiwan.

His background allowed him to bring to his teaching and research scientific depth, coupled with interdisciplinary breadth. He applied his vast scientific knowledge in research to astronomy, mathematics, alchemy, and material medica of China. His works on the Yijing or Book of Changes, poet-alchemists, Taoist alchemy, crafts and craftsmen, the history of Chinese science, as well as ancient science in other great Asian civilizations, have helped to bridge the sciences and humanities.

The corpus of his works — comprising more than two dozen books and monographs, and 170 academic and review articles in journals and books written in English, Chinese, and Japanese — is a true measure of his scholastic achievements. The impact of his scholarship was felt in many territories, especially in Britain, China, Hong Kong, Taiwan, Japan, Singapore, Australia, Europe, and the United States.

His seminal works deal with studies relating to physics, mathematics, and astronomy that also link him with the monumental research project of Joseph Needham. To date the works of Needham and his collaborators have yielded a corpus of twenty-one volumes on diverse branches of Chinese science, technology, and medicine. Ho's collaboration with Needham yielded three of these volumes for which he was either the sole or principal author. These are Science and Civilisation in China, volume 5, part 3, published in 1976, part 4, published in 1980, and part 7, published in 1987. It is also acknowledged that in two other volumes Ho was responsible for all or most of the first drafts.

His scholarship is impressive in its breadth and scope, not only because it is interdisciplinary and integrates the sciences, astronomy, medicine, history, and literature, but also because of his remarkable ability to utilize directly sources in different languages, such as English, Chinese, Japanese, and indirectly, in Arabic and other sources. Highly prestigious honours conferred on him are too numerous to enumerate, but some of these include fellowships of professional and academic bodies, visiting and honorary professorships, emeritus professorships, and directorships from countries both East and West.

From his research and published works, his contributions to scholarship may be summarized as follows:

(i) He was one of the few early collaborators of the late Joseph Needham, arguably the greatest Western Sinologist of the twentieth century and probably the British historian best known on a world scale. Needham's pioneering works opened up a new field of scholarship that cuts across disciplines.

(ii) His works on East Asian astronomical records have been used internationally by astronomers.

(iii) He opened up a new approach in the study of the history of Chinese science by considering what the ancients thought was science, rather than what modern people think.

(iv) He built on the tradition of inter-disciplinary research and extended it with his works to bridge the gap between the sciences and humanities. At the conferment of the honorary doctorate on him by Edinburgh University, the interdisciplinary nature of his works was emphasized in the citation which stated that "in a world in which we are becoming increasingly aware of the mutual interdependence of all we do and study", the ability to bridge different disciplines is rare and deserves recognition.

His sterling contributions and extensive network of relations with eminent scholars were largely overlooked by Malaysia. Since his departure from UM, the memory of this world class scholar has receded with the years as staff, students, and country fail to appreciate the significance of his scholarship. In his innumerable travels on scholarly engagements that criss-crossed countries and continents, the conspicuous missing link was Malaysia (except for his personal visits to his relatives). In 1991, he even tried to interest a Malaysian university to develop a centre for Islamic science, but found campus politics unreceptive to the idea. In a talk in Kuala Lumpur in April 2004, he made it known that Malaysia, being a multi-ethnic nation, was eminently suitable for promoting the study of the history of Asian science in East Asia, South Asia, and the Muslim world.

Back in 1981, S.K. Wong of Hong Kong University, a senior lecturer in the Department of Chinese Studies, has this assessment of the man: "In examining various aspects of the civilization of historical China, its astronomy, mathematics, and medicine among other disciplines, Professor Ho revivifies the results of our forefathers' scientific enquiries, and puts us in a better position both to understand our past and to see how it makes sense in the modern, scientific age…It is likely to lead to exceptionally useful understanding: understanding expressed in terms of contemporary civilisation" (Wong 1981). In an interview in Malaysia in 2004, his own assessment of his life was that "it has not been in vain" (韩美云, 2004).

Hoke Sein

(李福星, Li Fuxing, 1889–1978)
Judge, Compiler of Dictionary, Myanmar

U Hoke Sein was the sole compiler of The Universal Burmese-English-Pali Dictionary (first edition 1981) and the Padattha Myitzutha Pali-Burmese Dictionary (first published in 1954–59). His Universal Burmese-English-Pali Dictionary, better known as the U Hoke Sein dictionary, has been hailed as the most comprehensive dictionary of its kind. John Okell, one of the world's leading experts on the Burmese language and literature, in his review stated that: "The Hoke Sein dictionary is undoubtedly more comprehensive and up to date than Judson….. we must congratulate him on making a distinct advance over Judson's dictionary in some ways."

U Hoke Sein actually wanted to compile a Burmese-Pali dictionary as a sequel to his previously compiled Pali-Burmese dictionary. However, in the process of doing it, he realized that it would be more useful if it was expanded into a Burmese-English-Pali dictionary, with an English annotation inserted between the Burmese entries and the Pali equivalents. The result was the well known Universal Burmese-

English-Pali Dictionary, which is an invaluable reference book for students of the Burmese language in the English-speaking world. It was also a companion text aid for monks and nuns who studied Buddhist scripture in the Pali language.

U Hoke Sein was notably regarded as a distinguished lawyer and self-taught linguist. He served as a judge and director of the Government Trust during the British rule of Burma, but it seems that his interest was in compiling dictionaries. It took him thirty years to compile the Burmese-English-Pali dictionary and, for its last seven years, he even took early retirement in 1969 in order to work on it full-time. The dictionary yielded a total of 68,000 entries in 1,066 pages, which puts U Hoke Sein's dictionary among the most ambitious Burmese dictionaries ever attempted. Each entry contains a Pali equivalent for the Burmese word in addition to the English commentary.

The coverage in the dictionary is reportedly comprehensive in many areas. Although some the names of ethnic groups are absent, the author dipped into many terms from justice, administration, and government, and numerous names of flora and fauna, in order to present a wide-ranging scope. He exhausted the existing materials, including the materials from the Judson collections and U Wun's incomplete Burmese dictionary.

U Hoke Sein completed his work in 1977. The tedious and unrecognized job of proofreading was done and the dictionary in hardcover format was published in 1981 by his second son, U Saw Hlaing (Lee Aik Byan, 李益联, 1918–2006), who had happened to be first a college tutor in chemistry, and then a successful businessman, but who finally followed in his father's footsteps to become a successful lawyer.

In 2007, to prove herself a worthy daughter of U Saw Hliang and granddaughter of U Hoke Sein, Dr Than Than Tin (Cherry Hlaing) published the 1,066 pages of The Universal Burmese-English-Pali dictionary in soft copy, compact disc (CD) version. For the purpose of charity, Dr Than and her husband, Dr Aung Mon (Willie Aung Pe), donated many CD copies to institutions of the Theravada Buddhist order through the International Theravada Buddhist Missionary University in Yangon. The family hopes that the CD work will produce a Myanmar-Pali culture linked to a global language, in the e-learning era. They hope that it will become global as the world is getting smaller in this age of extensive networking and globalization.

U Hoke Sein was the son of a Hokkien migrant, Lee Boon Peng (李文掤, also known as 文掤公), one of the early leaders of the Lee Clan Association Long Sei Tong (旅缅陇西堂), located in Sin-o-dan Street in Rangoon Chinatown. The association, which was founded before 1861, is one of the founding trustee clans of Kheng Hock Keng or Hokkien Guan Yin Temple (庆福宫). In 1931 Lee Boon Peng became a member of the Hokkien Association (福建堂), the then association of Hokkien businessmen (now evolved into Fujian Tong Xiang Hui, 旅缅福建同乡会) in Rangoon.

Like his father, U Hoke Sein was also active in the welfare of the Lee Clan Association. He was vice-president for two terms (1947–1951) and after a short break returned as its legal adviser during the 1960s. He wrote an article about the Lee Clan Association in Burmese language which was published in its Centennial Anniversary Magazine (1961). His merit and contributions in the association were recognized by clan members and a brief biography of him in Chinese was cited in that magazine.

U Hoke Sein was married to a Hokkien lady, Daw Mya May (张妙妹), and they had five sons and four daughters. The family first lived at No. 45 Shwedagon Pagoda Road in Rangoon and later moved to No. 46, Latha Street, in central Rangoon Chinatown, where he finished compiling the Universal Burmese English Pali Dictionary.

U Hoke Sein was devoted to Theravada Buddhism and learned the Buddha's teachings in Pali Buddhist scripture, which gave him the foundation in the Pali language. He was one of five senior chairmen of the Chinese Merited Association (崇竺圣会, located at 73–79, Lanmadaw Street, Yangon Chinatown). It was founded by a group of Burmese-Hokkiens, prominent Hokkien civil servants and businessmen, whose Theravada Buddhist practices had been conducted since the founding days (1898) of the Chinese Merited Association Tazaung, or devotional hall located at the Saturday corner of Shwedagon Pagoda (see online picture at <www.chinatownology.com/shwedagon_paya.htlm>).

U Hoke Sein's second son, U Saw Hlaing, honorary consul at the Myanmar Embassy in Spain, was also a Theravada Buddhist, but he observed Chinese traditions and customs. As an honorary consul of Myanmar Embassy in Spain, he donated to many Myanmar Buddhist monasteries and, when he died, his funeral service was attended by many Myanmar Buddhist monks and nuns. However, Hokkien traditional funeral service rites were practised by his beloved daughter and her family members, and his ashes were kept at the Yangon Guan Yin San Chinese Monastery (达本观音山).

U Hoke Sein's granddaughter, Dr Than Than Tin, is a successful obstetrician and gynecologist, who is professor and head of the Obstetrics & Gynecology (O&G) Department, Central Women's Hospital in Yangon. She was awarded the Protecting, Promoting, Supporting Breast Feeding Award in 1995 by the Myanmar Medical Association. She is also current chairman of the O&G Society, Myanmar Medical Association; and a member of the Reference Committee, Royal College of Obstetrics and Gynaelogy; and a member of Reproductive Health Care of United Kingdom.

Hon Sui Sen

(韩瑞生, Han Ruisheng, 1916–83)
Civil servant, politician, Singapore

Hon Sui Sen was born to Peter Hon Boon Poh and Catherine Loh Soon Yin on 16 April 1916 in Balik Pulau, Penang. Hon, sometimes referred to as Benedict Hon, was best known for his tenure as the first chairman of the Economic Development Board (EDB), and a key strategist in conceptualizing Singapore's economic and industrial development. Although there was some initial apprehension at his appointment as minister for finance, he proved his doubters wrong for Singapore's GDP during his tenure (1970–83) doubled from S$2,462 in 1970 to S$5,752 in 1982, and its official reserves were raised six times over. Euromoney magazine even named him Economic Minister of the Year in 1982. The initial doubt was because Hon only came into the field of economics in the later half of his forty-four-year civil service career. Prior to his attachment to the World Bank for an economic management course in 1960, he had served as a police court magistrate under the British Straits Settlements, deputy land revenue collector, and land commissioner. However, his long experience with the civil service as commissioner of lands and permanent secretary to the Ministry of Local Government Lands and Housing ensured that he stepped into his new shoes at the Finance Ministry with the passion, adaptability, and analytical skill for the development and implementation of change.

As evinced by his successful tenure as minister for finance, Hon's year of training at the World Bank paid off. While it was true that then Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew was in a quandary as to whom he should pick to lead Singapore's economic development when the previous finance minister, Dr Goh Keng Swee, was transferred to head the Defence Ministry, it would be erroneous to assume that Hon had no previous experience in the economic and financial world. His long career in the civil service had improved his adaptability and analytical acumen. These were the same skills that had earlier enabled him to top the Senior Cambridge examination at Saint Xavier's Institution in 1932, and graduate from Raffles College in 1938 with a Class I diploma in science. These were also the skills that enabled him to rise to the occasion as founder and first chairman of the EDB in 1961. Under his leadership, the EDB undertook the project of industrializing Singapore by clearing the swamps west of Singapore to build the Jurong Industrial Estate (JIE). By 1968, JIE was a success with over 300 factories and 21,000 employees. The rapid development of JIE was accompanied by the construction of many satellite towns in the west of Singapore, thereby transforming Jurong into Singapore's first industrial and residential hub.

With the rapid development of JIE as his track record, it was no surprise that Hon was made the first chairman and president of the Development Bank of Singapore (DBS) where he was instrumental to the development of the Asian dollar market, and continued to play a major role in the financial services sector. Throughout the later half of his civil service career he was also the chairman of nine other companies, including National Iron & Steel Mills Ltd., Jurong Shipyard Ltd., Sembawang Shipyard (Pte) Ltd., Keppel Shipyard (Pte) Ltd., Neptune Orient Lines Ltd., Jurong Shipbuilders Ltd., Singapore Electronic & Engineering Ltd., the Insurance Corporation of Singapore Ltd., and the Singapore Petroleum Company.

As minister for finance, Hon continued to adapt to Singapore's economic policy of focusing on the country's need for industrialization and development. To this end, he established the Bases Economic Conversion Department to see to the development of old British military lands and facilities for commercial purposes, following the formal British withdrawal from the city state in 1968. Hon's most notable achievement in this respect was the commercial development of the old British military fortress at Pulau Blakang Mati, an island off Singapore's south coast, into the holiday resort island of Sentosa.

As demonstrated by the Meritorious Service Medal, the Malaysia Medal, the Distinguished Service Order, and the Order of Temasek awarded to him during his lifetime, as well as his role as Member of Parliament for Havelock constituency (1970–83), Hon worked tirelessly to improve the lives of all Singaporeans.

It would not be far-fetched to suggest that Hon's analytical ability for realizing the need for change and development stemmed from his childhood and education. Hon's father, Peter Hon Boon Poh, was a corporate accountant who made his fortune in the tin mining industry and who subsequently invested his money in rubber and coconut plantations until the Great Depression led to a decline in the family fortunes. It is likely that this change in his family fortunes was Hon's first brush with the protean nature of economic forces. This, coupled with his father's resultant change in trade from investing in rubber and coconut plantations to operating cinemas, meant that Hon experienced first-hand that adaptability was needed to survive the vicissitudes of economic forces.

In light of his ability to adapt and steer the Finance Ministry's policies to the changing needs of the country, it would be safe to assume that Hon could have contributed further to the economic development of the country were it not for his untimely death from a heart attack on 14 October 1983. To commemorate his contributions to the Singapore economy, the Hon Sui Sen Memorial Library at the National University of Singapore was built to inspire students to emulate his willingness to learn and adapt.

Hong Kok Tin

(方国珍, Fang Guozhen, 1910–89)
Businessman, civil administrator, Brunei

Hong Kok Tin was a successful businessman and reputable community leader who served as Deputy Minister of Health in the sultanate of Brunei Darussalam.

Hong was born in 1910 in Sarawak and received little formal education, but rose to prominence in Brunei. Prior to emigrating to Brunei, he worked as an apprentice in a relative's bicycle shop in Sibu earning, as he recalled vividly, $3 a month in the first year, $5 monthly the following year, and $7 monthly the third. Years later, he travelled to Kuching, Miri, and Labuan, changing jobs and exploring opportunities to advance himself. His is the familiar story common to all Heng Hua (兴化) folks from the Putian (莆田) district of Fujian Province, China, who ventured overseas, seeking a change of fortune. Finally in 1931, he set eyes on Kuala Belait, then a fishing village rapidly expanding into an oil town to meet the needs of oilfield workers recruited by the then Malayan Petroleum Company (predecessor of Brunei Shell Petroleum Co. Ltd.) after it discovered oil in Belait District in 1929. Hong had earlier witnessed how Miri boomed into a prosperous settlement, only some thirty kilometers away from Kuala Belait, after the discovery of oil there in 1910. He believed that Kuala Belait, in due course would also turn into a town, teeming with new immigrants and skilled workers recruited from countries both nearby and from as far away as Hong Kong, Penang, and other places. He decided to settle down in Kuala Belait and established his first trading firm under the name, Chop Seng Hup Hin, selling bicycles and other imported goods. Business was brisk and promising for about three years until it was abruptly interrupted by the Japanese Occupation.

After the Japanese surrender, Hong, like all other shopkeepers, found their shops completely devastated by indiscriminate bombing carried out by Allied planes,. He had to start all over again from scratch, using temporary structures made of wood and palm leaves (atap). He started his previous trade of selling bicycles and sundries, and, at the same time, took a chance on the transport business by investing in a fleet of lorries and engaging twenty workers.

This sorry state of doing business in atap shops lasted for years — until in 1953 when all shopkeepers moved into double-storey concrete buildings, newly constructed by the government in Jalan Pretty where they are now situated. By 1960, Chop Seng Hup Hin was a well known firm selling a wide range of Philips products and customers had the purchasing power, thanks to income from oil production. Philips was so popular that it became a household name. In the words of a local prominent businessman: "In those days, a sole distributor for Philips products like radios and electrical appliances was as prestigious as a motor-trader franchised to sell Humber Hawk, Singer Gazelle, Oxford, Holden and other prestigious saloon cars." Then in the 1960s, Hong was rewarded with a position in the royal palace by the Sultan of Brunei Darussalam and awarded the title, "Pehin Bendarhari China Kornia Di-Raja". This was a grand and memorable occasion for Hong and the town folks of Belait District, and it also marked the beginning of a new step forward for Hong in the pursuit of his dreams.

In Brunei, it is a tremendous honour to receive such a title, especially for an ethnic Chinese. Hong's appointment was the first from Belait District. The holder of this title enjoyed privileges, but not authority, unless he was also appointed a member of any of the five powerful councils provided for under the 1959 Constitution. In 1963, he was appointed a member of the Executive Council and that of the Legislative Council. Later in 1965, he was appointed Deputy Minister of Health and was housed in the official residence in the capital. From then on, Hong served his country wholeheartedly and steadfastly until the end of his life.

The conferment of the title of "Pehin" on Hong Kok Tin, his membership in the Legislative Council and Executive Council, and lastly, his appointment as Deputy Minister of Health, unmistakably added to the recognition of his service and contributions to Chinese schools and associations in Brunei, whether it was during the era of British Residence, or during the period of self-rule beginning from 1959 until independence in 1984 and thereafter. If the peace, harmony, and stability of Chinese communities that had been maintained throughout the state, particularly in Belait District, through the concerted effort of community leaders, then Hong's contribution was undoubtedly outstanding and significant.

Immediately after the war, building schools and providing education to children of school age and those overage were pressing matters confronting the British Resident. The British at the time were more concerned with keeping Brunei for strategic reasons in their Far East ventures and the exploitation of the natural resources, then mainly crude oil. Education was a matter considered best sorted out by the British missionaries and local Chinese community leaders as in the days before the war. Soon after the Japanese left, the Chinese community, comprising Hokkien, Hakka, Cantonese, Foochow, and other dialect-based clans, met to revive Chung Hua School in the same building that had miraculously survived the bombing. In August 1945, a management committee was formed, and Hong was elected a member along with other local prominent figures. In 1955 and the following year, he was elected chairman of the management committee. During the period under his leadership, the old semi-concrete pre-war building was demolished and in its place a modern, huge double-storey concrete structure comprising the principal's office, staff rooms, and classrooms was constructed with a government aid of $80,000, a huge sum in those days.

The construction, which began in 1955, was completed the following year. It was officially declared open on 27 July 1956 by DYMM Seri Paduka Baginda Maulana Al-Sultan Sir Omar Ali Saifuddin Sa'adul Khairi Waddin amidst the pomp and ceremony of a royal visit. The year 1956 was a historic year, marked by a royal visit, a new school building (the biggest in Brunei and a landmark of Belait District), and a boost of student population from about 600 in 1955 to almost 900. It was also the very year in which the Education Department gave Chung Hua School permission to offer classes for secondary school education, like other Chinese schools in the region. In 1959, when Hong was again elected chairman, he witnessed the graduation of the school's first batch of junior middle students, an important milestone in the history of Chinese education in Belait District. In 1965, five years after his appointment as "Pehin", Hong was again elected to chair the school's management committee, at a time when the number of students exceeded one thousand, and available classrooms could hardly cope with the demand. Once more, Pehin Hong led his committee to construct a second concrete building —rectangular and two-storey high — was completed in 1967, at a cost of $500,000. In recognition of Hong's tremendous contribution to the school, its management committee in May 1971 unanimously voted to honour him as the school's permanent honorary chairman.

Apart from education, Pehin Hong was also actively involved in various clan associations. In the middle of the 1950s, he was selected by the British Resident to serve in a body called the Belait District Chinese Affairs Advisory Committee, set up by him to mobilize local active elements to assist him in handling Chinese affairs, and to make representations or offer advice to him as necessary. This organization had ten members, the most articulate of whom was T.S. Sung (宋之绚), the famous principal of Chung Hwa Middle School, Kuala Belait, who is a bilingual intellectual and a close associate of Pehin Hong. Sung was awarded the honour of M.B.E by Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth II, in 1956.

In 1951, when the de facto Kapitan-China Shen Ren Shi (沈仁史) proposed the founding of the Chinese Chambers of Commerce for Kuala Belait and Seria, Pehin Hong was the first to respond positively, and in 1955, when it was formally established, he was registered as one of its founding promoters. He was also appointed honorary chairman or adviser to numerous other schools, clubs, and associations.

Hong married Chai See Moi (蔡细妹) and they had nine children — seven sons and two daughters.

Hong Taechawanit

(Tae Tiyong, 郑志勇, Zheng Zhiyong, 1851–1935)

Businessman, gambling lord, philanthropist, Thailand

Hong Taechawanit, or Zheng Zhiyong in Chinese, was born in 1851 as Zheng Yifeng (郑义丰) into a poor peasant family in Qiyuan Village (current Fengtang Town) of Chao'an City in Guangdong Province. His father, Zheng Shisheng, died while emigrating to Thailand when Hong was still very young. The poverty-stricken family had to struggle to survive, and his mother remarried. Hong immigrated to Thailand soon afterwards.

When he first arrived in Thailand, he tried to make a living in northern Thailand, before settling down in Bangkok, where he worked in the gambling dens of Liu Jibin (刘继宾). While working there, he joined the "Heaven and Earth Society" (Tian Di Hui, 天地会), which was one of the most influential secret societies in Bangkok's Chinatown at the time. He rose through the ranks within the society and soon became its second-in-command. Many thus called him Yi Kor Hong (Er-Ge-Feng, 二哥丰), meaning "Second Brother Feng". When the first-in-command died, Hong succeeded to his position and became the grandmaster of the society.

Hong then rose to prominence when he won the concession for tax farming of gambling dens in Bangkok in the reign of King Chulalongkorn (Rama V). Because of his significant contributions to the state's revenue he became a favourite at court and was bestowed the rank of Phra Anuwatratchaniyom and given the Thai surname — Taechawanit — by order of the crown. With the wealth brought by the gambling farm, he managed to set up his own businesses, which included a shipping company, pawn shops, and newspaper presses. He subsequently expanded his business to other parts of the region. He even built a mansion in Phlapphachai Road to serve both as his home and the headquarters of his businesses.

Aside from serving the court as a major tax farmer, Hong also contributed to the state and society in Bangkok in other important ways. He financed the construction of Taechawanit Road, which was eventually named after him. In 1909, which was the last year of King Chulalongkorn's reign, there was a major strike of the Chinese in Bangkok to protest against the last of a series of tax reforms set forth by the court. The strike brought the entire capital to a virtual standstill for three days. Almost all shops operated by ethnic Chinese were closed. Chinese dock workers, food hawkers, and transport workers were all on strike. During this time of difficulty, Hong was the only Chinese to insist that the market he owned in Chinatown remain in operation throughout the strike period. With Hong's loyal support, the court was able to implement the tax reforms successfully after the strike died down three days later.

Hong contributed much to the development of the Chinese community in Thailand as well. He was among the founders of Peiing School and the Hua Chiaw Poh Teck Tung Foundation, which is the largest and most influential philanthropic organization of the ethnic Chinese in Thailand. He also financed the publication of several Chinese-language newspapers and the building of other public facilities such as the harbour, roads, the installation of street lamps, and others. Hong donated generously to other charitable organizations such as the Tien Hua Hospital.

Hong made massive contributions to his hometown in China for the sake of his mother, who became an outcast when she remarried after his father's death. He built a modern-style village, based on both Chinese tradition and Western style, in Qiyuan Village of Chaozhou City, Guangdong Province, and three new villages within a two-kilometre range of his hometown. He also built sandstone roads connecting the villages to Chaozhou City. Besides inviting his close relatives to live in the village, he also invited those who were willing to become members of the Zheng lineage to live there. Many poor families thus moved into the newly built village. Hereafter, it was rumoured that "Second Brother Feng adopted sons". In addition, he financed the building of Zhiyong Advanced Primary School in the village, providing poor students with free education, as well as sponsoring them for other necessary expenses, such as living expenditures.

Besides building a new village for his mother, Hong also made donations to public projects in his hometown. He spent large sums to build dikes along the Han River to prevent flooding, and roads to improve the accessibility of his hometown. He also made regular donations to support victims of natural disasters in South China.

Hong was also known to have a close relationship with Dr Sun Yat-sen. When Dr Sun came to Thailand to promote the revolution against the Qing court, he admired Dr Sun after hearing the latter's speech. He then received Dr Sun in his mansion. After the Qing court was overthrown in 1911, Hong donated large sums to the Nationalist government on two different occasions, and sent a gift of ivory to Dr Sun to congratulate him on his appointment as president of China. It was even said that Hong had also set up the branch of Tong Meng Hui (同盟会) in Thailand after the society was founded in Tokyo.

Hong suffered a devastating financial setback when the government of Rama VI ended the concession for tax farming of gambling dens in the early twentieth century. On top of that, his businesses were badly affected by the global depression which followed World War One. Almost all his assets were liquidated to settle debts and expenses.

Hong died on 5 March 1937 at the age of eighty-four. According to his will, his mansion on Phlapphachai Road was donated to the Thai government. This later became the site of Phlapphachai Police Station and remains so to the present day. His body was shipped back to his hometown for burial.

Howe Yoon Chong

(侯永昌, Hou Yongchang, 1923–2007)
Politician, civil servant, Singapore

A progressive figure in his time as a politician, Howe Yoon Chong is celebrated in Lee Kuan Yew's memoirs as a trenchant man who did not mince his words, and whose determined stance in many government infrastructural projects, such as the construction of a Mass Rapid Transport (MRT) system, the airport at Changi, a shipping container terminal, and the proposal to raise the withdrawal age of Central Provident Funds (CPF) savings from fifty-five to sixty, met with much parliamentary and public furore. However, these instances of his determined stance — where he openly and sometimes vehemently debated the merits of his point of view against the opinions of other ministers and official reports — firmly entrenched him not so much as a fierce, tough-talking man, but a man with strong convictions who wanted to serve the community at large to the best of his abilities.

Despite his image as a truculent, no-nonsense civil servant and politician, Howe was a reluctant politician. An investigation into his history reveals that he was a simple man, without any desire for political power. He was born in 1923 in China to a liquor merchant who had immigrated to Malacca in British Malacca. On completing his education in St Francis's Institution in Malacca, and Raffles Institution in Singapore, he went on to obtain a bachelor of arts degree in Economics with honours from the University of Malay in Singapore (now known as the National University of Singapore). After that, he dedicated himself to serving the community by becoming a teacher and broadcaster before joining the administrative service in the British Colonial Secretariat, and thence a police magistrate and secretary to Singapore's Public Service Commission. Even then, he was reluctant to participate formally in politics. When Lee Kuan Yew asked him to join him in politics in 1953, he respectfully declined because he felt Singapore needed experienced civil servants in light of British repatriation after the Second World War.

Thus, in his capacity as a civil servant, he became the first chief executive officer (CEO) of the Housing and Development Board (HDB) in 1960 and was instrumental in constructing the housing estate of Toa Payoh and alleviating the chronic housing shortage problem by relocating squatters. Then, from 1970 to 1979, he served as chairman and president of the Development Bank of Singapore (DBS), the first chairman of the Port of Singapore Authority (PSA), the permanent secretary in the Prime Minister's Office, and the head of the Singapore Civil Service where he played a key role in constructing Singapore's first container port and building an international airport at Changi rather than expanding Paya Lebar Airport.

However, by 1979, Howe, did enter politics, perhaps, persuaded by then Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew (who was his ex-schoolmate at Raffles Institution) and then-Minister for Finance Goh Keng Swee that he could do much more for the community by doing so. He was a listed candidate contesting in seven constituencies in the by-elections that year. At the time, he maintained that he would serve no more than five years in politics. However, once his nomination papers were submitted for the by-election, Howe's rapier wit reared its head as he dismissed the opposition candidates as "court jesters… provid[ing] comic relief". Eventually he came to win the Potong Pasir seat and remained its Member of Parliament until 1984. With his win, Howe was sworn into the Cabinet as minister for defence and permanent secretary for the Ministry of National Development on 12 February 1979. He also concurrently served as the deputy chairman of the Economic Development Board (EDB) between 1979 and 1984.

His reputation as a principled man — one who was aghast that others may not necessarily be as upright as he was — became firmly established when he dubbed young men dodging the national service military draft "pariahs". His image as a tough talking man who firmly believed that others too ought to contribute to the community was further cemented in the years 1982 to 1984 when he relinquished his position as defence minister to become the health minister. During his tenure as minister for health, Howe made his then controversial proposal to raise the age for the withdrawal of CPF savings from fifty-five to sixty years. His rationale was that Singaporeans could not depend only on their children in their old age. Although the suggestion, and the subsequent fifty-four-page report of the Committee on the Problems of the Aged, which he chaired, were eventually rejected, the report presented a modern strategy for dealing with the problem of Singapore's ageing population. Eventually, the Singapore Government came to take up the suggestions in the report and introduced the Minimum Sum scheme where workers were allowed to withdraw some of their CPF funds at age fifty-five, and a minimum sum which may only be withdrawn at retirement age, currently at sixty-two years. This later came to mark the CPF scheme when aged workers were encouraged to stay in their jobs, and the CPF contribution rates for both employer and the aged employee were cut in July 1988, and when the government raised the retirement age to sixty in 1993. Not only did this demonstrate that Howe was forward thinking and progressive for his time, but it also demonstrated that he planned for the long-term benefit of society. His proposal to revise the CPF scheme and his push to develop the MRT system as a viable means of public transport on top of the existing bus system show that Howe was most concerned with the everyday needs of Singaporeans. He was unwilling to compromise the long term needs of Singaporeans and had considered as early as the 1970s and 1980s that a bus service would not be enough for the population as Singapore industrialized and developed. Howe also knew some means of supporting older, retired Singaporeans was needed if they were to continue to survive in a Singapore with a raised standard of living. In spite of the public outcry that usually greeted his proposals — as occurred when he sought to construct the Toa Payoh housing estate and relocate the squatters, and when he went against the advice of professionals to construct Singapore's first container port — his conviction was that the long-term benefits of implementing seemingly outrageous schemes would overcome the initial objections that it sparked. In all cases, ranging from the construction of Changi airport to the construction of the MRT system, his sense of public directedness proved right and did indeed provide large-scale convenience to Singaporeans. On his death from a stroke in August 2007, he was remembered as man who had shaped the socio-economic infrastructural landscape of Singapore.

His sense of public service did not diminish when he lost the Potong Pasir constituency in the 1984 general election and retired from politics. He continued to win acclaim for striving for the greater good of the community. As DBS's chairman and CEO from 1985–90, he continued to plan for the future of Singapore. In 1991, he helped establish the Mendaki Growth Fund for the Council for the Development of Singapore Muslim Community. Between 1992 and 2000, he was the executive chairman of Great Eastern Life Assurance, and between 1992 and 2007, he served as president and CEO of The Straits Holding Company, an investment holding firm. His contributions to Singaporean society were acknowledged many times in his long career as a civil servant. In 1968, he received a Distinguished Service Order and was later awarded the Meritorious Service Medal.

Hsu, Teresa

(许哲, Xu Zhe, 1898–2011)

Volunteer, nurse, social worker, centenarian, Singapore

She was called the "Mother Teresa of Singapore", named Reader's Digest "Hero for Today" (2004), received many awards for her acts of charity, and lived to an age of more than a hundred years. Teresa Hsu, who looked and lived younger than her age, also taught yoga voluntarily at the Singapore Buddhist Mission. She was an excellent example of an active senior citizen who founded a home for the aged sick and still ran a service delivering food to the elderly and poor families long after she had turned one hundred.

Hsu was born in 1898 to a poor family in Shantou in Guangdong province, China. Although her identity card gave her year of birth as 1912, she explained that she had lied about her age because in the early days people were required to retire at fifty-five. As she had "wanted to care for people longer" ever since she was working as a nurse in Singapore in the early 1960s, she decided to declare a younger age at the time.

Hsu remembered of the difficult days as a child and young adult in China. Her father was not only unloving and irresponsible, but also a very violent man. He often came home only for money and would up the children whenever he could not find what he wanted. In the mid-1920s, her mother, Tan Sok Chan, could no longer tolerate her husband's abusive behaviour and took the children — elder sister Ursula, younger sister Lucy, younger brother Anthony, and Teresa — to Penang, Malaysia, where they worked as cleaners in a convent.

Hsu was already twenty-seven when she arrived in Penang. As she did not want to be a cleaner all her life, she asked the nuns in the convent to allow her to study with the children while earning her living. She passed her Senior Cambridge examinations four years later. Equipped with a basic education, she ventured to Hong Kong. After a few years working there as a clerk helping to set up a welfare group, the Needy Association in Hong Kong, she moved to Chongqing in China at the start of the Sino-Japanese war in 1937 to become a secretary in a German news agency.

After seeing many Chinese civilians suffer and die during the war in China, Hsu quit her job at the news agency to become a volunteer. When the war ended in 1945, she went to England to be trained as a nurse. She spent eight years in England doing nursing and another eight in Paraguay as a member of the German charity group, Bruderhof, in starting hospitals and homes for the aged there.

In 1961 she returned to Penang to be with her mother and became the sister-in-charge of the Assunta Foundation in Petaling Jaya, Malaysia. In 1963 she came to Singapore to be Matron of Kwong Wai Shiu Hospital. The same year she started the Heart-to-Heart Service which delivered food to the elderly poor in Singapore. In 1965 she and her elder sister, Ursula, bought a piece of land with a bungalow at 27 Jalan Payoh Lai in Hougang for $150,000 and set up the Welfare Resthome, which later became the Home for the Aged Sick. It was at the time one of the first privately run nursing homes for the elderly in Singapore.

Athough she retired officially as matron of the Home for the Aged Sick in 1985, she continued to live and care for the elderly in the home, most of them much younger than herself. In 1999, when the home moved to its present premises in Hougang Avenue 1, she moved with it and was given her own living quarters where she set up a library with more than 2,000 books.

Hsu's contributions to society, especially to the elderly sick, did not go unnoticed. In 1988 she was awarded the Guinness Stout Effort Award. In 1994 she received the Life Insurance Association Award for her charity work. In 2000 she was given a special award by Her World magazine for her lifetime work in administering to the poor, the aged, and the sick.

More awards followed in 2003 when she was named Active Senior Citizen of the Year by the Ministry of Community Development and Sports. In the same year she also received an honorary doctorate degree from the University of Queensland, Australia. In 2004, she was given the Sporting Singapore Inspiration Awards by the Singapore Sports Council for teaching and inspiring many senior citizens to take up yoga. In 2005, for her participation in the Heart-to-Heart Service which delivered food to the elderly and poor families, she received the Special Recognition Award at the National Volunteerism and Philanthropy Awards Ceremony.

When asked in a media interview in 1999 her reasons for starting homes for the elderly sick, she said: "When I was a child, in my hometown in Shantou, China, I saw a lot of beggars through a window in our house. Some couldn't walk, others shitted on the road and cried out loud for help. My heart would cry for them. I said nobody should go on like that. I told myself that when I grew up and had money, I would give them to these poor people. When I came to Singapore, I looked out for the poor and the neglected and visited them. But I can't stay with them and look after them unless I have a home for them."

In another interview, she said she had no secret to good health and longevity. She quipped: "All I do is to be happy and keep smiling. And I don't have a mother-in-law to scold me all the time."

Hsu never married. Her Danish boyfriend, a fellow volunteer whom she met during the Sino-Japanese war in Chongqing, China, died in an air crash on his way to meet her in London after the war in 1945.

Hsu died peacefully at home on 7 December 2011. She was 113.

Hsu Yun-Tsiao

(许云樵, Xu Yunqiao, 1905–81)
Historian, scholar, professor, Singapore

Hsu Yun-Tsiao is well known in the Chinese academia in Malaysia and Singapore as an outstanding scholar in Southeast Asian history. He excelled in textual research on the ancient history of Southeast Asia and made significant contributions to the historical study of the overseas Chinese in Southeast Asia. He was a scholar of many talents and was knowledgeable not only in history, but also philology, phonology and folklore study. To him academic research was a lifelong pursuit. He was a prolific writer who never stopped his academic writing even when he was faced with adverse situations in life. He produced many remarkable books and research papers. However, in his old age, he lived a difficult life and was burdened with illness and poverty for many years.

Hsu Yun-Tsiao's original name was Yu (钰) and he had also called himself Mengfei (梦飞) or Xiyishizhu (希夷室主). His ancestors were from Wuxi (无锡) in Jiangsu (江苏) province. He was born in Suzhou (苏州) in 1905. His parents passed away when he was still at a young age and he was brought up by his grandmother. Later, with financial assistance provided by friends and relatives, he studied at Dongwu University (东吴大学) as well as Dongwu Normal University (东吴师范大学) in Suzhou and the University Section of Chinese Public School (中国公学大学部) in Shanghai. However, he was eventually forced to quit his studies due to financial difficulties. Subsequently he did self-study, focusing on history and geography of Southeast Asia. In 1931, Hsu went to Singapore and later taught in several schools, including Foon Yew High School (宽柔学校) in Johor Bahru, Johor, Jing Fang Girls School (静芳女子学校) in Singapore, and Pattani Zhonghua High School (北大年中华中学), as well as Bangkok State Commercial College (曼谷国立商科学院) in Thailand. It was at this time that he started his research on the history of Southeast Asia and ethnic Chinese in the region. While in Thailand, he focused on studying the history of Pattani and completed a book entitled History of Pattani《北大年史》. In this book, he pointed out the error in Chinese classical writings that treated Pattani and Brunei as the same entity. It was regarded as his representative work on Southeast Asian history. In 1938, he resigned from his teaching post in Bangkok and returned to Singapore to work in Sin Chew Jit Poh《星洲日报》as editor of the Special Edition of Singapore in a Decade《星洲十年》. In 1940, he joined several other scholars, including Guan Chupu (关楚璞), Yu Dafu (郁达夫), Zhang Liqian (张礼千) and Yao Nan (姚楠) from Singapore, Liu Shiben (刘士木) from Penang, and Li Changfu (李长傅) from Shanghai, to set up the South Seas Society of China (中国南洋学会). This was the earliest academic organization on Southeast Asian studies formed by Chinese scholars outside China. Hsu was a committee member of the society and was appointed chief editor of Journal of South Seas Society《南洋学报》. He edited twenty-six issues of the journal in thirteen volumes and wrote more than sixty research papers in Chinese and English. A paper entitled A Study on Dandan《丹丹考》which he published in the inaugural issue of the journal was awarded the first grant for South Seas Historical Research of the Yi Guangyan Academic Award (蚁光炎学术奖) in China. This was the first time an overseas Chinese scholar won the grant.

In 1942, the Japanese army invaded and occupied Singapore. Hsu was however determined not to serve the Japanese. In 1949, he resigned from his job in Nanyang Bookstore (南洋书局) and teamed up with his friends to set up an iron cast factory. The factory was, however, not well managed and was incurring heavy losses. It was closed down after operating for ten years. In 1957, he was recruited by Nanyang University (南洋大学) in Singapore as an associate professor in the Faculty of History and Geography, and head of the South Seas Research Centre. Five years later, at the end of the employment contract, he left to set up the Southeast Asian Research Institute (东南亚研究所) and published the Journal of Southeast Asian Research (东南亚研究). In 1963, Mei Hua Rubber Limited Company (美华树胶有限公司) hired him as head of its Research Centre. Soon after that, in 1964, he was employed by Ngee Ann College (义安学院) in Singapore as secretary in the Principal's Office and professor of History and Geography and was also tasked with the publication of the college's newsletter. In 1968, he was involved in a road accident that injured his pelvic and wrist bones. In the same year, Ngee Ann College was moved to a new place and was converted into a technical college. Hsu, then aged sixty-three, decided to retire that year at the age of sixty-three. In early 1970, he was invited by Dr Huang Lisong (黄丽松), then chancellor of Nanyang University, to edit and annotate historical records on Southeast Asia contained in the book Qing Shilu《清实录》and to compile the index.

Hsu was an avid reader and led a simple life, with most of his money spent on books. He had a collection of Chinese and English books totalling more than 30,000 copies, most of which were about Southeast Asian studies. In his twilight years his left eye went blind and he was bedridden. In order to finance his medical treatment, he was forced to sell his collection of books. A businessman, Xu Murong (许木荣), agreed to buy his book collection which was eventually donated to the Singapore Federation of Chinese Clan Associations (新加坡宗乡会馆联合总会). Hsu passed away in Singapore on 17 November 1981. He was sixty-six.

Hsu's academic works covered a wide range of subjects. Apart from studying his favourite subjects such as the history and geography of Southeast Asia, as well as phonology and language, he had also done research on overseas Chinese, traditional medicine, history and historical records, folklore and religions, stamps, and even rubber. He had a special talent for textual research and could write elaborate academic papers on his textual research regarding ancient history, such as A Study on Dandan《丹丹考》, A Study of Dani《大泥考》, A Study on Chih-tu《赤土考》, etc. He was no less prolific in producing writings on subjects of general interests such as History of Malaya《马来亚史》and History of South Seas《南洋史》. Moreover, he could even write layman articles and books such as A Brief History of Hu's Career《胡氏事业史略》 and Stories of Malaya《马来亚丛谈》.

Hsu also accomplished much in editing, translation, and annotation work. When he was working at Sin Chew Jit Poh during the pre-war period, he edited pages on Southeast Asian studies such as History and Geography of South Seas《南洋史地》, South Seas Culture《南洋文化》 and also Singapore in a Decade《星洲十年》. He was also editor of many journals and magazines, including Journal of South Seas Society《南洋学报》, South Seas Magazine《南洋杂志》, Malaya Teenage News《马来亚少年报》, South Seas Studies《南洋研究》, and Journal of Southeast Asian Research《东南亚研究》. In addition, he also played a critical role in the publication of eleven volumes of Valuable Historical Documents on South Seas《南洋珍本文献》and twelve books under the Asian African Book Series (亚非丛书). In his old age, he edited several other books on Chinese medicine and literature such as Writings at XiaoQingZhai《晓晴斋散记》, Essays on Chinese Medicine《医学文澜》, Annotated Essays on Chinese Medicine by LiBoGai《黎伯概医海文澜辑注》, Bibliography of Traditional Chinese Drugs《传统中药展览目录》 as well as a collection of his own essays and poems entitled Xiyishi Anthology《希夷室文集》. More importantly, he edited Malayan Chinese Resistance to Japan 1937–1945《新马华人抗日史料》, a book of more than a thousand pages that had put together valuable historical information not available from other sources. The book has been regarded as an indispensable reference for studies on contemporary history, relating to the contributions of ethnic Chinese in Southeast Asia to fight against the Japanese and the building of new nations in the region.

In terms of translation, his first translated work, Biography of Siamese King Phya Taksin《暹罗王郑昭传》is well known locally and abroad. His translation of Malay Annals《马来纪年》was the earliest Chinese translation of this important book. His other translation works include Records of Voyages《佛罗利氏航海记》by Pieter Willemsz van Elbing, General History of Vietnam《安南通史》, originally written by Japanese author Onishi Kazuhiko, as well as Informacao Da Aurea Chersoneso ou Peninsula das Ilhas Auriferas Carbunculas e Aromaticas《黄金半岛题本》, and World History of Inventions《世界发明史》. He had also produced significant works in annotation as well as textual research and the most important examples are Annotations to Xu Zhong's Encyclopedia of Southern China Herbs《徐衷南方草物状辑注》, Annotations to Kang Tai's Travelogue to Foreign Countries during the Wu Period《康泰吴时外国传辑注》, The Preliminary Bibliography of the Southeast Asian Studies《南洋文献叙录长编》as well as Supplement to the Preliminary Bibliography of the Southeast Asian Studies《南洋文献叙录续编》. Besides, he also published anthologies of his own essays and poetry such as Floating Clouds Anthology《浮云集》and Xiyishi Anthology《希夷室文集》.

Hsu's achievements in the field of Southeast Asian studies were unrivalled in the Chinese academia in Malaysia and Singapore during his time. He had spared no efforts in promoting Southeast Asian studies through his academic research and activities. Among his peer scholars in Malaysia and Singapore, no one else had been able to promote academic research work with such charismatic zest and comprehensive scope of knowledge. In addition, he had attempted to adopt the pragmatic methods of textual research to construct an outline of the ancient history of Malaya so that it would not seem too distant and inaccessible. He was also keen in encouraging and grooming younger scholars to carry out research works in South Seas studies using the Chinese language. He was elected deputy president of the Malayan Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society and was deputy president of the China Studies Society. After his death, he was recognized as a major scholar and a doyen of Southeast Asian studies. In his long academic career, he had produced thirty-six books and about 400 research papers, thus leaving behind a profound cultural heritage for the academia in Malaysia and Singapore.

Hu Yi

(Ek O-charoen, 胡翼, 1921–)
Chinese mass media leader, Thailand

Hu Yi, or Ek O-charoen in Thai, made a major contribution to Thai Chinese broadcasting history as a major figure in the Chinese section of Radio Thailand and Thai Rediffusion. He also worked as deputy director (副社长) of a Chinese language newspaper in Bangkok. Like many Chinese-educated Thai Chinese before World War II, Hu was initially oriented towards China. Only later did he return to serve his country of birth.

Hu was born in Chonburi Province in eastern Thailand in 1921. His ancestors came from the Puning (普宁) district in Guangdong Province of China. Hu was a nephew of a locally prominent merchant, Hu Zhaoyu (胡兆玉). Hu received a Chinese education at Xinmin (新民) school and Zhonghua (中山) secondary school in Bangkok. When the anti-Japanese war began, he devoted his life to serving the "motherland", China, and went to China to enroll at the Central Military School. During his training, he joined a battle against the Japanese in southern Guilin (桂南会战). After graduating in 1941, Hu was in the Nanyang special training class of the Military Commission Committee, and later joined the Kuomintang's (KMT) Special Military Committee in charge of Overseas Chinese Affairs. As a result, he came to Thailand and accomplished his mission in 1944. When the Second World War ended, as an official of KMT's Overseas Chinese Affairs Committee, he took on the role of Overseas Commission Office Controller (海外部特派员办事处总务科长) and was a member of the Central Standing Committee for the Bangkok branch. After fulfilling his service commitments with the army of the Nationalist government, Hu began to work for the Chinese section of Radio Thailand as deputy director.

When the Thai government decided to establish a Chinese broadcasting company, Hu Yi was invited to head this company because of his experience in Chinese broadcasting. This newly established company was called the Thai Rediffusion Company, while its radio station was named Thai Rediffusion. Rediffusion (known in Chinese as Lidehusheng, 丽的呼声) service was first established in the United Kingdom in 1920 and then went to the British colonies — Hong Kong, Singapore, and Malaya — in the late 1940s. In 1956 it was also introduced to Thailand and became a semi-private enterprise funded by the Thai Government. Hu was head of the Chinese section of the Thai Rediffusion Company, and was responsible for producing and organizing Chinese programmes.

It is said that Hu had a special relationship with a prominent Thai official, M.L. Khap Kunchon, who strongly advocated for the Rediffusion project. In fact Hu had known M.L. Khap since he was working for the KMT in Chongqing during the anti-Japanese war. M.L. Khap invited him at the time to work at Radio Thailand to produce Chinese programmes if he returned to Thailand. Thus, when the Second World War ended and Hu returned to Thailand, he began to work for the Chinese section of Radio Thailand. When the government established the Thai Rediffusion Company, he was trusted to take a key position in the new company.

Despite its immense popularity in Hong Kong, Singapore, and Malaya/Malaysia, Thai Rediffusion did not take off immediately. When Rediffusion first went into operation in Bangkok, there were only 5,000 subscribers and for the next few years it was always in the red. This was understandable as many radio stations also provided Chinese broadcasts, and Rediffusion faced tough competition. However, the big change came in early 1959 when eleven out of twelve radio stations that had Chinese broadcasts were ordered by the government to stop their Chinese programmes. A growing number of people began to subscribe to Rediffusion as it was the only legal Chinese transmission available in Thailand.

It should be noted that Rediffusion provided its own receiving sets to subscribers. In the late 1960s, there were approximately 28,000 receiving sets in Bangkok (in both Phranakhon and Thonburi) with an estimated 200,000 or more listeners. For its three branch stations, there were altogether roughly 5,000 receiving sets with an estimated 50,000 listeners. If we take the country as a whole, the size of audience was around 300,000 daily, 95 per cent of whom listened to Chinese programmes. It was estimated that approximately 89 per cent of the Thai Chinese listened to Rediffusion broadcasts regularly.

It can be said that the appeal of Rediffusion programmes lay mainly in drama and music. Hu also managed one of the three drama troupes of Rediffusion, named the "Bangkok drama troupe". The Bangkok drama troupe regularly broadcast Teochew operas and dramas adapted from Chinese classics, for example, Sanguo (The Romance of the Three Kingdoms), Xishi yu Fanli (The Beauty Xishi), Chang-e ben yue (Chang-e Flying to the Moon), Xixiangji (The Romance of the West Chamber), Mudanting (The Peony Pavilion), Jingu Qiguan (Stories Odd and New), and Yangjiajiang (Yang Warrior Family). Hu's works gained much popularity with audiences.

In addition to Thai Rediffusion, Hu also worked for a Chinese newspaper, Sirinakhon (《京华报》), established under the direct control of the Public Relations Department. Founded on 29 January 1959, Sirinakhon soon became one of the "big four" Chinese dailies. It was particularly aimed at helping the government to disseminate official information and policies concerning the Chinese, and it became a channel reflecting social and commercial developments. Hu held a deputy director position at Sirinakhon as well as being head of Chinese section of the Thai Rediffusion Company.

Thai Rediffusion ended its service on 31 August 1982, having served the Chinese community in Thailand since 1956. Although it had lost its popularity drastically since the late 1970s, Hu Yi will nevertheless always be remembered as a prominent figure in Thai Rediffusion by his listeners.

Huang, Daniel Patrick Lim

(黄大年, Huang Danian, 1959–)

Jesuit priest, religous leader, Philippines

Rev. Daniel Huang, S.J. is a Jesuit priest, and also a leader of the Jesuit community in the Philippines and the Asia Pacific region as well.

Most of the Chinese in the Philippines can trace their family history to humble beginnings in Fujian, China. The family of Huang is different because they came from the scholarly class. His paternal grandfather, S.T. Huang, passed the imperial examinations during the waning years of the Qing Dynasty. On his mother's side, he is descended from the Limtuaco clan of Destileria Limtuaco, one of the oldest distilleries in the Philippines. His great-grandfather, Lim Tua Co (林章赖), was also a jinshi (进士) in the 1843 imperial examination.

Born in Manila to Daniel Huang Sr. and Leoncia Lim on 15 March 1959, Daniel Patrick or "Danny," is the fifth of eight children. He finished his basic education at Xavier School, a Chinese Catholic school in San Juan, Metro Manila, founded by Jesuit missionaries who were originally working in China. Huang graduated in 1980 as valedictorian of his secondary school class in 1976, and enrolled at the Ateneo de Manila University, where he graduated with a degree in AB interdisciplinary studies, magna cum laude.

He was active in student movements throughout his university years, which were during the period of martial rule in the Philippines. The Ateneo de Manila campus then was like other university campuses where ideologies were being debated and young people sought to articulate a vision of reform for the Philippine society. Huang served as external vice-president of the student government and was a founding member of the "socially oriented" cluster of student organizations. These organizations championed the cause for social justice, the need for reforms and good governance, and the urgent need to reach out to the poor and the marginalized.

In May 1980, two months after graduating from university, he joined the Society of Jesus (Jesuits) as a novice at the Sacred Heart Novitiate in Novaliches where he took his first vows in 1982. His decision to enter into religious life was both a spiritual calling and a concrete response to the signs of the times. At the time, it was not common for ethnic Chinese, especially those who were "pure Chinese" on both sides of the family, to embrace a religious vocation.

Huang went through years of Jesuit studies and training, which included two years as chair of the English Department at Xavier University High School in Cagayan de Oro City, Mindanao. During this period, he taught his students English, religion, and journalism, and became fluent in the Visayan language himself. He was also assigned as assistant director of Haggerty Hall, a residence for young candidates to the Jesuit religious life. He returned to the Loyola House of Studies in Manila in 1985 to complete his first degree in theology in 1988 and was ordained as a priest in March that year, which make him the first Xavier School alumnus to be ordained a Jesuit priest.

Huang spent one year in Ipil, Zamboanga del Sur, doing pastoral work. It was a most difficult task as he had to do his Christian duties amidst the political unrest and conflicts between Christians and Muslims, and among the indigenous tribes and contentious factions of Muslim warlords. After Zamboanga, he travelled to Washington, D.C. to pursue his graduate studies at The Catholic University of America. He earned two ecclesiastical degrees, the licentiate and doctorate degrees in sacred theology, graduating summa cum laude in 1996. His doctoral dissertation was on the 19th-century English theologian, John Henry Newman.

On returning to the Philippines, he was assigned to train future priests at the San Jose Seminary and to teach at the Loyola School of Theology at the Ateneo de Manila University. He served in various capacities in these two institutions, and eventually became director of the seminary and associate professor at the school. He also served on various strategic planning commissions of the Jesuits in the Philippines and gave retreats to many groups of priests and nuns. Huang came to be known in the Philippine Catholic Church as an eloquent speaker and theologian with depth. His speeches and sermons derived from his love for reading, and even had clever references to pop culture and observations that he makes from everyday life. His uplifting sermons and retreat messages inspired future priests to serve as beacons in challenging times, as he referred to in one of his commencement speeches as "builders of hope".

In 2004, Huang was chosen to lead a 330-strong contingent of Jesuits in the Philippines. To mirror the simplicity of the priest, he was inducted with simple rites as the ninth provincial superior of the Philippine Province of the Society of Jesus. Many marvelled at his appointment, and some viewed it with apprehension as Huang, at the age of forty-five, might have been too young to handle all the challenges that would be thrown his way. After all, through the years, the Society in Asia had been grappling with several issues — the consolidation of its various apostolate (works, ministries, institutions), the optimization of its manpower resources, the renewal of its social apostolate (works that deal directly with the poor, such as the prison and hospital ministry, counselling for overseas Filipino workers), the more effective coordination of its schools, better care of its aged and infirm, and a greater openness in the call for more apostolic engagement, following the disciples of Jesus who engaged the world and all its problems in Southeast Asia. These apprehensions quickly dissipated as Huang's qualities proved ideal for the task. Jesuits who have sat with Huang in either individual or communal spiritual exercises, as well as in his renowned Christology seminars cum retreats, noted his wonderful blend of intelligence and sharp judgment that enables him to see through extraneous material that often muddles important issues.

Huang takes issues to a level of clarity by deftly pruning non-essentials, patiently persevering with this process in spite of the discomfort that it exacts from him. One more factor that works in Huang's favour is his self-deprecating humour. People have found him to be a delightfully easy person to be with, and many in the Jesuit, Xavier, and Ateneo communities were somewhat saddened when it was announced in 2008 that Huang was selected at a world meeting of Jesuits to represent the Asia-Pacific region at the society's headquarters in Rome, simply because he would have to live away from the Philippines.

Huang represents the Asia Pacific as regional assistant, one of twelve "general counsellors," who advise the superior-general, head of all the Jesuits in the world.

Huang Yao

(黄尧, 1917–87)

Cartoonist, painter, writer, historian, educator, Malaysia

The life of Huang Yao began in Shanghai and ended in Kuala Lumpur, and in the seventy years in between, he transformed himself from a journalist and cartoonist to an educator and painter. He was nationally celebrated as a patriotic cartoonist before he left China for good in 1947, and was well known as an artist of traditional Chinese painting and calligraphy in Southeast Asia since his immigration to Malaya in 1956. Throughout his life, Huang Yao was driven by a humanitarian passion to inspire and educate the public, especially children. His work in education, regrettably, has been overshadowed by his visible achievements in art.

While his ancestry traces back to Jiashan County, Zhejiang Province in China, Huang Yao was born in Shanghai in 1917. His given name was Songtang (颂唐), but he adopted the name Yao (the name of a sage king in legendary China) when he began his journalist career in Shanghai. At the age of sixteen, Huang Yao joined a newspaper called Xinwenbao (The Shanghai Post) as a journalist and later became the art editor of its literary supplement until 1939.

In May 1934 he began to publish his Niubizi cartoons in the supplement under the English name of W. Buffoon. Niubizi literally means "ox's nose;" because the hair bun of the Daoist priest resembles an ox's nose, he was sometimes ridiculed as an "ox-nose" in traditional China. Apparently unaware of the origin of the appellation, Huang Yao himself gave it a meaning of his own. To him, Niubizi means a person of tenacious perseverance who refuses to yield to his enemies. And his English pseudonym, Buffoon, of course, refers to the clown in a circus. As he explains, "the clown needs to have greater skills than the stars of the show, and the audience will only see him laugh on stage but no one sees him cry offstage." Perhaps in the eyes of Huang Yao, China in the 1930s — at the mercy of international discrimination and in the grips of social injustice — looked pretty much like a circus, and he decided to take it upon himself the patriotic obligation to call his fellow countrymen's attention to China's social and political ills. He himself remarked that "The simple and innocent Chinese people are outraged that they have been barred along with dogs from parks in their own country, by foreigners who have overpowered us with brute force and opium. The ordinary citizens are those who have been humiliated most. We need to stand up to the foreigners and assert our presence. I try to expose this injustice and urge my fellow countrymen to think about their plight and to do something about it."

The Niubizi cartoon, drawn with the Chinese brush and ink, and often with a sense of humour, appeared in the Xinwenbao daily; it satirized domestic injustice and international aggression in Chinese society and showed the cartoonist's abiding love for his country and profound sympathy for its people. It extolled the good nature of man and condemned its darker side. In its historical milieu, the cartoon strip, as a relatively new form of artistic expression in China, empowered the ordinary Chinese person with a voice and critiqued the conduct of people in the upper social echelon.

The cartoon strip was an instant success and Niubizi became a "fantastically popular" character. In Shanghai people allegedly would often look for the cartoon strip first before they read the news. Soon Niubizi cartoons appeared in cartoon periodicals, literary journals, and children's magazines, etc. as well. During the war against the Japanese invasion, Niubizi cartoons exalted the perseverance of the Chinese people and their noble spirit of self-sacrifice, and rallied young people to defend their country. Huang Yao was considered a "militant cartoonist" in China; the first collection of Niubizi cartoons was published on 18 September 1935, the fourth anniversary of the Japanese invasion in north-east China. Four more collections followed in the next two years. The enormous popularity of Niubizi cartoons inspired numerous imitations; Huang Yao finally had Niubizi registered with the government on 16 June 1937, just three weeks before the Marco Polo Bridge Incident, which eventually developed into the eight-year warfare between the two countries. Surprisingly, the cartoon was also published by the Japanese in their home country to criticize its aggression in Asia.

Under threat from the Japanese, Huang Yao had himself transferred to Xinwenbao's Chongqing office soon after the Japanese invaded Shanghai in 1937. Yet his effort to defend China with his cartoon art did not relent; he continued to publish his own cartoons (1938*a*, 1938*b*, 1939, 1941, 1941*a*, 1941*b*, 1943*a*, 1943*b*) and edited those of others (1940*a*, 1940*b*). While in south-west China between 1938 and 1941, Huang Yao began to produce New Year woodblock prints as a means to mobilize the peasants to fight against the Japanese. They were extremely popular. Niubizi was then ingeniously decked out as a pair of door gods. Another print called "Demon Queller Zhong Kui Fighting against the War" had a run of 500,000 copies and was distributed during the anti-Japanese war. Huang Yao resigned from the Xinwenbao in 1945.

The cartoonist left China in 1945 and lived in Vietnam, Hong Kong, and Thailand over the next ten years. While living in Thailand, he painted the local people and landscapes in watercolour. He also helped with the Chinese language education there. In 1956, at the invitation of Ministry of Education, Malaya, he came and assisted in setting up and implementing policies for adult education. Huang Yao first arrived in Singapore where he completed the set of cartoons called Malay Niubizi, for sale in an exhibition for the benefit of Singapore's Chinese orphans. His desire to localize his artwork was already evident at this stage. Huang Yao then stayed two years in Kuala Lumpur, where he compiled in Chinese, Malay, and English, workbooks for art and language education. He also revised his Ten Talks on Niubizi for publication — a work that he had first published in Shanghai twenty years ago, and it sold millions of copies then. His Niubizi cartoons, now focusing on education, appeared in the Zhongguo Bao (China Post) every Sunday. Meanwhile, he travelled through the country, helping to implement adult education and establish libraries. He was also the chief editor of the Malayan Public Library Association. From 1959 to 1961 he taught at Han Chiang High School, a Chinese school in Penang. Thereafter he was the headmaster of Sin Min Middle School in Alor Star until 1973, when he retired.

While Huang Yao's career of education in Malaysia might have been an unexpected turn in his life, his commitment to education was evident even in the 1930s. He published Ten Talks on Niubizi in Shanghai in 1936, a work that taught young people and children how to draw the cartoon figure, Niubizi. The book was so popular that it was later adopted as an instruction manual in primary and secondary schools all over China. In 1937 Huang Yao created a magazine called Niutou Manhua (Oxhead Cartoons) to publish Niubizi and other cartoons drawn by children from all over the country.

Huang Yao's art witnessed new developments in form, content, and style after he immigrated to Malaysia. Most notably, he developed a new series of cartoons called "Eve and Adam", as well as traditional Chinese paintings of children at play. His paintings now also depict the life in Malaya, sporting coconut trees, fishing villages, and rubber plantations. Most significantly, he created an idiosyncratic style of Chinese painting comprising Chinese pictographs in their archaic forms that had appeared in oracle bone and bronze inscriptions. Idioms containing time-hallowed Chinese wisdom and famous lines from Chinese lyrical poetry were the common stock of his pictographic paintings. He continued to refine a unique style of Chinese calligraphy that was written upside down to imitate the uncultivated simplicity from the brush of a child. Huang Yao called it "calligraphy that resembles clouds emerging spontaneously from the mountain range" (chuyun shu).

Besides his artistic works, Huang Yao published the Ma Xin Huaren Zhi (History of the Chinese in Malaya and Singapore) in 1967, a research project that took him ten years to complete. One of the pioneering works on the Chinese in Southeast Asia, it details the history, geography, customs, and life in Malaya and Singapore. In 1978 he wrote several articles on the business history of the Chinese in Nanyang (South of China, especially Southeast Asia) for a magazine titled, Shang Hai.

After retirement, Huang Yao lived in Penang for five years before moving to Kuala Lumpur in 1978. In the Eighties, he began to write on Chinese painting in the newspapers and his essays were published posthumously in a book called Moyuan Suibi (Random jottings on my paintings) in 2000. He passed away in 1987.

Huang Yun Yo

(黄润岳, Huang Runyue, 1921–2005)
Educationist, Malaysia

Huang Yun Yo, a well known Chinese educationist in Malaysia, has served as principal of several Chinese independent secondary schools. He played a pivotal role in the history of Chinese education in Malaysia when he was brave enough to take up the post of chairman of the United Chinese School Teachers' Association of Malaysia (马来西亚华校教师会总会) (UCSTAM) at a time when the association was on the verge of collapse. By taking steps to consolidate and strengthen the association against all odds, he led the Chinese education movement in Malaysia through one of its toughest times, thus laying a stronger foundation for its subsequent developments.

Huang was born in 1921 in Changsha (长沙) in Hunan (湖南) province and received his primary and secondary education in his hometown. During the Second World War, he studied in Chungqing (重庆) and graduated from the Faculty of Law at the National Chengchi University (国立政治大学) in 1945. He came to Malaya in 1950 and first taught at Chung Hua High School (中华中学) in Seremban, Negeri Sembilan. Subsequently he served as principal of Shing Chung Secondary School (兴中中学) in Sungai Siput, Perak. From 1951 to 1964, he was principal of Chong Hwa High School S.B.R. (Senggarang, Benut, Rengit) (新文龙中华中学) in Rengit, Johor. In 1956 he furthered his studies at the Tropical Education Research Centre of the Institute of Education, University of London in England, where he earned a Diploma in Education. In 1957 he attended the International Teachers Training Course at the Graduate School of Education, Harvard University, in the United States. He was invited to join the Working Committee of UCSTAM in 1958 and became the chief editor of Teachers Magazine (教师杂志) in 1959. From 1961 to 1963, he was chairman of UCSTAM and thereafter worked as principal of Pay Fong High School (培风中学) in Malacca. In recognition of his significant contributions to Chinese education in Malaysia, he was presented with the Spirit of Lim Lian Geok Award (林连玉精神奖) in 1997. He died in 2005 in Canada.

Huang had made two significant contributions to Chinese education in Malaysia. The first relates to his willingness to take up the post of chairman of UCSTAM vacated by Lim Lian Geok who was stripped of his citizenship and teaching permit for openly objecting to the Rahman Talib Report that proposed the conversion of Chinese secondary schools to national type secondary schools. It was a critical time for the association and all the five vice chairmen were then unwilling to take up the post. With advice from Lim Lian Geok and Dr Yen Yuan Chang (严元章), Huang came forward to lead the association in continuing its fight against the government's plan to convert the Chinese secondary schools.

Huang also made another contribution to Chinese education in Malaysia by publishing Teachers Magazine as the official publication of UCSTAM. Huang was the publisher of the magazine and when Dr Yen Yuan Chang left to head the Faculty of Arts in Nanyang University (南洋大学), he and Bai Chunyu (白纯谕) became the co-editors. This magazine was published from January 1959 to February 1964, producing twenty issues over a period of six years. Its publication resumed in January 1968, but was terminated again in December 1976. The magazine had a strong editorial board and was able to invite contributions of articles from well known scholars and writers. It was well received due to the high quality articles it published and its function in promoting Chinese culture and education. However, it was banned by the government for publishing a series of memoirs written by Lim Lian Geok entitled, Fragments of Nostalgic Reflections (回忆片片录). Later, when Lim had completed his memoirs, he handed the manuscripts to Huang and requested the latter to publish them only after he had breathed his last.

During his lifetime, Huang had demonstrated strong commitment to Chinese education in Malaysia and held insightful optimism about the prospects of Chinese independent secondary schools. These are well reflected in his book, Critical Essays on Independent Chinese Secondary Schools (独中论丛). There were then many Chinese independent secondary schools which were either forced or coaxed into conversion and only a few remained firm and committed to operate without any government subsidy. Chong Hwa High School S.B.R., where he was then serving as the principal, was one of the few. In fact, before the conversion in 1961, Huang had been called up by a high-ranking British education officer who tried to persuade him to accept conversion. Huang was, however, not moved and he gave a firm reply: "My children are all studying in a private school in Rengit. The private schools are well-run and we do not want your subsidy. So why should you want us to accept the conversion?" Furthermore, he had also been summoned by the state director of Education in Johor and was warned by the school inspector. However he refused to give in.

At the National Seminar for principals of Independent Chinese Secondary Schools, organized by UCSTAM on 10 August 1962, Huang delivered a speech entitled "We Can Survive, We Can Develop" (能生存，有发展). If we read the text of his speech now —with the benefit of hindsight after a lapse of several decades — we would be amazed by his courageous stance and far-sighted perspectives on the developments of Chinese education in Malaysia. The text of this speech was included in his book, Critical Essays on Independent Chinese Secondary Schools, published in June 1973. This book is a collection of his essays on independent Chinese secondary schools that were published in the newspapers and magazines from 1960 to 1973. It is a comprehensive record of his views and ideals about independent Chinese secondary schools in Malaysia. The book revealed his strong conviction and spirit of perseverance. Huang retired in 1974 and thereafter migrated to Canada with his wife to live with their children in Ottawa. He then devoted himself to Bible studies and missionary work. He also authored many books, including Experiences in London (英伦见闻), The Golden Age (黄金时代), 14 Years in Rengit (龙引十四年), Essays on Education (教育丛谈), Idle Thoughts (闲思录), Service and Growth (侍奉与成长), etc.

Although Huang had served as chairman of UCSTAM for only two terms, his tenure of office was at a critical time that was much tougher to handle, compared with any other time in the history of the association. It was a time when any harsh action from the government could be expected anytime. However, he did not in any way submit to threats and intimidation encountered and was ever ready to face up to any eventuality. It was his far-sightedness and moral courage that kept the association from falling apart. His effort in safeguarding the manuscripts of Lim Lian Geok was also seen as a brave move, considering the high possibility of government action against him. Above all, he upheld his confidence and conviction in fighting for the survival of Chinese education in Malaysia.

Huỳnh Thủy Lê

(黄水梨, Huang Shuili, 1906–72)
Community leader, philanthropist, Vietnam

Huỳnh Thủy Lê is known as the lover of the world-renowned French writer, Marguerite Duras. Marguerite Duras was the pseudonym of Marguerite Donnadieu (4 April 1914 – 3 March 1996) who authored the internationally acclaimed semi-autobiographical novel, L'amant (The Lover, 1984). Contrary to what is written in The North China Lover in which "The Lover" originated from the Manchurian town of Fouchouen (in French), or Fushun (抚顺, in Chinese), Huỳnh Thủy Lê and his father, Huỳnh Thuận (黄顺), once the most successful landowner and developer in Sa Dec (in Vietnamese, Sa Đéc), were not Chinese from Manchuria. Lê was a community leader of the Fujian community of Sa Dec and a philanthropist who supported massive social and community projects.

In Marguerite Duras' book, L'amant, she narrates her teenage clandestine sexual affair with an older rich Chinese man in the "town of water" where she lived from 1928 to 1932. The novel was rewritten as L'amour de la Chine du Nord (The North China Lover, 1991) for her film. A film based on the novel was directed by Jean-Jacques Annaud, produced by Claude Berri in 1992, and featured Jane March as Margarite Donnadieu and Tony Leung as her Chinese lover. Not known to many, however, is the fact, that the Lover's real-life father, Huỳnh Thuận, hailed from Fuzhou, capital of Fujian province in the southern region of China. (The two towns, Fushun (in northern China) and Fuzhou (in southern China), however, may sound similar when pronounced in French.) Different groups of Chinese settlers in those days in Sa Dec tended to specialize in different trades. The Fujianese were mainly engaged in the rice trade, the Cantonese in retail, and the Chaozhou (Teochew), sugar. The Fujianese are the third largest Chinese dialect group in Sa Dec today, after the more populous communities of the Cantonese and Chaozhou (Teochew).

Huỳnh Thuận was an illiterate who fought hard against poverty when he was young. His date of birth and death are not known. His father ("The Lover's" grandfather) was Huỳnh Diệu Vinh, and his grandfather ("The Lover's" great grandfather) was Huỳnh Thượng Thuyết. Huỳnh Thuận's wife was a Vietnamese named Nguyễn Thị Hiền (阮氏蜆), according to what is inscribed on a tomb renovated by their youngest son in 1934. The couple had five children, but only the fourth and fifth survived. Their fourth son was Huỳnh Thoại Ngọc (黄瑞玉), and "The Lover" was their fifth and youngest. On the mentioned tombstone, however, the name of the fourth son was Huỳnh Ngọc Thoại (黄玉瑞).

Huỳnh Thuận built his wealth from scratch by brokering rice and then exporting it. He later ventured aggressively into building and renting properties, and developing land in Sa Dec and Saigon by injecting in these places the spirit of commercialism. He was renowned for mooting the construction of the Fujian assembly hall (福建公所) and its temple, Kiến An Cung (建安宫) in 1924 for the Fujianese clan (bang). He parted with some of his land to finance the purchase of temple accoutrement and other construction expenditure. When it materialized in 1927, he created a Fujian vernacular-medium school (福建公所学校) next to the temple, thus becoming the first advocate of Chinese education in Sa Dec.

The shrine in the Fujian assembly hall deifies Quảng Trạch Tôn Vương (广泽尊王), colloquially called Ông Quách (郭公) in Vietnamese. The presence of the deity hints at the settlement of Fujianese from An Xi. It is thus not surprising to find that the trusted bookkeeper of the Huỳnh household, named Trần Văn Quới and called Sáu Bé (六叔), has ancestral roots in An Xi. He was seventy-one years old in 2010, and lives in a home built in the former backyard of the Huỳnh mansion which stands on the former Chi Huyện Street (currently, Nguyễn Huệ Street), close to the Fujian assembly hall.

The fame and glamour of the Huỳnh family are intertwined with the ebb and flow of the country's politics. As the French colony weakened and collapsed, giving way to socialist transformation that was rolled out after 1975, the fortunes of the Huỳnh household began to wane. The same fate can be said to have befallen the economy of the ethnic Chinese community of Sa Dec. The burial grounds of the Fujianese were transformed into a sports stadium, which swiftly deteriorated to dilapidation and currently bears no tell-tale sign of its previous function. The grave of the father of Huỳnh Thuận, Huỳnh Thượng Thuyết, can still be identified, half-buried in the marshland beside the stadium. The enormous estates of the Huỳnh were nationalized, and so were the land of other native-place associations such as those of the Hakka and the Hainanese. Lê's 114-year home became the place for conducting the affairs of the Internal Security Office until 2006, when it was restored and opened to foreign and local visitors. Today, about 500 tourists, mostly French, visit the intricately designed villa each month, according to the Dong Thap Tourism Managing Centre. Kiến An Cung, the Fujian assembly hall's temple, was designated a national cultural heritage monument of Sa Dec in 1990. It has also become a drawcard for Taiwanese tourists today.

Huỳnh Thoại Ngọc, alias Huỳnh Thủy Ngọc (黄水玉), the older brother of "The Lover", used to own a fleet of ships. He died at the age of forty-seven, after succumbing to tuberculosis. Among his three sons who survived him, the youngest, Huỳnh Thoại Chân, worked for the Government of the Republic of Vietnam (1955–75) and left the southern state for the United States before the northern communists overran Saigon on 30 April 1975. Huỳnh Thoại Ngọc's two other sons (the nephews of "The Lover"), Huỳnh Thoại Quan and Thoại Trọng, now live separately, but within walking distance from each other in Sa Dec. Quan, who has been debilitated since a medical operation, now calls a zinc-roofed wooden shed that stands adjacent to the cemetery of "The Lover" and that of "The Lover's" parents his home. Behind the cemetery are two tennis courts, each measuring about 237.5 square metres, built on the land which used to belong to the Huỳnh family. Trọng, the younger brother of Quan, resides with his mother in the left wing of the Kiến An Cung temple, where he conducts rituals. He has adopted the family name of his mother, Phan, instead of using Huỳnh.

Huỳnh Thủy Lê was sent to France for a short study stint when he was young. He was said to be able to speak some Fujian dialect besides French and Vietnamese. The role of community leader of the Fujian bang was taken over by him after his father had relinquished the post. Although Lê had also developed markets such as Chợ Tân Phúc Trung, he is remembered more for his philanthropy than entrepreneurial feats. He has been described as an altruistic and tender-hearted soul who never let go off an opportunity to support charitable causes. He was the man behind several magnificent landmarks of Sa Dec. It was said that when a monk appeared at his doorstep one day uttering his wish to build a monastery, Lê readily became the stalwart patron of the project and the monk became the founder of the Ngọc Quang monastery (玉光寺). Another beneficiary of "The Lover's" magnanimity is the famous 200-year old temple called Phước Hương Tự (福香寺). An altar dedicated to "The Lover" and his Vietnamese wife, Nguyễn Thị Mỹ (1911–2005), is found in a memorial hall for the deceased in the temple today. The Buddhist temple is colloquially called Chùa Hương (香寺).

Lê's architectural contributions to Sa Dec are not limited to Buddhist monuments. A hospital for tuberculosis patients in Rạch 4 Phường has been credited to his benevolence, but what remains in its place today is a stretch of sandy land.

Lê had three daughters and two sons: Huỳnh Thủy Tiên, Huỳnh Thủy Hà, Huỳnh Thủy Anh, Huỳnh Thủy Tuấn, and Huỳnh Thủy Tòng. His children now reside in Los Angeles in the United States except for Huỳnh Thủy Hà who lives in France. However, their professions cannot be verified. Among them, Huỳnh Thủy Anh, is perhaps the best known, both for her beauty and her political connections. She is the daughter-in-law of Trần Văn Hương (陈文香), who served as prime minister of the Republic of Vietnam (1955–75) in 1964–65 and 1968–69 and briefly, as vice-president from 21 April 1975 to 28 April 1975. While both Lê and his father, Huỳnh Thuận, died in Sa Dec, his wife, Thị Mỹ, died at the age of ninety-four (2005) in the United States.

The experiences of the Huỳnh family offer a glimpse into the spectrum of events in the twentieth century in the southern region of Vietnam: The encounters of the colonizer and the colonized, cross-cultural romance, rags to riches stories of the diasporic Chinese and their socio-political and cultural initiatives — all of which occurred within the vicissitude of approximately a century of political developments that impacted the survival and lifestyles of a community. Although the Huỳnh family has almost slipped into oblivion in Sa Dec, "The Lover" and his father have left an imprint of their past affluence and influence in the religious sphere of the local Fujian community and given the municipal economy a boost. Without their prosperity and their generosity to their community, memories of Sa Dec's past would not have been substantiated by material evidence, nor would the town have made its mark in modern international tourism after colossal waves of political changes.

Inthilath, Xay

(林浙民, Lin Zhemin, 1947–)
Educationist, community leader, Laos

Xay Inthilath was born on 15 April 1947 in Kaket Prefecture and is a second-generation overseas Chinese in Laos. His father was an immigrant from Shantou, Guangdong, in the 1920s. In 2004, he was elected chairman of Association Chinoise Vientiane (Vientiane Chinese Association, 万象中华理事会), a position which he has held until today. He also held concurrent appointments, such as in the Chinese educational arena of Laos, and was the longest serving chairman of Ecole Chinoise Lieu-Tou (寮都公学), holding office between 1970 and 2009. Inthilath graduated from this school in 1960. He married a Laotian Chinese and they have three daughters and four sons. He is proficient in Lao, Thai, Vietnamese, Mandarin, and the Chinese dialect, Teochew.

In the construction industry of Laos, Inthilath has been well known for producing high quality plywood and furniture from his Watanamith Company since the 1970s. Locally, his wood products are sold to the Lao Government, especially for constructions in Van Vieng and its vicinity after the Laotian civil war in late 1970s. Internationally, he exports his wood products to China. Despite being busy in his business, he spends a large amount of time volunteering his services at the Association Chinoise Vientiane and Ecole Chinoise Lieu-Tou.

It was during the 1920s that there were Chinese education woes in Vientiane. A few overseas Chinese wanted to set up a school for their children, but many families were new migrants who were at the stage of trying to find ways to earn a living in Laos. Hence, financial support from the overseas Chinese community was next to zero. The opening of a Chinese school was delayed a few times until the early 1930s when some overseas Chinese families managed to come up with the idea of letting out their houses for small groups of students to get together to learn the Chinese language. In this sense, a "school" that does not exist in reality was viewed as the birth of Chinese education in Laos. Some of the founders of the school were Chen Liu Fang, Jiang Sheng, Chen Shen Qun, and Lin Xinfa. On 11 November 1937, the overseas Chinese in Laos witnessed the shaping of the school through the inauguration of Ecole Chinoise Lieu-Tou in Vientiane. At the time, the school compound was a mere thirty-square feet piece of land. Chen Liu Fang was elected the first chairperson of the school. Currently it has expanded to a land area of 12,500 square feet, with 126 classrooms, an auditorium, a science laboratory, and two basketball courts. The name of the school carried a Chinese term 公学 (public school) instead of 小学 (primary school) or 中学 (secondary school). Inthilath was particularly concerned about keeping this name because he felt that a complete school will have a kindergarten, and offer a primary curriculum, a secondary curriculum, and a senior high curriculum. On top of this, it should be a learning institution for all, regardless of their nationality, ethnicity, and race.

Between 1950s and 1975, there was a period when student population exceeded 5,000, and there were more than 100 teachers, including foreign teachers, dispatched from overseas under a foreign government educational aid programme. It was in the 1950s that Laos was dragged into the Vietnam War, which gradually turned into a Laotian civil war between the Royal Laotian Government (led by King Sisavang Vong) and the Pathet Lao (supported by the North Vietnamese army) over the years. In December 1975, when the new regime, the Lao Peoples' Democratic Republic, successfully took control of the country, their first task was to reconstruct the past. Soldiers were instructed to burn books and memorabilia from the old regime. Laos was requested in 1979 by the Socialist Republic of Vietnam to end relations with the People's Republic of China, leading to its isolation in foreign relations. Hence, foreign teachers who were teaching at Ecole Chinoise Lieu-Tou were repatriated. Today, on average, the school has 1,200 students and eighty teachers. The composition of the students is 70 per cent Chinese, more than 20 per cent Laotian, and the rest, children of foreign nationals.

Inthilath's involvement in the school came to light in 1968 when he was made one of the vice-chairmen of the school committee. He was elected chairman of the school in 1970 and has sat in this position for nearly forty years. During his term of office, he initiated a donation campaign in May 1997, at the school's 65th anniversary, to raise funds for the school's renovation and additional classrooms so as to equip it with enough facilities to offer a senior high curriculum when approval was obtained from the Ministry of Education of Laos. The call for monetary contributions was very successful when people from all walks of life responded. Donors were mainly individuals and their contributions ranged from large donations such as 1,000,000 Thai baht to smaller donations of US$2–US$3. Inthilath, through the help of the Embassy of China in Laos, successfully resumed the invitation of Chinese teachers to teach at the school.

In 2001 Inthilath made another major contribution when he succeeded in convincing the Ministry of Education of Laos to let the school start senior high classes. Since then, the school's graduates who have passed the high school examination are qualified to apply and obtain direct entry to degree courses at universities such as the National University of Laos, Jinan University, and Huaqiao University in China. Besides ad hoc fund-raising projects, Inthilath also set up a long-term, self-sustainable educational fund programme where funds raised are deposited into a fixed deposit account in the bank and interests that are generated could be withdrawn for funding school activities.

Inthilath's contributions to educating the younger generation and to the development of the Laotian community received recognition from the Lao Government when he was awarded a second grade award from the president of Laos.

Iskandar, Nathanael

(Tan Goan Tiang, 陈源长, Chen Yuanchang, 1917–77)

Demographer, educationist, Indonesia

Nathanael Iskandar loved demographic data and analysis. He was the second Indonesian demographer with a doctorate degree. He initiated the program to build demographic competence in Indonesia at the Lembaga Demografi (Demographic Institute), Faculty of Economics, University of Indonesia. The institute was founded in 1964 and he was one of its four founders. He was the first director of the institute and held the post until he passed away on 1 November 1977.

Lembaga Demografi was the first institute specializing in demography in Indonesia; it has also become a reputable and leading demography institute. Not only the people in Indonesia, but people from all over the world would visit and consult Lembaga Demografi when they went to Indonesia and looked for information on demographic data and analyses.

His dedication and commitment to the use of demographic analysis for development planning was amazing. Demographic analysis has often been seen as a boring subject consisting of statistics. However, he has been proving that without the use of accurate demographic data and analyses, all development planning would be useless.

He has always opened up opportunities for his staff to learn more, sending the younger ones to earn higher degrees in demography and in its related fields both in Indonesia and overseas.

Overseas educational stints were one of Iskandar's strategies to persuade younger persons to take up demographic studies. Despite the relevance of demography for development planning, projects on demography did not carry high monetary rewards and it was thus not easy to persuade students of the Faculty of Economics to learn demography. Nevertheless, with perseverance and passion, Iskandar managed to encourage many younger staff to pursue post graduate education in demographic studies or its related fields. The last group of four research assistants at the Lembaga Demografi was sent to the United States in August 1977, three months before Iskandar passed away in November the same year. The first author of this biography was one of the four research assistants in the last group sent abroad and later became a scholar who continues to love demographic data and analysis.

Iskandar started studying demography in the early 1960s when development planning was "fashionable" in the world. He believed that useful development planning depended on the availability of accurate demographic data and analysis. He applied demographic data and analysis on planning related to food, clothing, housing, schools, hospitals, and roads.

From his study of demography, he came to the conclusion Indonesia had too large a population and that a rapidly growing population was a heavy burden to the Indonesian economy. To succeed in its economic development, Indonesia had to reduce its population growth rate through family planning. However, then President Soekarno did not believe in a family planning programme, believing instead that a large population was a great asset for the Indonesian economy. Demography became very useful for development planning when Soeharto took over the leadership of Indonesia from Soekarno in 1966. Professor Dr Widjojo Nitisastro, the first Indonesian demographer, became the main architect of economic development in the Soeharto era. Widjojo made a radical change in the Indonesian economic development paradigm. He worked closely with Iskandar (known then as Tan Goan Tiang) at Lembaga Demografi on demographic data and analysis for new development planning in Indonesia. Iskandar, however, was challenged with a very formidable task. The data on demography was low in quality. As it was difficult to use such data in development planning, he worked hard to construct good demographic data. He then conducted training to teach others how to collect and estimate demographic data. He made many presentations to introduce the relevance of demographic data and analysis for development planning, including to those at the regional levels in Indonesia.

The Lembaga Demografi carried out the first training in demography for university lecturers all over Indonesia. This training later produced many important demographers in Indonesia. The Study Program and Demographic Training at the institute produced 155 analysts in demography all over Indonesia from 1970–77. During his time, he was able to initiate the establishment of institutes in demography in fifteen regional universities in Indonesia.

One of his most important research contributions to development policies in Indonesia was his work on population projection. In 1976, he projected four scenarios of the Indonesian population by the year 2001. It should be noted that the family planning programme was only started in 1969, when people were still sceptical of the results of the programme. Therefore, the first scenario was that the family planning programme would be a failure and the fertility rate would remain the same until 2001, when the population would reach 277.3 million. The second scenario, which he believed was the most likely to happen, was the success of the family planning programme, with a 25.0 per cent reduction in fertility rate by 2001. The number of Indonesian population would reach 252.4 million, about 25 million fewer than if family planning failed.

However, if the family planning programme could be implemented much more successfully, with a 50.0 per cent reduction in fertility by 2001, the number of Indonesian population would only be 227.6 million, much below the "most likely" second scenario. He believed that this scenario was optimistic. The fourth scenario — to achieve replacement level fertility in 2001 with a population of only 218.0 million was thought to be highly unlikely.

With these scenarios, Iskandar recommended that the government work harder and more creatively to speed up the reduction in population growth rate through family planning. Indeed, the Government of Indonesia responded to this warning very seriously. The family planning programme achieved much better results than anticipated. As a consequence, in the 2000 Population Census, the Indonesian population stood at only about 206 million. This number is about 46 million smaller than the "most likely" scenario projected in 1976 and is almost 12 million lower than to the very optimistic "unlikely scenario" of achieving replacement level fertility by 2001.

Not many remember that Iskandar was also an economic historian. He was the first Indonesian lecturer in economic history at the Faculty of Economics, University of Indonesia. One of his teaching assistants was Dr Thee Kian Wie, the now famous Indonesian economic historian. Though he soon turned his attention to demography, Iskandar never forgot economic history. He was inaugurated as a professor in economic history and demography at the Faculty of Economics, University of Indonesia, in May 1977. The title of his speech was "Aspek Demografi — Sejarah Perekonomian yang Relevan bagi Pembangunan Dalam Jangka Panjang di Indonesia" (Relevant Demographic Aspects of Economic History for Long Run Development Planning in Indonesia), which combined his interests in economic history and demography.

Not only was he the director of Lembaga Demografi, but he was also seen by his staff, mostly much younger than him, as a "father". Even family members of the staff respected the fatherly figure of Professor Dr Nathanael Iskandar as he managed the institute, taught, and guided the staff. He emphasized learning, honesty, perseverance, and continuous improvement in productivity and quality, and was very happy whenever his students and staff made an achievement. For the staff, Pak (Mr) Iskandar was a manager, teacher, and father.

A dedicated and passionate demographer, Pak Iskandar was born in a poor family in the small town of Cianjur, West Java, on 13 March 1917. He spent twenty-one years and six months of his sixty years of life at the University of Indonesia. He was the eldest son in his family and had to contribute to the household income. He used to sell sweet cookies prepared by his mother so that he could attend primary and secondary schools. He was a primary and secondary school teacher before getting into university himself. Eventually he became a professor at the University of Indonesia.

The younger generation of the Faculty of Economics at the university showed their appreciation for Iskandar by naming one of the buildings at the campus of the faculty after him. The so-called "Gedung A (Building A)", at the Depok campus has been renamed "Gedung Nathanael Iskandar (Nathanael Iskandar Building)" since 1 November 2008.

J

Jahja, H. Junus

(Lauw Chuan Tho, 刘全道, Liu Quandao, 1927–)
Assimilationist, Indonesia

Junus Jahja is one of the thirty Indonesian intellectuals of Chinese descent and indigenous origin who signed the "Assimilation Piagam" in Ambarawa, Bandungan, on 15 January 1961, advocating Chinese assimilation in Indonesia in general, and conversion to Islam in particular.

Not much is known about his early life, except that he was born into a peranakan family in a Jakarta suburb on 22 April 1927. He went to the Netherlands after finishing a Dutch high school education in Jakarta. In 1959, he graduated from Nederlandse Economische Hogeschool in Rotterdam. He believes that there is no basic difference between someone Chinese descent in Indonesia and one belonging to the Indonesian majority: both are anak negeri ini (the sons of this country), born in the country, and who live and will also die there. Therefore, in 1950s, together with several students of Chinese descent, he started the "assimilation movement" in Netherlands and encouraged Chinese descendants to quit Chung Hwa Hui, or the Indonesian Chinese Student's Organization, and joined the PPI (Persatuan Pelajar Indonesia), the Indonesian Student Association. In his opinion, "assimilation" means self-identification as an Indonesian citizen, and as a member of an Indonesian nation.

After returning to Indonesia from Rotterdam, Junus Jahja worked in several government offices as the head of a German representative bank in Indonesia. In March 1960, he, together with P.K. Ojong and eight other friends, signed the "Assimilation Statement", also known as the "Ten Figures Statement". A year later, with twenty-nine Chinese and non-Chinese, including Ong Hok Ham, he signed the so-called "Assimilation Charter" in Bandungan, Ambarawa. At the time, he was still using his Chinese name, Drs Lauwchuantho; he only changed his name to Junus Jahja in 1962. To him, as one among those who signed the "Assimilation Charter", assimilation is the only way to create an Indonesian nation. In this case, assimilation means "the merger of various groups of different mentalities, customs and cultural expressions into one sociological entity, namely the Indonesian nation". In relation to the Chinese, assimilation entails a process of their joining, and being accepted within, the body of a single Indonesian nation, and letting their specific group disappear. Holding such ideals, Junus was very much against Baperki (Badan Permusyawaratan Kewarganegaraan Indonesia, the Consultative Body for Indonesian Citizenship, and Baperki-ism under Siauw Giok Tjhan, who continued what Junus and others called the "old pattern" of grouping those Chinese descent in a blood or race-based organization. It is interesting to note that he did not advocate conversion to Islam for Chinese Indonesians.

In 1967, Junus was appointed secretary of the organizing committee for "Workshop on Chinese Foreign Citizens and Stateless Peoples", led by Dr Nugroho Notosusanto, who was responsible for providing the basic principles for the State Committee of Chinese Foreign Citizens Affairs. On 23 June 1979, Junus who had been a Christian, converted to Islam; in 1980, he went to Mecca to become a haj. Charles Coppel, in his book, Indonesian Chinese in Crisis (1973), regards Junus' conversion to Islam as a "new therapy for the solution of Chinese problem in Indonesia". After his pilgrimage, Junus married a Sundanese Muslim woman, Tjitjih Rukaesih. Not long afterwards Junus established Yayasan Ukhuwah Islamiyah with several friends to promote Islam among intellectuals, businessmen, and young people of Chinese descent actively. It was in his capacity as head of Yayasan Ukhuwah Islamiyah that Junus helped several young and educated Chinese to convert to Islam. They included Muhamad Budyatna, who later became dean and professor at the faculty of social sciences and politics of the University of Indonesia, and Verawaty Fadjrin, one of the Indonesian badminton champions. That year, he, together with H. Abdul Karim Oey, was appointed at the Majelis Ulama Indonesia's National Meeting as the caretaker of MUI at the national level until 1990.

Junus was close to Buya Hamka, the most respected Muslim leader in Indonesia at the time. Besides acting as director of Lembaga Pengkajian Masalah Pembauran and general head of Yayasan Haji Karim Oei, Junus is also a member of Ikatan Cendekiawan Muslim Indonesia (ICMI), the Indonesian Moslem Intellectuals Association since 1992. Later, he also became a member of Partai Amanat Nasional (PAN). On 11 June 1998, he was appointed a member of Dewan Pertimbangan Agung (DPA) from 1998 to 2003. On 19 August 1998, he was granted Bintang Mahaputra Utama by the Indonesian government.

Junus has written and compiled a number of books, brochures, and articles on assimilation and dakwah Islamiyah. One of his well known books is Garis Rasial, Garis Usang: Liku-liku Pembauran. Another worth mentioning and closely related to him is Pribumi Kuat Kunci Pembauran: 70 Tahun Junus Jahja (A Strong Pribumi is The Key Towards Assimilation: 70 Years of Junus Jahja). It is a compilation of writings by Junus' friends, some of whom are prominent indigenous Indonesians, and a selection of Junus Jahja's own writings. In fact, the title of the book was a short article written by Junus in the mid-1990s in which he advocated a strong economic position for the indigenous population as the "key" to Chinese assimilation. Indeed, in the 1990s, he was not only advocating cultural and religious assimilation, but also "economic assimilation" between the Chinese and non-Chinese. Indirectly he was admitting that the "Chinese problem" was not confined to cultural issues but economic ones as well. Nevertheless, he believed that these problems could all be resolved by the Chinese converting to Islam. This point became prominent in his later essays.

In a chapter written for a book titled, Kapok Jadi Nonpri: Warga Tionghoa Mencari Keadilan (Fed Up as Non-indigenous Indonesians, Chinese People Look for Justice), published in 1998, for example, he argued that "economic inequality is the main obstacle for the relationship between indigenous and non-indigenous (Chinese)". In his opinion, "if this problem could be completely solved, the so-called 'non-indigenous' problem' could also be resolved in a more smooth and faster way". He thus proposed to set up a Consultative Forum for Chinese big businessmen, society leaders, and intellectuals to study issues related to economic inequality and find possible solutions to help the government deal with so-called 'non-indigenous' problems which are identical to economic problems.

He thought that to avoid exclusiveness and increase the effectiveness of the Forum, government representatives, as well as indigenous businessmen and intellectuals, who particularly should discuss "affirmative action policies", should be involved. His idea was to legalize the Forum as an official body called, Council for Solving Economy Gap, to be directly led by the president. The latest book he wrote was Peranakan Idealis: Dari Lie Eng Hok sampai Teguh Karya, published by Kepustakaan Populer Gramedia (KPG) in 2002. The book was intended to correct a general tendency of seeing all Chinese as being the same. For Junus, there is no principal difference between Indonesians of Chinese descent and the majority of the local people because both groups are "the children of this country". The twenty-five "idealists" he introduced in the book were those Chinese, who like the locals, had contributed to the making of Indonesian history.

Jao Triệu Phát, Frank

(赵阀, Zhao Fa, 1949–)

Business leader, higher education advocate, Vietnam

Vietnam-born Chinese-Vietnamese American entrepreneur Frank Jao became a prominent overseas Chinese-Vietnamese investor in Vietnam, as well as chair of the U.S.-based Vietnam Education Foundation, which, since 2003, has brought several hundred Vietnamese graduate students in the sciences to study in the United States.

Frank Jao was born to an ethnic Chinese father, Triệu Kim Sinh (赵金生), and an ethnic Chinese mother named Hoan in 1949 in Haiphong (海防市 Hải Phòng), North Vietnam. In 1954 when still a child, Frank moved to Danang (岘港 Đà Nẵng), then a part of South Vietnam, with his entire family, including ten brothers and sisters. During the Vietnam War, he worked as a sales promotion manager in a U.S.-based company in Saigon. Just prior to the liberation of Saigon in 1975, he and his wife, Catherine (he was by then married), managed to be airlifted out of the city.

Eventually, he was processed as a refugee at Camp Pendleton, just south of Orange County, California, which was initially temporary home to so many Chinese Vietnamese that the U.S. State Department on 28 July 1975 had to request 4,000 Chinese/English dictionaries (for speakers of Cantonese or Mandarin) for distribution to the refugees there.

After doing various part-time jobs including one selling vacuum cleaners, he started his own company, Bridgecreek Development, originally located in Westminster, California, in 1978. Prior to that, he took classes at Coastline Community College in Huntington Beach, also in California. As he disclosed in the New York Times in 2010, "I studied business finance and business law, accounting, design and construction. I didn't care about getting a degree; I just wanted the knowledge that would help me in the real estate and development field. In one class, the professor started discussing development and I chimed in. He said I knew more than he did, and had me get up and teach part of the class." His big break in real estate came when he made US$350,000 selling an industrial park.

As chief executive officer of the Bridgecreek Group, now a Huntington Beach-based real estate development company, Frank is credited in news accounts as the "Godfather" of Little Saigon, for his work in developing retail real estate properties to the tune of US$400 million, especially in an enclave in Orange County, California, that is home since the late 1970s to the largest population of Vietnamese and overseas Chinese from Vietnam. His singular achievement in the United States was his vision in foreseeing the growth of this ethnic enclave that became known internationally as "Little Saigon".

In 1996 Frank ran into opposition from some people in Little Saigon when he proposed erecting a "Harmony Bridge" to link his Asian Garden Mall with another of his properties across Bolsa Avenue, the main thoroughfare through Westminster. Without explicitly addressing his ethnicity, critics called his bridge design "too Chinese" and attacked him for trying to turn Little Saigon into "a Chinatown". As the Los Angeles Times reported (25 June 1996):

> "We don't want for our beloved Little Saigon to be turned into a Chinatown," said Mai Cong, president of a nonprofit social service agency who, with her husband, has formed a 200-member ad hoc committee to oppose the planned design of Harmony Bridge. "The architecture of the proposed bridge is in the style and characteristic of Chinese. The Vietnamese have our own culture, our own architecture. We want this to stay as Little Saigon for the benefit of all who come here."

Shocked by the blatantly anti-Chinese sentiments from fellow Vietnamese immigrants, Frank, who defended the architectural design, ended up giving up the bridge idea.

Yet Frank's impact, overall, is not limited to enterprises in his adopted country. His impact on Vietnam is perhaps just beginning to be felt as highly select Vietnamese graduate students educated in the United States — with the support of the Vietnam Education Foundation (VEF) — return to Vietnam to help develop the country.

First appointed by U.S. President George W. Bush to the VEF board in 2002, Frank was elected chairman of the board by the VEF board of directors in 2005. His tenure on the VEF board until 2009 coincided with the expansion of educational opportunities for many in Vietnam as universities in Asia and the West sought to attract more Vietnamese students. The VEF support enabled those selected by a special committee of the U.S. National Academies to attend graduate programmes in the sciences at universities across the United States, some of which are Ivy League institutions. By 2007 when Frank began ended his term as board chair, some 200 VEF fellows, twice as many as in 2005, were attending several dozen U.S. universities, with most in doctoral programmes. VEF funds the first two years of the students' education, with the universities' picking up funding in the following years.

The high-level thirteen-member VEF board comprises the U.S. secretaries of state, treasury, and education, two U.S. senators and two congressional representatives, and six presidential appointees. The foundation was set up by the U.S. Congress as an executive agency, using more than US$5 million a year in debt repayment by Vietnam, a debt which was incurred by the defeated Saigon regime. As a U.S. General Accounting Office 2010 report on the VEF noted:

> On April 7, 1997, the United States and Vietnam signed an agreement in which Vietnam agreed to pay the roughly $145 million in debt, plus interest, the former Republic of Vietnam incurred from 1960 to 1975 to support the development of economic infrastructure and to finance the importation of agricultural and other commodities.

Frank also sought to invest back in his homeland, being among the first overseas Chinese Vietnamese born in Vietnam to seek investment opportunities there. An Associated Press dispatch in 2006 about Jao said:

> He assembled US$10 million in seed money earlier this year to explore investment projects in Vietnam. So far Jao and his silent, Vietnamese-American partners have acquired minor shares in a Hanoi-based media company and an Internet and broadcasting company called VietnamNet. They're also building a sprawling food processing and distribution complex outside Ho Chi Minh City.

Half a decade later, dissuaded by the imposing state bureaucracy in Vietnam, a disillusioned Frank switched his attention elsewhere, devoting more of his energy to higher education causes.

As a trustee since 2010 of the University of California, Irvine Foundation, he is focusing on developing educational opportunities in countries beyond Asia. He has also aimed his philanthropic attention to helping the underfunded community colleges system, especially his alma mater where he first sought career advice. With his wife Catherine, he donated US$1 million to set up a Westminster campus of Coastline Community College, which named the Le-Jao Center after the Jaos, and Chieu Le and Yen Le, of Lee's Sandwich, a fast food chain.

Beyond his philanthropic activities, Frank has also been active in conservative causes, especially within the U.S. Republican Party, supporting such electoral campaigns as those of the Bushes (father and son) for president. In September 2000, Texas Governor George W. Bush brought his successful presidential campaign to Little Saigon, stopping at Frank's Asian Garden Mall for a massive campaign rally, with Frank, his local campaign co-chair, on the dais.

Jinarakkhita, Bhikku Ashin

(The Bwan An, 郑满安, Zheng Man'an, 1923–2002)
Indonesian Buddhist leader, Indonesia

Bhikku Ashin Jinarakkhita was a controversial Buddhist leader in Indonesia. His concepts and teaching of Buddhism made a major impact on the development of Indonesian Buddhism. Jinarakkhita is considered by many as the person who revived Buddhism in Indonesia.

The Bwan An, the original name of Jinarakkhita, was born on 23 January 1923 into a Chinese Peranakan family in Bogor, West Java. After finishing Dutch Chinese School (HCS) in Bogor and Dutch High School (HBS) in Jakarta, he went on to study at the ITB (Bandung), majoring in physics and mathematics. During the Japanese Occupation he stopped his studies and worked. In 1946 after the Japanese surrender, he received help from Dr H.J. Baker, a professor in organic chemistry, and went to study chemistry at the Groningen University in the Netherlands. However, he also attended classes on Sanskerta and Pali languages (by Dr Mrs Van der Leeuw). He later took courses on philosophy and learned mysticism from a Dutch retired professor. Dr J.E. v.d. Stok, at the Landbouw Hogeschool Wageningen.

It is not known whether he finished his university education, but Donald Willmott stated that he received a degree in engineering. This seems unlikely as he studied chemistry rather than engineering. In 1951 he returned from the Netherlands and worked as a teacher at a few high schools in Jakarta. However, his interest was in religion and theosophy and he later became president of the Federation of Sam Kauw Hwee in Jakarta.

The Bwan An studied under an old abbot, Pen Ching (本清) at the Vihara Kong Hoa Sie (光华寺) and on 29 July 1953 was given a new name: Ti Chen (体正 Ti Zheng). He intended to further his knowledge of Buddhism but as he did not read Chinese, was unable to go to Taiwan. He was interested in going to Sri Lanka (Ceylon), but was unable to get a sponsor. He eventually went to Burma in December 1953 where he became a Buddist monk and changed his name to Bhikku Ashin Jinarakkhita on 23 January 1954. That year he attended an international conference of the World Fellowship of Buddhists in Rangoon.

On his return to Indonesia, he specialized in vipassana (insight) meditation and attracted a multitude of followers. He later rejected Sam Kauw Hwee and preferred an organization that was not exclusively Chinese. In 1957 he established Perbuddhi (Perhimpunan Buddhis Indonesia, the Indonesian Buddhist Association), with a base in Semarang that soon became an influential association. He had an indigenous Indonesian disciple, Oka Diputhera, who later became an officer in the Indonesian Ministry of Religious Affairs. Within ten years, Perbhudi succeeded in establishing more than fifty branches all over Indonesia. In 1960 Jinarakkhita moved to West Java. The Semarang headquarters became independent, indicating there was a split.

After Soeharto came to power in 1965, the Indonesian state ideology, Pancasila (Five Principles), which stressed the concept of one supreme god, became a challenge to Buddhism in Indonesia. Jinarakkhita attempted to "Indonesianize" Buddhism by proposing the concept of one supreme god. He claimed that in the tenth-century Javanese Buddhist text, Sang Hyang Kamahayanikan, there was the concept of "Adi Buddha" as a supreme god. The text reads:

"Im! Namo Buddhaya! Im!" and the English translation should be: "Hail, in the name of the Buddha", but his Indonesian translation was: "Segala Puji bagi Sanghayang Adi Buddha" (All praise to the Lord Adi Buddha). Scholars who disagreed with him argued that he inserted the word "Adi" (great or supreme), which was not in the original text. It was done by him and his disciples so that his Buddhism would fit in with the first principle of Pancasila — belief in one supreme god.

The concept of Adhi Buddha is controversial as it is considered to deviate from the teachings of Theravada Buddhism. In fact, Bhikku Narada of Sri Lanka strongly disagreed with Jinarakkhita, arguing that "there is no god in Buddhism". He refused to accept Jinarakkhita's "theistic Buddhism", which is common in the Mahayana of Indonesia and Nepal. Apparently, Jinarakkhita wanted to merge Theravada and Mahayana Buddhism. Even in his appearance, he mixed both Buddhist sects. One writer commented that Jinarakkhita "wears Theravada robe, yet wears a beard in the Mahayana style".

Jinarakkhita was also of the view that saints (orang suci) could be found anywhere, and that personal religious experience was unique. In other words, every Buddhist could find his/her own enlightenment in accordance with his/her path. When preaching he often quoted various non-Buddhist figures, including the Javanese literary giant, Ranggawarsita. He also expressed great admiration for Sai Baba, a Hindu spiritualist, and the Dalai Lama, the Tibetan spiritual leader. It was reported that once when the Dalai Lama asked him which sect of Buddhism he followed, his answer was: "I am only a servant of Buddha." Jinarakkhita had both opponents and followers. His followers include some academicians, both in Indonesia and overseas.

He was elected chairman (maha nayaka) of Sangha Agung Indonesia (1974), which was a component organization of Walubi (Perwalian Umat Buddha Indonesia), the Buddhist Council of Indonesia. Sangha Agung Indonesia later came into conflict with other component organizations. Some leaders in the council did not agree with his style and his teachings. Walubi later experienced a power struggle and was dissolved in 1998. That same year a new Walubi was established while a rival organization KASI (Konferensi Agung Sangha Indonesia) was formed. Jinarakkhita was affiliated with the latter organization.

He continued to spread his teachings. Later in life he selected a place called Lembah Cipendawa near Cianjur (West Java) as his Vihara Sakryawanaram. It is believed that this was the historical site of the last king of the Pajajaran Kingdom. Jinarakkhita lived in this compound until his death on 18 April 2002.

Jing Junhong

(井浚泓, 1968–)

Sportswoman, table-tennis player, Olympian, Singapore

Currently seeded the world's twentieth amongst all the female table-tennis players, Jing Junhong may have retired from actively competing in the sport, but she is anything but forgotten. Indeed, she is still held as one of the golden girls of table-tennis in Singapore, and had been appointed deputy coach of the Singapore national women's table tennis team on 1 March 2009 for a two year stint.

Born on 13 October 1969 in Jiangsu in China, Jing spent her formative years in Shanghai. Her natural aptitude for table tennis and quick reflexes with the paddle meant that she played the sport competitively in China. She was so skilled at it that she was ranked the third best table tennis player in China.

Jing eventually became a Singapore citizen in 1994. Not long after becoming a citizen of the city-state, she proved her mettle by showing off her abilities in the sport. She proceeded to win gold medals in table-tennis at every Southeast Asian Games between 1995 and 2003 for Singapore. Despite her excellent performance in regional table tennis competitions, there was initially a great deal of criticism against Singaporean authorities and sporting bodies for fielding her in the Southeast Asian Games. This was because the dissenters objected to the fact that she was not a born and bred Singaporean. Some even went so far as to call her a 'bought' or 'imported' talent. However, Jing did not let these negative remarks weigh her down. She comported herself with dignity and continued to hone her skills in table tennis so as to do the very best for Singapore. By training hard at the sport and ignoring the cutting remarks of her dissenters, Jing demonstrated her dedication to table tennis and her adopted homeland. Her fortitude eventually paid off and Singaporeans took her into their hearts when she won her first medal for Singapore in the Southeast Asian Games in 1995.

At the Commonwealth Championships of 1995, Jing clinched the silver medal in table tennis after an intense match of tough fighting with Chai Po Wa from Hong Kong, who was then ranked the world's Number Three player in the sport. Jing reprised her electrifying performance at the 1995 Southeast Asian Games in Chiangmai in Thailand. Her fans and avid table tennis followers were delighted for her when she came away dominating the singles event. Her excellent performance at the 1995 Southeast Asian games extended to the mixed doubles which she won; she also clinched a silver medal in the women's double event.

Given her obvious proficiency for the sport, she was fielded in the 1996 Olympics in Atlanta in America where she reached the final round of 16. As part of her preparation and training regimen for the 1996 Olympics, she went to England for a training stint. Even though she did not make it to the quarter finals, her performance was widely acknowledged at that Olympic Games to be the best by a female athlete from Singapore. In 1997, she competed in the Commonwealth Championships in Glasgow, Scotland. She also placed eighth in table tennis at the Women's World Cup. To honour the achievements she had made to the sport and in recognition of her accomplishments thus far, she was named Sportswoman of the Year in 1997.

At the thirteenth Commonwealth Games held in Glasgow, Scotland, in 1997, Jing went on to prove herself and her dedication to doing her best for her adopted homeland by winning the individual gold as well as the doubles gold with Li Jiawei. This was particularly notable because it was Singapore's finest results in the Commonwealth Games. Due to her momentous results at the Commonwealth Games, Jing was acknowledged as the best player in the table tennis championship. She also performed equally well at the nineteenth Southeast Asian Games in Jakarta, Indonesia, where she won the singles event. Due to her numerous achievements at the Commonwealth Games of 1997 and the Southeast Asian Games, she was once more awarded with the Sportswoman of Year title in 1998.

However, she did not let glory and her many achievements in the sport go to her head. She still pulled out all the stops whilst playing and was thus able to lead her team to a gold medal at the regional Games. She followed this up by clinching two doubles titles at the twentieth Southeast Asian Games in Brunei. By this time, her considerable skill with the paddle and her dexterity had won her many fans in Singapore, and she was firmly part of Singapore's sporting history.

Likewise, her considerable skill and dedication to the sport meant that she was fielded in the 2000 Olympics in Sydney. The 2000 Olympic match was a hard fought battle where Jing narrowly lost the bronze medal in the play-off against Jing Chen of Taiwan. After this spectacular match, she was ranked fourth best female table tennis player in the world. In turn, she was rewarded in Singapore when she was declared Sportswoman of the Year for the third time. She continued to put in her best in the sport and subsequently came away with gold medals in the 2001 Southeast Asian Games in Kuala Lumpur, the 2002 Commonwealth Games in Manchester and the 2003 Southeast Asian Games in Hanoi. It could also be said that Jing finally came into her own in the world of table-tennis when she was fielded as part of the highly successful national team that won a bronze medal in the Asian Games at Busan in 2002. She faired equally well at the 2004 Olympics in Athens in Greece where she got through to the third round.

However, after her numerous spectacular successes, she retired soon after from competing in table-tennis matches. Thereafter, she joined the Singapore Sports Council as a senior executive of the high performance division. Contrary to popular belief, her retirement from international competition did not mean that she had completely given up the sport. Jing continues to be highly regarded in the international table-tennis sphere and retains a high place in the table-tennis world rankings. Her experience in the sport means that she has much to offer as both a coach and a player. The Singapore Table Tennis Association (STTA) was clearly of this mindset, for it appointed Jing as deputy head coach of the national women's team on 1 March 2009. As a result, she was seconded to STTA for two years.

To honour her achievements, she was inducted in the Singapore Sports Council Hall of Fame and was named Singapore National Olympic Committee's Sportswoman of the year in 1997, 1998, and 2000.

Jun Hong

(王俊宏, Wang Junhong, 1926–)
Educator, entrepreneur, philanthropist, Myanmar

Jun Hong has played many roles. He was an educationist who had not only taught Mandarin to locally born Chinese in Myanmar, but had also founded several Chinese schools in Myanmar. He established the Jia Ying Wu Shu Hakka Clan Association (嘉应五属客家会馆) and had taught at the Qiang Hua Chinese School, both of which are organizations supported by the local Hakka community. He has made remarkable social contributions to the Chinese community in Myanmar, and his successful business ventures led him to philanthropy as well.

U Jun Hong is now a Hong Kong citizen, but was born in Rangoon, Myanmar. He is the owner of Sweda Ltd. situated in Shenzhen, China, but still visits Myanmar regularly. His father, Wang Gongxiang, went to Myanmar in 1905 at the age of eighteen. Besides his wife, Wang also took his sixteen-year old younger brother, Wang Manxiang along. They sailed from Bing village along the Han River to Swatow, where he transferred to a ship named "Big Eye Chicken" to Burma.

Wang first stayed in Rangoon, and worked as a labourer before moving to a small town near Rangoon to take up the job of a shopkeeper in a small family shop. He was thrifty and earned enough to open a grocery store called Guan-Hin Grocery. He later branched into the food business opening a Chinese restaurant, which served mainly Hakka and other Chinese cuisines. All his businesses flourished and he made considerable donations to the Chinese community.

After twenty-five years in Burma, Wang prospered and had four children: Wang Juncang, his eldest son; daughter, his second child; son Junhong (U Jun Hong), his third child; and daughter Juying, the youngest child. When U Jun Hong was four years old, Wang died from a sore on his shoulder. His death landed the family in financial difficulties as his wife could not sustain the businesses after having inherited them. As a result, the family had to return to China where U Jun Hong completed his early education.

When the Second World War ended, U Junhong returned to Burma in 1948 and worked as a teacher at Qiang Hua Chinese School in a small town in Lower Burma. He participated in various activities organized by the overseas Chinese and also started a newspaper and periodical shop where Chinese language classes were also organized for the locals of Chinese descent.

At the age of twenty-six, he set up a Chinese school called Sittong Yu Xian with primary and secondary divisions. Two years later in 1954, when Chinese Premier Zhou Enlai (周恩来) visited Myanmar, U Jun Hong was invited as a delegate to the reception party in which the Chinese premier recognized his contributions to local society.

In 1964, when all establishments in Myanmar were nationalized under the rule of the Burmese statesman and military commander, General Ne Win, U Jun Hong was dismissed from his job as a teacher. Undeterred, he soon founded a Chinese language tuition centre and continued teaching. In 1965, when the Burmese Government banned the Chinese press, he organized public lectures to update the public on events in China. From 1966 to 1968, the government of Myanmar continued to institute some policies that were discriminatory against the Chinese that affected U Jun Hong. Thus in autumn 1968, he returned to China with more than 1,000 ethnic Chinese ousted from Myanmar, and was sent to the Huiyang Tong Hu Overseas Chinese Farm in China. In autumn 1978, his family emigrated to Hong Kong, according to the Chinese policy of resettling overseas Chinese. That winter, the eldest and youngest sons of U Jun Hong worked as labourers at Tien Li Electronics Company, which manufactured wrist watches, while his wife, Zhu Ting Fen, worked at Philips Electronics as a general worker.

In 1982, U Jun Hong set up the Hong Kong Fei Teng Electronics Company, and then Bai Jia Electronics, and Nanyang Electronics. These became his trump cards that drew Paul So (苏永强), a tycoon from China, to invite him to join his Sweda Clock and Watch Group.

U Jun Hong turned philanthropist on attaining business success, and began supporting the construction of infrastructure and other works in Yan Yang Zhe Gu Village in the Mei County (梅县) of Guangdong Province. In July 2003, he founded the Wang Jun Hong Educational Grant Fund of Meizhou City and the Wang Jun Hong Educational Grant Fund of Bing Village in Mei County. Five months later, in December, he again supported the construction of a multipurpose building for the learning and teaching of the Cantonese dialect at Fu Jiang Primary School in Guangdong. According to a report in Meizhou Ri Bao (梅州日报), dated 9 September 2007, he was the first person to donate RMB 0.5 million directly to Min Hua School (民化学校) in Yan Yang Town (雁洋镇) of Meizhou County, where he had begun his childhood education. Within a short three-day period from 3–5 September 2007, the donations that U Junhong made to the same county totalled RMB1 million, which supported the establishment of five education stipend foundations. From 1992 to 2008, his donations made to various areas in Meizhou County (梅州市), such as Mei Xian, Wu Hua (五华), Da Pu (大埔), Feng Shun (丰顺), Xing Ning (兴宁), and the Jiao Ling Overseas Chinese Farm (蕉岭华侨农场) to set up six education stipend foundations totalled nearly RMB10 million. To date, 3,000 ethnic Chinese from Myanmar have also found employment in Sweda (Shenzhen) Electronic Co. Ltd. with his assistance.

His active support for education caught the attention of the Chinese Government. Since 1992, he has been honoured by distinguished Chinese leaders for his outstanding contributions in Meizhou County, such as Li Ruihuan (李瑞环), Wang Guangying (王光英), Ye Xuanping (叶选平), Qian Qichen (钱其琛) and Peng Pei (彭佩). In October 1992, he was invited as a distinguished-guest-of-honour to the National Day celebrations of China held in Beijing. He also attended the 12th World Hakka Gathering in December 1994, where he was again received as the guest-of-honour by the Central Government Authority of China. In 1999, he was once more invited to attend the ceremony of the National Day of China at Tiananmen Square. A year later, he was named "Honorary Citizen of Mei Zhou County".

U Jun Hong had married Zhu Ting Fen (朱婷芬), a Chinese teacher, back in 1956. They have three sons: Wanghai (born 1957), Wangwei (born 1960), and Wangjie (born 1961). Wanghai is currently the managing director of Sweda (Shenzhen) Electronic Co. Ltd., the present vice-chairman of Shenzhen Overseas Chinese Union, and the chairman of Shen Zhen Enterprise Union.

Jusuf, Ester Indahyani

(Sim Ai Ling, 沈爱玲, Shen Ailing, 1971–)
Lawyer, human rights activist, Indonesia

Ester Indahyani Jusuf was born Sim Ai Ling on 15 January 1971 in Malang, a city of pleasant climate in the province of East Java, Indonesia. She was the third of four children.

Apart from her friends and legal clients, most people heard of Ester Indahyani Jusuf for the first time when Solidaritas Nusa Bangsa (SNB) was founded in 1998, so, naturally her name is always closely associated with this organization.

To Jusuf, the enormity and intensity of sufferings caused by the May 1998 riots in Indonesia demanded that action be taken and an eventual solution be found. So on 5 June 1998, she, Ucok Purba — her husband at the time — and a number of their friends who cared about social, especially racial, cohesion in their country, rallied together and founded the non-governmental organization to address the dire situation.

Solidaritas Nusa Bangsa has been working since towards helping the victims of the May 1998 riots, raising community awareness of the events and their implications, and lobbying the government for legal reform in order to provide better protection for minority groups.

In 2001, Jusuf was granted a Yap Thiam Hien Award, an award named after an Indonesian lawyer whose steadfastness and commitment to human rights causes are well documented.

In 2005 she was granted an Ashoka Fellowship.

Her work in bringing human rights issues to the consciousness of the public was also recognized by various awards, the prominent which are those from the Human Rights Institute (Lembaga Hak Asasi Manusia or ELHAM) and a Christian magazine, Majalah Narwastu Pembaruan.

Jusuf had a full childhood in that she was brought up by a father who instilled in his children discipline, belief in excellence, religious and moral righteousness, and independence, and a mother who provided the love, affection, and solicitousness to cushion any rough edges Jusuf and her siblings might have felt from the disciplined life.

Interestingly, from as far back as she can remember, she has been aware that she is in no way the brightest of her parents' offspring. This awareness, and having two older siblings who outshone her, made her feel somehow not very important in her father's estimation. However this had its own advantages. She felt shielded from her father's attention and the accompanying parental pressure by the outstanding qualities of her older siblings.

Jusuf was two years old when the family left Malang. Her father believed that if they wanted to advance in life, they would need to move to Jakarta where most things happened.

One of her early memories was when she went to Tirta Marta Primary School, where her father was a teacher. She remembers the awkward times when she was in her father's class. Whenever she had full marks for anything, the other students suspected that they were unnaturally elevated. In the meantime, back at home, she had the full weight of her father's supervision on set homework. She resented the situation, but felt powerless to address it.

A significant landmark in her life was when the family had a pleasant surprise. Jusuf, the hitherto mediocre student, was accepted into the Faculty of Law at Universitas Indonesia, one of the most prestigious universities in the country, hence one of the most difficult to get into. This was received warmly by her close friends who had been praying with and for her. Her friends saw Jusuf as a model of honesty and reliability, and took God's answer to their prayer as an endorsement of their expectations of her.

During her university years Jusuf would always seek to take part in something beneficial to the community. Beginning with small jobs in the students' union, she was eventually appointed by the university's Law Faculty authorities to be a programme coordinator of the Association of Law Faculties in Jakarta. There were then twelve participating universities.

Jusuf's duties included developing programmes, fund-raising, finding suitable speakers, and briefing co-workers. She produced a number of programmes well received by her colleagues. Her fund-raising endeavours included organizing her colleagues to package sweets they had bought in bulk into pretty parcels, and making approximately fifty pictures every day which they transferred into cards, sold at a hundred thousand rupiah each. So they made a fair amount of money, which they then used for prison inmates services.

Her group regularly visited prisons, bringing essential items such as antiseptic soap and health biscuits to the inmates, and conducting prayer meetings which they appreciated very much.

Fired up by youthful enthusiasm, Jusuf tried to arrange sessions an law awareness for the inmates, but these were promptly disallowed by the prison authorities. She soon learned that even in communities outside prisons, these sessions were never crowd pullers. When she and her colleagues went to rural villages to set up their community education programmes, nobody would come to the law awareness sessions. They would all turn up though, when the group organized cooking classes, for instance. Jusuf was particularly disheartened by this outcome, feeling that she had failed to reach the people where important matters were concerned.

This disappointment would later turn into a sense of relief when she herself became more aware of the complex nature of the legal aspects they were seeking to cover. As undergraduates, their own knowledge about the topics was very limited. Even if they poured out all they knew about a particular topic, the inadequate information could very easily produce situations of serious misunderstanding with even more serious implications, which may very possibly escalate into something litigious. In the case of teaching various communities about criminal law, they might have been able to stay away from harm's way. However civil law is another story. Most likely, they would have landed in hot water if the information about the Land Act, for instance, had generated a landslide of unsubstantiated and unjustified claims from the community.

In retrospect Jusuf sees divine intervention here, and has been grateful for it.

Ester's idealism continued after she graduated with a Law degree and qualified as a lawyer. She worked at Lembaga Bantuan Hukum (LBH) or the Legal Aid Institute, for three years.

One real tragedy in her life was when in 1999 her husband, Ucok, died of a burst appendix which had been misdiagnosed as a symptom of a gastric illness. Jusuf was pregnant with their second child at the time, and their first, Jose, was barely three.

Jusuf learns subliminally as well as consciously. She has also learned from major setbacks.

Apart from her father, her present husband, Albert Suryo Wicaksono, has had a significant influence in the way she sees any given situation. From Wicaksono, she learned to place a problem in a broader context, and seek a solution after pondering on it in this position.

She keeps her work as a practising lawyer and sets aside a reasonable proportion of her income for the work of SNB. She has been able to straddle the two professions (being a practising lawyer with an independent income, and a volunteer at SNB) very happily.

Jusuf, Tedy

(Him Tek Ji, 熊德怡, Xiong Deyi, 1944–)
Military general, Indonesia

Tedy Jusuf was one of the few Indonesian army generals of Chinese descent during the Soeharto regime. He was also the leader of one of the largest Chinese Indonesian social organizations established soon after the fall of Soeharto. Not much is known about the family background of Tedy Jusuf except that he was born on 24 May 1944 in Bogor and that he had a Chinese name, is married with three children (one son and two daughters), and is a Christian. According to published information, he was first educated at a Chinese medium school in Pa Hwa (Patikuan Chinese School) up to the junior middle school level. He later moved to an Indonesian state school and graduated in 1962 in the science stream.

Unlike most Chinese Indonesian children, Jusuf joined the Indonesian Military Academy in Malang after finishing secondary school and graduated in 1965 as a junior officer. He served as a lieutenant in 1966 in the Briwijaya Division (East Java) and was promoted to a captain in 1972. He was again promoted to a major in 1976 when he was sent to East Timor to serve as a detachment commander. Jusuf was later given the opportunity to study at SESKOAD, an army officer academy in Bandung. After his graduation in 1977, he served in various army divisions, including the Kodam Jaya (Jakarta) and Diponegoro divisions (Central Java). He was promoted to colonel in 1986 and brigadier general in 1994. From 1995, he became non-active militarily as he felt that he was "unable to perform the tasks given by his superiors". His position then was special staff to the Supreme Commander of the Indonesian Armed Forces, in charge of politics and security affairs. He noted in an interview that he was "housed" for four years and appointed member of parliament in 1996, representing the Indonesian Armed Forces. He was eventually asked to retire from active military duty in 1999.

President Soeharto was forced to step down in May 1998 after student demonstrations and the subsequent anti-Chinese riots. Soon after the fall of Soeharto, Jusuf, together with other Chinese, established the Paguyuban Sosial Marga Tionghoa Indonesia (PSMTI) or the Indonesian Chinese Social Organization. The Chinese name for this organization is Yinhua Baijiaxing Xiehui (印华百家姓协会), which means "Indonesian Chinese Surnames Organization". This is the first ethnic Chinese social organization in the post-Soeharto period to have both Chinese-educated and Indonesian-educated Chinese in Jakarta as members. Jusuf was elected its general chairman. It is worth noting that prior to this, Tedy Jusuf was not known as a Chinese, nor was he active in the Chinese community. Because of his sudden emergence as a leader of the Chinese "clan association", some began to question if he had been asked by the government to establish such an organization.

Jusuf denied that the establishment of PSMTI had been initiated by the government. He even revealed that when he submitted the application to set up the PSMTI, the Home Affairs Ministry advised him to change the name of the organization from "Tionghoa" to "Cina" as "Cina" was the official name for ethnic Chinese, but he refused. Many ethnic Chinese disliked being referred to as "Cina" as it was perceived to be derogatory, but it is interesting to note that Jusuf would use the term "Cina" to refer to ethnic Chinese who are citizens of the People's Republic of China. He also denied any connection between the military and the PSMTI, stressing that he became non-active in the military affairs from 1995, and would like to serve the community as a member of the Indonesian Chinese community. He stated that he did not have any political ambition. In an interview in 2000, he stated that the PSMTI urged the government to put the masterminds and perpetrators of the riots of 13–14 May 1998 on trial, and punish them as heavily as possible.

The PSMTI appeared to have been dominated by the graduates of certain Chinese schools in Jakarta, and many of its members are also linked to government-affiliated organizations such as Bakom PKB (Contact Body for the Appreciation of National Unity). Soon after its establishment, there was disagreement in the leadership and a group eventually left the PSMTI and formed a new association known as the Perhimpunan INTI, another major Chinese organization. The disagreement might have been related to both personality clashes and different orientations.

Although Jusuf was from the Indonesian Army, when he became the chairman of the PSMTI, he opposed assimilation. He maintained in year 2000 that as a concept, assimilation had emerged forty-eight years ago, but was applied to Chinese Indonesians for thirty-two years only during the Soeharto era. Its objective was to indigenize the Chinese, but the policy failed as Chinese culture continued to survive among Chinese Indonesians. He maintained that integration, as reflected in the 1928 youth pledge, was more suitable for Indonesia, as this would provide national unity for various ethnic groups in the republic. He did not agree that an exclusively ethnic Chinese organization might hamper national integration in Indonesia.

PSMTI has succeeded in setting up branches in many provinces, and one of its branches is in Batam. The Batam branch, which is under the chairmanship of Soehendro Gautama, a lawyer, established Universitas Internasional Batam in August 2000. The first PSMTI congress was also held in the city of Batam from 28 November to 2 December 2000.

Jusuf has participated in many seminars and has also produced a booklet on Indonesian Chinese culture entitled Sekilas Budaya Tionghoa di Indonesia (2000), which gives one an idea of his understanding of Chinese culture.

K

Kan Hok Hoei

(H. H. Kan, 简福辉, Jian Fuhui, 1881–1951)
Community leader, landlord, politician, Indonesia

Kan Hok Hoei or H. H. Kan, as he was usually known, was an appointed or elected member of the Volksraad from its founding until its end in 1942. He tried to represent the interests of the Chinese to the colonial power, but his conservative pro-Dutch position made him a controversial figure. He was the founder of the Chung Hwa Hui (Java) in 1928.

Born in 1881 in Batavia (Jakarta), Kan received a Dutch secondary education (HBS). His wealth came primarily from landowning, including considerable real estate within the city´s boundaries. His political activities began in the Siang Hwee (Chinese Chamber of Commerce) and as a member of the Municipal Council of Batavia.

When the Dutch in 1910 declared all Chinese born in the Indies to be Dutch subjects, many rejected this status, wishing to be recognized only as citizens of China, as a Chinese law of 1909 had previously stipulated. Kan, in contrast, determined to defend the interests of the Chinese in the Indies as best he could through participation as a Dutch subject in public life. When the colonial government announced plans for an advisory council, the Volksraad, Kan convened a small group of Chinese leaders in Bandung to propose candidates for the council. Since this group was not representative, the Siang Hwee and others convened a larger congress in Semarang in 1917, with many Chinese organizations represented. At this congress the majority, under the influence of left-leaning or China-oriented groups, especially Sin Po, determined not to cooperate with the Volksraad. The local-born Chinese did not wish to be Dutch subjects and be obliged to perform military service, and they also feared that the community might be split between the China-oriented and the Indies-oriented. They ridiculed the Volksraad as a powerless, phony institution. Ignoring the decision, Kan accepted an appointment to the Volksraad in 1918, arguing that it was necessary to defend Chinese interests there and not hope for protection from China. This alone made him a controversial figure.

With the spread of Dutch-language education for the Chinese in the twentieth century, many Peranakan felt they needed someone to speak out for the educational and other interests of the Chinese. They founded a Chung Hwa Club in 1926 and convened another congress, the Chung Hwa Congress, the following year, to discuss political activity, especially in view of the increased powers and larger membership planned for the Volksraad after 1927.

A year later, the congress led to the founding of a self-declared political association, the Chung Hwa Hui of the Netherlands Indies (CHH), under Kan's presidency. Dutch-educated Peranakan Chinese, some of whom had studied in the Netherlands, dominated the organization, and their wealthy backgrounds led detractors to call them the "Packard clique", after their supposed preference for the American luxury car. The CHH put forward Chinese candidates for the Volksraad and local councils in the limited franchise elections. Membership of the group was understandably, in view of its political activities, limited to Chinese born in the Indies who were Dutch subjects; non-subjects could be associates.

Kan and the CHH consistently pleaded for legal equality of the Chinese with the Europeans in Indies law. They also thought the Chinese should have an expanded right to own agricultural land, something the indigenous side opposed, and that excessive taxation of the Chinese (compared with other groups) should be abolished. At the same time, he defended a separate Chinese cultural identity. The CHH favoured more Dutch-Chinese schools (HCS), but wanted them to include, in addition to the essential European curriculum, courses in Chinese language and culture.

Defending Chinese interests, especially those of wealthy Chinese, sometimes meant alienating Indonesian nationalists. Kan felt that having a majority of ethnic Indonesians in the Volksraad would be detrimental to Chinese interests, and in 1927, voted against it. He opposed abolishing the Poenale Sanctie, the penal laws that kept plantation and mining coolies bound to their employers for the duration of their contracts. On the other hand, in 1936 H. H. Kan sided with moderate Indonesian nationalists in supporting the Soetardjo Petition — which meekly urged the government to investigate the possibility of greater autonomy for the Indies — although he did not submit a vote for it. He could be sarcastic about the colonial government when he wished to be: when the position of Advisor for Chinese Affairs was being set up, he complained aloud that the institution was there not to help the Chinese, but to spy on them.

H. H. Kan's critics were numerous. The Sin Po group was one opponent, so was the Partai Tionghoa Indonesia, which sympathized with Indonesian nationalism. In the press, he was reviled for high rice prices and called the "rice king" (Suara Rakjat, 1919); while the PTI organ, Sin Tit Po of Surabaya, bitingly referred to him in 1938 as "Hendriek Hendriek Kan", for his pro-Dutch attitude. Even Soekarno once called the CHH the "yellow Fatherland´s Club (Vaterlandse Club)", referring to an ultra-conservative Dutch colonial group.

In the 1930s H. H. Kan flirted with China, visiting that country in 1932 at the invitation of a local business firm. He became close to the consul general of China, his daughter marrying a son of that diplomat. He was subsequently named president of the Federation of Chinese Chambers of Commerce (Siang Hwee), but because this organization was under the influence of the consul general of China, the colonial government intervened. In addition, the Siang Hwee was supposed to elect representatives for the parliament in China, which the colonial power interpreted as participating in a foreign election, something forbidden for Dutch subjects. Since he was indeed a Dutch subject, Kan finally resigned from the post.

Never a Chinese officer, Kan was in some respects a transitional figure, for he and the Chung Hwa Hui were Indies-oriented in their activities, and not limited to the Chinese community itself, unlike the Chinese officers, whose abolition he favoured. On the other hand, he had no vision of being part of an independent, majority-ruled Indonesia.

In 1935, he was knighted by the Dutch Government (Ridder in de Orde van de Nederlandse Leeuw). He also visited the Netherlands to promote good relations between the metropolitan power and the Indies Chinese. On the other hand, he supported China with donations after the outbreak of the Sino-Japanese war. In 1942, when they occupied Java, the Japanese arrested him and imprisoned him in Cimahi with other Chinese leaders. H. H. Kan apparently did not resume political activities after his release, and he died in 1951.

Kartajaya, Hermawan

(Tan Tjioe Hak, 陈求学, Chen Qiuxue, 1947–)

Marketing guru, Indonesia

Hermawan Kartajaya is almost synonymous with the discipline of "marketing" in Indonesia. He has secured the pedestal for being president of the World Marketing Association since 2002, crowning him as the "Asian Marketing Guru". The Chartered Institute of Marketing, United Kingdom (CIM-UK), even dubbed Kartajaya one of the "50 Gurus Who Have Shaped the Future of Marketing" alongside other international names such as Seth Godin, Al Ries, and Philip Kotler. Kartajaya has built himself a household name with a formidable presence at home, abroad, and on the World Wide Web. He is a testament to the art and science of marketing that he has mastered.

Kartajaya's popularity comes from the fact that he is a salesman. His job is to make himself likeable. His speech is underscored with a distinctive Javanese cadence that forms the base melody of his words, whether he is speaking in English or in Bahasa Indonesia. It puts people at ease, which makes him a genial speaker. He delivers presentations with energy. He maintains a youthful gait, incongruous with his sexagenarian experience.

What lies behind any successful brand is the perfect combination of tangible benefits to satisfy an unfulfilled need. Therefore, it is Kartajaya's contribution to marketing that has set him apart from the rest, his elevating the discipline at the international level while imparting a unique Asian flavour.

Hermawan Kartajaya was born Tan Tjioe Hak on 18 November 1947 in Surabaya, East Java. He was not an outstanding scholar. Although he enrolled at the Institut Teknologi Sepuluh Nopember, he did not complete his undergraduate degree in Electronic Engineering. Instead he obtained his undergraduate qualifications from the Faculty of Economics, Universitas Udayana, and eventually earned his master's degree (MSc) at University of Strahclyde, Glasgow in 1995.

While he did not acquire further academic qualifications beyond this, he went on to gain diverse work experience. Kartajaya's career started humbly with a job as a secondary school teacher in SMAK St Louis, Surabaya, the second largest city in Indonesia, and eventually led his becoming director of distribution at P.T. H. M. Sampoerna, one of Indonesia's largest conglomerates. Kartajaya there started his own consultancy firm in 1989 called Markplus Professional Service. He applied his background in teaching and made Markplus an education company, offering marketing related training for executives in Surabaya. The company took ten years to position itself well in Jakarta and Surabaya by offering consultancy in business strategy for private and state-owned enterprises. Today, Hermawan Kartajaya is the founder and president of Markplus, Inc., one of the top-ranking national consultancy firms. It has grown to encompass MarkPlus Consulting, MarkPlus Insight, MarkPlus Institute of Marketing (MIM), and Marketeers.

With education as the cornerstone, Kartajaya began to write books on marketing, imparting the models he developed from his knowledge and experience with MarkPlus. Several of this publications made it to the list of local popular non-fiction books in the late 1990s. Then, recovering from the 1997 Asian Financial Crisis, Indonesian businesses needed to restructure and consolidate, creating up a considerable demand for consultancy firms such as MarkPlus. It was no wonder then that the years, 2000 to 2004, were said to be growth years for MarkPlus.

By 2000, MarkPlus had established a solid reputation as a local consultancy firm. Kartajaya co-authored with Philip Kotler, a renowned marketing figure from the Kellogg School of Management, on international publications. Among them is Repositioning Asia: From Bubble to Sustainable Economy, which analyses the 1997–98 Asian Financial Crisis and suggests what governments and companies could do to develop sustainability in the future. The publication was a bestseller in Asia and has been translated into several languages.

Further collaborations in 2002 brought Hermawan Kartajaya to the fore of the field with Rethinking Marketing: Sustainable Marketing Enterprise in Asia, a publication which saw him brought together collaborating again with Philip Kotler of the Kellogg School of Management, as well as Hooi Den Huan of the Nanyang Business School in Singapore, and Sandra Liu of Purdue University. He ascertained his academic credentials further by appearing as a guest editor alongside Kotler between 2002 and 2004 for several editions of the Nanyang Business Review.

In 2006, Kotler, Kartajaya, and Hooi released Think ASEAN! Rethinking Marketing toward ASEAN Community 2015, in anticipation of a borderless ASEAN market. It explores the effect of regionalization on marketing activities in the future. In conjunction with the expansion of its satellite offices, MarkPlus became the first ASEAN marketing consultancy group.

Indeed, it was MarkPlus that propelled Hermawan Kartajaya forward. He was its spokesperson, figurehead, and liaison. His name was its brand, much like Roberto Cavalli's extravagance stood for the fashion house, Cavalli. Similar to a fashion house, Kartajaya managed a team of bright, young staff under him as the driving engines of his success. He extended his outreach by being invited as a speaker and guest lecturer of marketing across Indonesia and overseas. His team allowed him to expand his latitude larger than life. In return, his name stood for credibility, amassing brand cachet.

Co-authorship was a favourite publishing strategy with Kartajaya. Exactly as he did with Kotler, he did the same with his fellow co-authors in subsequent publications. The Marketing in Venus (2006) series, co-written with Yuswohady, Dewi Madyani, and Bembi Dwi Indrio, was a bestseller on the popular non-fiction shelves in Indonesia. Kartajaya et al. (2006) posited that information technology had feminized the way we engage one another through a more emotional and interactive environment. The marketing landscape has evolved into a terrain familiar with the goddess of love, beauty, and fertility — Venus.

Working in tandem as Indonesia moves to develop its sharia banking financial market, Hermawan Kartajaya collaborated with Aa Gym, an Indonesian popular ustad (cleric) in a series of books geared towards spiritual marketing. The series book shares a similar tenet with Marketing 3.0, Philip Kotler's new values based model. In collaboration with Syakir Sula, Kartajaya also published Sharia Marketing International & Syariah Marketing, strategizing on how to capture the market with sharia as its value proposition.

In 2009, Kartajaya launched the book New Capital Wave Marketing: The World is Still Round The Market is Already Hot. This was followed up by Connect! Surfing New Wave Marketing in 2010. The latter seeks to redefine the "trilogy trinity" of "Positioning — Differentiation — Branding" into "Clarification — Codification — Character" within what the authors have dubbed the "new wave" world.

It is implausible for one man alone to have come up with such a body of works. Indeed, this collection is the effort of many who put their creations under the umbrella of the name, Hermawan Kartajaya. This is what separates men like him from academia. His name is a shield constructed out of carefully chosen adjectives and attributes, garnering accolades of which the inconspicuous names on the inside cover of a book are more deserving.

Hermawan Kartajaya cuts an influential figure, locally in Indonesia and internationally. His company has spearheaded the articulation of a new marketing strategy ahead of the pack in the last twenty years. His name alone deserves recognition as one of the few influential figures who have elevated marketing as a discipline.

Karya, Teguh

(Steve Liem; Liem Tjoan Hok, 林全福, Lin Quanfu, 1935–2001)

Playwright, theatre and movie director, Indonesia

Teguh Karya was an influential Indonesian playwright, and theatre and movie director. He had groomed many award-winning movie directors, actors, and actresses in Indonesia. His movies also gained numerous national and international awards.

Teguh was born in Pandeglang (Banten, West Java) into a Peranakan family on 22 September 1935; he was known as Steve Liem Tjoan Hok or Steve Liem before adopting an Indonesian name after Soeharto came to power. His father was a petty trader with five children and Teguh was the eldest. First educated at Akademi Seni Drama dan Film in Yogyakarta (1956), he continued his studies at the Akademi Teater Nasional Indonesia in Jakarta (1957–61), specializing in acting, designing, and play directing. In 1957, he and other Christian Peranakan founded the Seni Teater Kristen in Jakarta. He was a young stage actor and director in the late 1950s and early 1960s. In 1958, during the Sin Ming Hui commemorative celebration, he directed Taufan (Thunder Storm), a powerful play by Cao Yü, (Ts'ao Yu) about a Chinese family tragedy. It appears that Sin Ming Hui, a well established Peranakan Chinese social organization in Jakarta, sponsored many drama and sports activities. Prior to becoming a successful movie director, Teguh also took part in at least four Indonesian movies, either as an actor or artistic director or both, including Jenderal Kancil (A Smart General, 1958) and Mak Comblang (Match Maker, 1960). In 1961, he was the assistant director of Pagar Kawat Berduri (Barbwire Fence), a movie on the Indonesian revolution.

In 1963, Teguh was awarded a scholarship at the University of Hawai'i to study drama and film-making, but he returned to Indonesia without finishing his degree. After his return, he established Teater Populer in 1965, with its headquarters in Hotel Indonesia. When Taman Ismail Marzuki, a cultural centre, was founded, he moved Teater Populer there. In 1975, he established an acting school. Through Teater Populer and the acting school, he succeeded in producing well known film personalities such as Slamet Rahardjo (director), Henky Sulaiman (director), George Kamarullah (film editor), and Tuty Indra Malaoan (actress).

Teguh's first movie, Wajah Seorang Lelaki (The face of a Man), made in 1972, was directed by himself. He also wrote the story and the screenplay for the movie. Furthermore, he used actors and actresses from his Teater Populer in the movie. This first venture was a failure at the box office and he was considered "poison of the box office". There was a joke that if someone would like to produce a movie which would lose money, he should ask Teguh to make it. But Teguh was not discouraged. He studied the shortcomings of his first movie and then produced Cinta Pertama (First love), his second movie, which won him repute. He received the Citra award for best Indonesian director in 1973 for this movie at the Film Festival of Indonesia. Citra is the Indonesian version of Hollywood's Oscars. The leading star in the movie, Christine Hakim, who was then a new-comer, won the best actress award. From then onwards, Teguh produced a large number of award-winning movies. Among his films are Ranjang Pengantin (The Wedding), which clinched him the best director award in 1974; Kawin Lari (Elopement); Perkawinan Dalam Semusim (Wedding in a Season); and Badai Pasti Berlalu (The Storm Will Be Over). His movie, November 1828, an Indonesian historical epic, depicts the story of the Diponegoro War (1825–30), during which Diponegoro, charismatic Javanese prince, refused to accept the Dutch colonial rule and took arms against Dutch. Diponegoro was eventually defeated. The film, which was financed by an Indonesian Chinese, Njo Han Siang — who also served as producer of the movie — won six Citra awards at the 1970 Indonesian Film Festival, including Best Picture of the Year and Best Director of the Year. In the 1980s, he directed many more movies, three of which won him best director awards: Dibalik Kelambu (Behind Mosquito Nets) (1982); Ibunda (Dear Mother) (1986); and Pacar Ketinggalan Kereta (My Love Missed the Train) (1989).

The 1986 movie, Ibunda (Dear Mother) is worth mentioning as it swept nine of the thirteen Citra awards; Jakarta Post commented: "Widely recognized as the Indonesia's top director, Teguh Karya has won a closet full of Citras in his long, illustrious career, but never in such a convincing fashion". (5 August 1986)

Teguh was also recognized internationally. Nine of his movies were screened at the 7th Asian Film Festival in Hong Kong in the 1980s, one of which was Di Balik Kelambu (Behind Mosquito Nets). According to film critics, the major characteristic of Teguh's movies was his emphasis on the struggle of the family in the context of national life in Indonesia. His movies reflect "quiet humanism" which appeals to many viewers at the festival.

According to a report, Teguh was very disappointed and shocked by the anti-Chinese violence on 13 May 1998, which led to the killing, burning and raping of ethnic Chinese in Indonesia. He suffered a serious stroke and became paralyzed. He then lived for another three years before passing away on 11 December 2001 in Jakarta. He was never married. At the Asia-Pacific Film Festival of 2001, Teguh Karya was given the "Life Achievement Award" for his contribution to Indonesian movies. On Heroes Day (10 November) of 2002, President Megawati Sukarnoputri presented the Bintang Budaya Paramadharma award to "the sons of Indonesia" who had made major contributions in the cultural field. Among the winners were Chairil Anwar (writer), Ismail Marzuki (composer), and Teguh Karya (movie and theater director).

Khachon Tingthanathikun

(John K.C. Ting, 丁家骏, Ding Jiajun, 1909–97)

Businessman, philanthropist, community leader, Thailand

Khachon Tingthanathikun was the founder of the successful Thai Petroleum and Trading Co. Ltd. in Thailand. With the success of his business, he managed to rise up the social ladder and became director or chairperson of many associations in Thailand. He was also enthusiastic about promoting economic and cultural exchanges between Thailand and China. His greatest contribution in this field was the setting up of the Tingthanathikun Foundation to sponsor twelve students from China to study agriculture in Thailand, and three Thai students to study the history and culture of China in China.

Khachon, also known as John K.C. Ting, was born on 2 October 1909 in Tai Ping Xu Village, Dongguan City, Guangdong Province. His ancestry can be traced to Fengshun City of Guangdong Province. Ding Richang (丁日昌), a famous chancellor in the late Qing Dynasty, was his great grand-uncle. His father was Qingbo (清波), and his mother was Madam Fang (方氏). He was the fifth child of the couple, who had eight sons and three daughters.

Khachon studied at Fengshun Primary School (丰顺县立中学) in his ancestral hometown and Yushi Middle School (汕头碧石中学) in Shantou City. He then emigrated to Singapore with his elder brother. There, he studied at the Anglo-Chinese School. Because of his educational background, he was well versed in both the English and Chinese languages. Before World War Two, he held a high-ranking post at Yardley Bank in Singapore. He then became the manager of Asia Petroleum Company (亚细亚石油公司) in both Hong Kong and Guangzhou for ten years. When World War Two broke out, he quit his jobs and joined the Chinese army. He received training as a translator from the Sino-American Cooperative Organization (中美合作所) in Chongqing, China. After graduation, he served as a lieutenant colonel and translation coordinator in the Special Forces Unit.

When the war ended, Khachon returned to work at Asia Petroleum Company for a brief period. Later, in 1947, he established his own company, Fengshun Petroleum Company (丰顺石油行), fully engaged in the petroleum business. He was later elected chairperson of the board of directors of the Guangzhou Petroleum Association (广州市石油公会). In 1950, he tried to seek business opportunities in Hong Kong, but migrated to Thailand in 1952 and set up the Thai Petroleum and Trading Co., Ltd. Soon afterwards, he acquired the necessary authorization and became the distributor of the American-brand motor oil, Pennzoil, in Thailand. In order to serve his customers better, he set up the Pennzoil Service Center in Bang Khen District in 1977. In 1983, he built a large-scale lubricating oil and grease mix factory in Samut Prakan Province. In the years to come, he built many oil processing factories, became the employer of more than 30,000 staff, and came to be one of the greatest suppliers of grease in Thailand. In 1997, a modern twenty-five-storey building named TP&T building was built to house the company.

Apart from his success in business, Khachon is best noted for his efforts to promote good relations between China and Thailand. When China and Thailand established diplomatic relations in 1975, he was earnest in assisting the construction of a Chinese embassy and the promotion of trade between the two countries. He considered it urgent to cultivate technical talent for China and so, from 1991, sponsored twelve master's degree candidates from China every year to study agriculture in Thailand through the "Tingthanathikun Foundation". He was invited to visit China many times and was received in audience by Chinese state leaders. At the same time, starting in 1992, he also sponsored three master's degree candidates from Thailand every year to study the history and culture of China in China with funds from the Tingthanathikun Foundation.

Khachorn was active in charity work in both Thailand and China, especially in the education sector. In Thailand, besides the sponsorship mentioned above, the Tingthanathikun Foundation also provided scholarships to the Ministry of Education of Thailand to support fifty students from agricultural universities to undertake research in agriculture. He also donated huge sums to Chinese schools. For instance, he donated 10 million baht to the Huachiaw Chalermphrakiat University. Khachon paid special attention to Chinese education in Thailand because he thought that both Thai-Chinese and Thais should learn the Chinese language to facilitate mutual exchanges between Thailand and China. Besides supporting education, he also donated 35,000 baht when the Tien Hua Hospital (天华医院) was building its new seven-storey building. A room in the hospital was named "Ding Qingpo Room" (丁清 波室) in memory of his father. Besides the Tien Hua Hospital, he also donated to many other hospitals in Bangkok. In China he set up a foundation to provide bursaries to poor students, and donated books to schools in the cities of Shantou and Fengshun. He also helped financially in the building of the Ding Richang Memorial Library (丁日昌纪念图书馆) in Fengshun County.

He was also heavily involved in various associations and served as vice-president of the Thai-Chinese Relationship Association (泰中友好协会), deputy director of the Fund Raising Bureau of the Thai Red Cross Society, standing committee consultant of the Thai Basketball Federation, vice-chairperson and secretary of the Thai-Chinese Chamber of Commerce, vice-chairman of the Tien Hua Foundation Hospital, honorary chairman of the Thai Poetry Society, honorary Chief Director of the Ding Clan Association of Thailand (泰国丁氏宗亲总会), honorary chairperson of the Hakka Association of Thailand (泰国客属总会), among other positions. Also noteworthy is that he founded the Fengshun Association in Thailand (丰顺会馆), and revived the activities of the Ding Clan Association of Thailand.

Khachon died on 19 February 1997 at the age of eighty-seven. After his death his wife, Mali Tingthanathikun, put in much effort and assumed the chairmanship of the Thai Petroleum and Trading Co., Ltd. She arranged for her children to enter their father's businesses. Adhering to her husband's will, she actively participated in social welfare, holding many posts in public organizations, while serving in the family business. In addition to her regular donations to Thai universities and institutions, she also donated to social associations. As one of the founders of the Tingthanathikun Foundation, she sponsored scholarships to the Agricultural Machinery Department and the Chinese Department of Kasetsat University in Thailand. As many benefited from her generosity, she was conferred an honorary master of arts degree in Chinese by Kasetsat University in 2005 to honour her contributions.

Khaw Kai Boh

(许启谟, Xu Qimo, 1918–72)

Head of Special Branch (Perak), lawyer, federal cabinet minister, Malaysia

Khaw Kai Boh was the kind of Chinese leader that the British Colonial Administration and the Malayan (later Malaysian) Government recruited to liaise with the Chinese in Malaya and Singapore. This was from the 1930s right up to the 1950s, when both territories were under British colonial rule and subsequently Malaya became independent in 1957, with Singapore becoming a part of the enlarged Malaysian federation in September 1963 and separating on 9 August 1965. Khaw had a distinguished career in the Malayan Special Branch and was briefly a lawyer before participating in politics as a member of the Malayan (later Malaysian) Chinese Association (MCA), the Chinese component of the Alliance in the 1960s and later National Front (NF) in the 1970s, rising all the way up to deputy MCA president and Federal minister.

Khaw was born in the town of Taiping in the Malayan state of Perak in 1918. Little is known about his childhood except that he attended a Chinese school and later continued his studies in the English-medium Anglo-Chinese School in Ipoh. Khaw passed his Senior Cambridge examinations (Form 5) and wanted to further his studies in law in the United Kingdom, but had been unable to do so. Instead he took a correspondence course in Radio Engineering from Britain, completing it to become an associate of the Institute of Radio Engineering, Britain, and the United States.

Armed with his qualification, Khaw left Perak for Singapore in 1937, setting his sights on becoming a radio engineer in the then British colony. He worked there until his resignation in 1939 to pursue his studies in law, but once again, his plans were disrupted. The reasons for this are not known, but he joined the government service in Singapore. He was the assistant boarding officer in the Chinese Protectorate, where part of his work included announcing and censoring Chinese broadcasts over radio.

Khaw kept a low profile during the Japanese Occupation of Malaya from 1941–45, but after the Japanese surrendered, he was seconded as an officer to the British Army Field Security Unit at their Southeast Asia Command (SEAC) headquarters in Singapore in 1945–46 before joining the Malayan Security Service, the forerunner of the Special Branch. He was promoted to police inspector in 1946 after he had resolved social problems in the Chinese community created by secret society members. Khaw was largely credited with the colonial government's crackdown on the Ang Bin Hoey secret society in Penang. In 1948, Khaw was promoted to the rank of assistant superintendant of police, and the next year (1949), he became head of the Special Branch in Perak.

In 1950, Khaw took time off from his work to study law in Britain, which he had failed to do thirteen years earlier. He spent less than a year to complete Part I of his law examinations and returned to Kuala Lumpur to resume his work in the Special Branch. That same year, 1950, Khaw was transferred to the Special Branch in Singapore. Over the next five years (1950–55), Khaw was involved in monitoring the activities of left-wing politicians, trade unionists, communists, and rebellious Chinese school students. In 1955, Khaw left for Britain once again to complete his final Bar examinations before returning home to continue his work with the police in Singapore. In 1957 Khaw was appointed Special Branch director, with the rank of senior assistant commissioner.

Khaw's position as Special Branch director did not endear him to Singapore's People's Action Party (PAP) because he had been the one mainly responsible for harassing them in the David Marshall and Lim Yew Hock administration's crackdown on political opponents, prior to 1959. Thus when Lee Kuan Yew and the PAP came to power in Singapore's legislative election in 1959, they made it clear that he was persona non grata in the new Singapore.

Khaw used the excuse of his admission to the Bar in Singapore in 1959 to resign from the police force to join the well known law firm of Allen & Glenhill. Not feeling comfortable in a PAP-administered Singapore, Khaw was relieved to be transferred to Allen & Glenhill's office in Kuala Lumpur in 1961.

That same year Khaw joined MCA, as its legal adviser. Khaw proved himself indispensable in the MCA and, in February 1963, was appointed a senator. Two months later, he joined the federal cabinet of Prime Minister Tunku Abdul Rahman as minister without portfolio.

Khaw was a member of the federal government delegation which visited the Borneo territories of Sarawak and Sabah, as well as Singapore, to organize the Alliance there in preparation for the inauguration of Malaysia, an extension of the Malayan federation to include Singapore, Sarawak, and Sabah, on 16 September 1963. Together with another MCA leader and minister of commerce & industry, Dr Lim Swee Aun, Khaw had visited Singapore several months before Malaysia day to assess possible political and economic roles the MCA could play in a Chinese-majority setting such as Singapore, which was dubbed the "New York of Malaysia". Khaw was probably chosen for this role because he had worked in the Special Branch in Singapore for several years and presumably knew how to counter the PAP.

Understandably the PAP was not happy with Khaw as a representative of the MCA/Alliance trying to undermine its position. All earlier allegations about Khaw dabbling in local politics and being involved in questionable business deals had been vindicated in their eyes. In the volatile Alliance/PAP polemics which took place in both Malaya and Singapore within the next two years (1963–65), Khaw, Tan Siew Sin, T. H. Tan, and other top MCA leaders were attacked by the PAP. After joining the MCA, Khaw had been critical of the PAP. In the aftermath of the 1964 Singapore ethnic riots, Khaw echoed the accusations of the United Malays National Organization (UMNO) leaders that PAP was a Chinese chauvinist party, and that the Singapore government programmes were meant to benefit only the Chinese and not the Malays.

With Singapore out of the Malaysian Federation in August 1965, Khaw focused his attention on strengthening the MCA and Alliance. He had been elected an Alliance/MCA MP for the parliamentary constituency of Ulu Selangor in 1964 and was appointed the minister of Local Government and housing in 1966. That same year, he became a member of the Malaysian delegation led by then Deputy Prime Minister Tun Abdul Razak to Tokyo to broker talks with Indonesia and the Philippines with the end of Confrontation.

In 1968, Khaw was also appointed chairman of a working team to produce a blueprint for the establishment of the Tunku Abdul Rahman College (TARC) by then MCA president Tan Siew Sin. The TARC was a compromise that the MCA obtained from the government after its proposal to start a Chinese-language university called Merdeka University was turned down.

When Malaysia came under emergency rule after racial riots broke out in Kuala Lumpur on 13 May 1969 and parliamentary democracy was suspended, Khaw was one of two MCA ministers (the other was Tan Siew Sin) who were appointed ministers with special functions in the National Operations Council (NOC) chaired by Tun Razak. Earlier in the 1969 general elections, Khaw and Tan were two of the thirteen successful MCA candidates elected to parliament. But the MCA, which had suffered severe reverses in the 1969 general elections, decided to withdraw from the federal cabinet, a move approved by Tun Razak.

Khaw appeared on television speaking in Chinese to explain some of the NOC policies to the Chinese, many of whom were not happy with the Malay-led government. As minister with special functions, he was responsible for collecting and verifying data in relation to dead bodies in the 1969 Kuala Lumpur riots.

Khaw had reached the peak of his political career in the MCA when he was elected its deputy president in 1971, the year parliamentary democracy was restored and the NOC dissolved. Besides politics, Khaw was also active in sports. He was president of the Malaysian Basketball Association, the Asian Basketball Confederation, and the president of the Olympic Council of Malaysia. He was also chef de mission of the Malaysian contingent to the Mexico City Olympics in 1968.

Khaw died at the age of fifty-four in 1972 in London.

Khine Khine Maw

(林青玉, Lin Qingyu, 1979–)
Asian wushu champion, sportswoman, Myanmar

Khine Khine Maw is a prominent sports figure in Myanmar who has won many gold medals for the country in the field of wushu (Chinese martial art) in a number of international competitions and has become an icon in Myanmar and beyond.

She won the first gold medal at the 14th Asian Games held at Busan, South Korea, in October 2002. With four gold medals for wushu, Khine Khine Maw brought honour to the nation, an unusual achievement for a woman in Myanmar. Due to her extraordinary performance, she was conferred the Myanmar Women's Sports Award for the Year 2002.

During the games, she displayed her skills in the wushu taijiquan (also known as t'ai chi ch'uan) sword competition and won international acclaim for standard, balance, stretch, agility and grace, securing the first gold medal for the Myanmar sports team. She reportedly even beat the wushu participants from mainland China who are usually at the forefront of most wushu competitions. She gained the highest points awarded and scored a total of 18.96. One of the referees even gave her a score of 9.6 points, the highest awarded in taijiquan sword competitions in recent historical records.

Khine Khine Maw received her training from two Chinese wushu coaches: Shen Jianjun and Zhang Yong. When she first participated in the 4th World Wushu Championship in 1997, she was place in the ninth position. In 1999 Khine won her first three gold medals (in taijiquan sword display, taijiquan, and overall wushu competition) at the 2nd Southeast Asia Wushu Championship held in Yangon. From then onwards, she has been winning silver or gold medals in various international wushu competitions. At the 5th Asia Wushu Championship held in Hanoi in 2000, she won a silver medal, but the same year at the 21st Southeast Asia Wushu Championship in Penang, she received a gold medal. Since then, she has collected various gold medals at international competitions: in 2001, she obtained gold medals at the 6th World Wushu Championship which was held in Yerevan (Armenia), in 2002 as mentioned earlier, she won three gold medals at the 14th Asian Games in Busan, and in 2003 she won another gold medal at the 7th World Wushu Championship in Macau, China SAR, and in 2004 she won another gold medal in the women's taijiquan event of the 6th Asian Wushu Championship held in Yangon, Myanmar.

When the World Health Organization (WHO) organized the campaign of the World No Tobacco Day with the theme, "Tobacco Free Sports — Play It Clean", in 2002 and pressurized sports authorities and governments to adopt policies to clean tobacco from the sports arena, Khine participated in the campaign as one of the "Tobacco-Free Champions", working with national health authorities in order to "free sports from the vicious grip of tobacco".

Since then she has been recognized as a personality in wushu, not only in Myanmar, but also overseas. In October and December 2010, Khine's graceful, adorable, and beautiful movements in taijiquan sword have been uploaded on a YouTube internet series in Burmese: "Asian Elegant Gold Medalist of World's Wushu Championship (1) & (2)". While she is identified as Burmese with a Burmese name in the above programme, in another YouTube clip (Kulm 8888, Cable TV) , in the Cantonese dialect, she is referred to as Lin Qingyu of Myanmar (林青玉, 缅甸), reflecting her ethnic Chinese identity, but also stressing she is from Myanmar, not the People's Republic of China. Her double identity is quite clear: she is a Myanmar citizen of Chinese descent. In fact, this mixture of Chinese and Myanmar culture is reflected in her wushu taijiquan: she has combined Chinese traditional wushu taijiquan sword displays with Burmese songs, giving the Chinese sports some Myanmar characteristics.

In an interview with Xinhua News at Busan during the 14th Asian Games, she disclosed to the reporters that her grandfather, U Tun Nyan, was a Burmese. But he adopted a Chinese name, Lin Tongyuan (林桐元), from his Cantonese godfather, Lin Song Lin. Lin Tongyuan married a Cantonese Chinese lady, Daw Hnin Yee, alias Lai Mei Po (赖美婆), from Guangzhou, China. Khine's father, U Minn Yu Naing, alias U Sein Win, alias Lim Feng Hua (林丰华), was a wushu enthusiast who has had a great influence on her. She has also credited her Chinese and Buddhist family upbringing to her success as a national sports woman in Myanmar.

Her maternal great-grandparents ran a pawn shop and a liquor shop in Pyapon in Irrawaddy Delta after they migrated to Burma from Canton. After they passed away, the business was handed over to her grandparents. The parents of Khine's mother, Daw Myint Myint Win, alias Daw Lwan Har (杨暖霞), were from Bixi village (碧溪乡) in Tong An district (同安县), Fujian Province, China. U Shu Wa (杨徐生), Khine's maternal grandfather, was a member of the Yang Clan Association (杨氏知堂) in Yangon. They had a grocery shop in 23rd Street of Yangon Chinatown which was nationalized in 1964.

Besides sports, Khine is also interested in clothes designing, tailoring, and needlework. She learned the basic skills of dress-making from her mother and her acquired skills have proven to be very useful. The family is now involved in producing children wear under the brand, "Whizz-kidz", which has become a local branded name in Myanmar. Khine was the one who created and designed the products.

Khine has a bachelor's degree in arts from the University of Yangon and is reported to be very hard-working. She continuously seeks to upgrade her soft skills by attending basic courses on diplomatic skills and the English language at the SEAMEO CHAT (Southeast Asian Ministers of Education Organization, Regional Centre for History and Tradition).

Kho Ping Hoo

(Asmaraman Sukowati, 许平和, Xu Pinghe, 1926–94)

Writer of cloak and dagger (kungfu or silat) stories, Indonesia

Kho Ping Hoo wrote 145 kungfu stories which are now still enjoyed by thousands of Indonesians from all levels of society. His stories were composed from his imagination and not translated or adapted from Chinese stories. Apart from kungfu stories, he also wrote some novels to promote the assimilation of the Chinese; some of his stories were published in the Javanese language.

Born in 1926, Kho came from a Peranakan family with fifteen children in Solo. His paternal grandmother and great maternal grandmother were native Javanese and, consequently, Kho had a good command of both the prestige and the spoken varieties of the Javanese language. He could also read and write the Javanese script.

Kho's father was a sugar broker, but spent his spare time meditating and practising martial arts. He had a good knowledge of Javanese mysticism. Kho attended a Christian Dutch school; however, because his father could not afford to pay the school fees, Kho was not entitled to receive a certificate when he finished elementary school. After a year in secondary school, Kho left the family and went to several cities to look for work. He took up odd jobs such as selling medicines or other goods door-to-door. Finally, he landed a job in a transportation company in Tasikmalaya. His friends there were mostly totok (pure) Chinese and thus he learned Mandarin to converse with them. In 1955 when he had to choose between Indonesian and Chinese citizenship, he chose the latter like most of his friends did. He was prepared to go to China in 1959 when the PP10 decree banned Chinese traders in the villages, but due to transportation problems, he and his family had to remain in Indonesia.

In 1963, riots erupted in Bandung, but the mob also attacked the Chinese in Tasikmalaya. Kho's house was looted and burned down and he decided to move to Solo where he started a new chapter in his life. He devoted his time to story-writing and to avoid problems with publishers, he bought his own printing machine and published the stories himself.

Kho Ping Hoo wrote his first kungfu story in 1959, when a translator of silat or kungfu stories turned down an offer to contribute to the magazine, that he and his friends has set up, saying that he was too busy. Kho then decided to write kungfu stories himself. He tried to translate some stories, but his command of the Chinese language was not good enough. He then tried his luck with his first story entitled, Pek Liong Po Kiam (The Heirloom Sword White Dragon), which proved to be a success. Kho did not stop writing after that. He wrote mostly original stories, unlike most of the silat stories that were circulating in Indonesia. In 1980, the Chinese classic, Jin Ping Mei (The Plum in the Golden Vase or, The Golden Lotus in English) was translated and titled, Teratai Emas (Golden Lotus) by him. He also wrote kungfu stories with Javanese settings, such as Darah Mengalir di Borobudur (Blood Flows at Borobudur)(1960), Kilat Pedang Membela Cinta (Flash of Sword Defends Love) (1982), and Sang Megatantra (The Magic Sword Megatantra) (1990). Blood Flows at Borobudur is about intrigues around the building of Borobudur and the difficulties faced by labourers because of problems transporting heavy building materials. The Flash of Sword Defends Love is about an officer of the Zheng He armada who fell in love with a native Indonesian girl. When he had to return to his duties, he promised that he would come back and marry her, but unfortunately, he was murdered before he reached the fleet. His sister went to the Archipelago to avenge his murder, but became involved in many adventures and had to fight off attackers. Finally she met a native prince whom she married. Sang Megatantra is about a warrior who fled China because he had killed somebody while defending a girl from a sexual assault. While in Java, he managed to rescue a pregnant woman from kidnappers. The woman was a princess who promised him a high post in the royal court, but he refused as he wanted to live as a hermit.

According to Kho, the stories he created were based on history, but his imagination had been interwoven with them. He wanted people to know that the Chinese had been in Indonesia for a long time not only as traders, but also as warriors who helped kings to defend their territories, and later, the native army to fight colonial oppressors.

Kho was happy to educate people through his books. One of his objectives was to teach them to become good citizens, that is, good Indonesian citizens. He had decided to become an Indonesian citizen after he realized that it was better for his children to be Indonesian rather than Chinese because they were brought up in Indonesia. Kho had no difficulty obtaining Indonesian citizenship in the 1970s when he was already known as a kungfu story writer. Once he had found his identity — to be Indonesian rather than Chinese — he felt that he had to join the Chinese assimilation movement and tried to persuade his readers that mixed marriages were beneficial for racial harmony. He had seen many living "dramas" of youngsters around him who had fallen in love with friends from other racial groups, but their relationships were opposed by their parents. He became inspired to write a few novels based on daily life that featured inter-racial friendship and marriage. His practice of keeping harmony within his publishing firm was reflected in his attitude towards his workers. Kho could have laid off some senior workers after he bought three IBM computerized printing machines. Instead, he kept the old printing machines for these workers who had been loyal to him for more than thirty years and expanded his business to include printing tickets for vehicle parking and local performances, as well as printing simple invitation cards for celebrations such as weddings. He also secured orders from some factories manufacturing herbal medicines and other local products. He admitted feeling most fortunate when he could help young writers by publishing their works.

Kho was assisted by a good Javanese illustrator for his stories, and by two of his sons who were in charge of editorial work, as well as the management and distribution of his books. He was, therefore, able to devote his time to writing and meditation. Kho acknowledged that interest in his books later showed a decline evidenced by his print, which fell from 15, 000 in the 1970s, to 5, 000 in the 1990s . However, there was demand for up to five or six editions of each of his titles and some of his stories have even been serialized in newspapers or made into movies or TV dramas. With the revenue from his publications, he was able to give his children a good education and a comfortable life. He even travelled around the world, including to China and Hongkong, to meet with other writers, movie directors, and film stars.

When Kho passed away on 22 July 1994, thousands of people came to pay their last respects lining the streets to send the hearse off to the crematorium. Kho's ashes were dispersed in the Indian Ocean, but his serialized stories continue to be enjoyed in various media such as the newspaper, magazine, and television.

Khong Kam Tak

(K.T. Khong, 孔锦德, Kong Jinde, 1884–1973)

Medical doctor, politician, Malaysia

Dr Khong Kam Tak was the first Chinese doctor to be appointed a member of the Federal Legislative Council of Malaya and he served from 1936–39. He was also a state councillor for Perak from 1933–34 and in 1956 became the first non-Malay to be awarded the Dato' Kurnia Negara Perak, which carries the title of Dato'.

Dr Khong's father, Khong Thye Cheng, came to Malaya from China as a boy in the nineteenth century and settled in Penang. Later he went to Ipoh to work as a tin miner.

Khong Kam Tak was born in Penang in 1884. The Khong clan could trace their ancestry to K'ung Fu-tzu, or Confucius. Dr Khong was a direct descendant of Confucius of the seventy-fourth generation. He had his early education at the Penang Free School and in 1899 followed his father to Ipoh, where he enrolled at the newly established Anglo-Chinese School. In 1902 he was one of the first two students of the school to pass the Senior Cambridge Examination and then went back to the Penang Free School to prepare for the Queen's Scholarship of the Federated Malay States. There were only two candidates for this scholarship that year (1903). He did not win this (the coveted honour went to Chan Sze Jin of the Victoria Institution, Kuala Lumpur), but became the first recipient of the Capitan Chung Keng Kwee Scholarship, established by the family of the then recently deceased Capitan China of Perak to enable bright students to attain a tertiary education in Britain.

In 1904 Khong Kam Tak joined St John's College, Cambridge, to study medicine. He represented St John's College in rowing and tennis and distinguished himself in rowing by being the stroke of a boat that made four consecutive "bumps" in the intercollege Bumping Races held twice yearly at the River Cam. This led to his becoming "Head of the River" for his division and being presented with an oar for his achievement.

He had his clinical training at Guy's Hospital, London, and graduated with MB, BChir (Cantab.), and LRCP, MRCS (Lond.) in 1910. Dr K.T. Khong, as he was now known, returned to Malaya and set up a private medical practice in Penang.

The following year he married Lam Swee Chun, a granddaughter of Capitan Chung Keng Kwee.

In 1912 he moved his practice to Ipoh and was the first Asian doctor with a British medical degree to practise in Perak. His clinic, the Kinta Dispensary, was in Tatlock Street. Being a keen sportsman, he set up the town's Chinese Recreation Club in 1913 with the help of the leading mining towkays.

CHINESE RECREATION CLUB

> The Chinese of Ipoh have decided to form their own Recreation Club for sporting and social activities, on the lines of the Penang Recreation Club (and in friendly rivalry to the Kinta Recreation Club of the Ipoh Straits-born Chinese). An inaugural meeting was held on 9th December chaired by Chung Thye Phin. Dr KT Khong also addressed the meeting, and said that there was a great deal of sporting spirit all over Ipoh, and the new Club could be an entrant to the newly-formed "Times of Malaya" football league. Eu Tong Sen was elected the President. The Committee consisted of Dr KT Khong, Chung Thye Phin and Foo Choo Choon.

The club had a strong cricket team with players such as Dr K.T. Khong and Chung Ah Ming, a grandson of Capitan Chung. The pair also teamed up to form a formidable tennis doubles partnership which won the Perak Tennis Doubles Championship for four years in succession after the inception of the tournament in 1924. Dr Khong was one of the finest tennis players in Malaya and represented the Federated Malay States in tennis. He won the Malayan Veterans Doubles Championship twice, and the Perak Veteran Doubles Championship with the Hon. Raja Muda of Perak in 1935. He also represented the state in cricket, and was one of the best Asian golfers in the country.

Dr Khong's public service started in 1914 when he was appointed an unofficial member of the Kinta North Sanitary Board, which served until 1919. He also served on the Kinta Licencing Board, the Central Health Board, Federated Malay States (FMS,) the Mosquito Destruction Board and the Decrepit Ward Fund Committee. However, it was his long association with the Perak Chinese Maternity Hospital that was the hallmark of his public service commitment. In 1904 the "Protector of Chinese", Perak, William Cowan, together with the district surgeon, Dr R.M. Connolly, and the leading towkays of the town, Leong Fee and Foo Choo Choon, established the Ipoh Maternity Hospital "to provide free and good services to the working class and the poor". A site in Chamberlain Road was presented by Cheah Cheang Lim, and the hospital started as a six-bed wooden bungalow. In 1921 the Perak Chinese Maternity Association, with Leong Sin Nam as its first President, was set up to take over the management of the hospital.

In 1935 the Times of Malaya described Dr K.T. Khong thus:

> In company with Mr Goodman (the Protector of Chinese), Dr Khong can claim the distinction of being a founder of the Perak Chinese Maternity Hospital, of which he has been Honorary Medical Superintendent since the year 1921, when the hospital first came into existence.
> Dr Khong is one of those who shy away from the glaring spotlight of publicity, but, however [sic.] though he has tried to hide his light under the proverbial bushel, there is no one in Perak who does not know of the good work the doctor has done for the Government and the people of Perak. "Service before self" has really been Dr Khong's motto and his service to the PCMH in Ipoh extends over a long period of years. But apart from such public duties as he has undertaken, the doctor has dispensed charity in very secret manner and never is there a poor Chinese labourer who, sick and in despair, has been refused free medical attention by the doctor.

He was appointed a member of the Perak State Council from 1933 to 1934 and the Federal Council from 1936 to 1939. He was one of three Advisors to the governor of the Straits Settlements and British high commissioner in the Federal Advisory Council. Khong was also a member of the Chinese Advisory Board and the Po Leung Kuk. For his public service, he was made a Justice of the Peace in 1921, awarded the Malayan Certificate of Honour in 1931, the MBE in 1935, and the CBE in 1947. He was president of the Ipoh Rotary Club in 1930–31, the first Asian to hold the post. In 1935 he was elected the first president of the Anglo-Chinese School Old Boys' Association.

He was medical superintendent of the Perak Chinese Maternity Hospital for over thirty years until his retirement in 1957, when he moved to Singapore. Dr Khong died on 5 October 1973. Two roads in Ipoh have been named after him — Jalan Dato Khong Kam Tak and Lebuh Dato Khong Kam Tak — and also a road in Kuala Lumpur.

Khoo Kay Kim

(邱家金, Qiu Jiajin, 1937–)
Historian, Malaysia

Khoo Kay Kim was thirty-seven years old when he finished his doctoral thesis, titled The Beginnings of Political Extremism in Malaya 1915–1935 — at Universiti Malaya in 1974. He was the first Malaysian ever to receive that degree from the Arts Faculty of the university where he had been lecturing since 1967. The achievement won him an associate fellowship in its History Department.

He was made professor the following year when the chair of Malaysian History was created, and he went on to become one of Malaysia's most influential and prolific, if often controversial, historians and intellectuals.

Born in Kampar in the state of Perak on 28 March 1937, he returned there after gaining his BA in 1959 from the University of Malaya in Singapore. He taught at the Anglo-Chinese Secondary School in Teluk Intan, where he used Bahasa Kebangsaan as his medium of instruction in 1965–66, and then did the same as lecturer to first-year students in the History Department at Universiti Malaya in 1967. Officially, Malay became the overall medium of instruction at the university only in 1983.

Khoo's MA thesis, The Western Malay States, was among the first to be published in the Oxford in Asia series and is now popularly used in the study of Malaysian history. The influence he exerted over the development of the history in Malaysia was significant. He was head of the History Department from 1973–74 and 1982–84, after which he was dean of the Faculty of Arts and Social Science from 1984-86. He was also involved in the curriculum development of the university as a member of its Malay Studies Academic Planning Committee from 1990–95. After retiring as professor of Malaysian history in 1992, he remained attached on contract to the department until he finally left in 1998. That year, the government of Perak named him Tokoh Penulis Perak (Perak Prolific Writer).

To be sure, his contributions were already noticed early in his career. After the racial riots of 13 May 1969, he was asked to join a committee set up to consider ways to prevent such fighting from recurring. That committee subsequently formulated the Rukunegara (Principles of the Nation), which were meant to act as moral guidance for the nation.

In 1982, he was awarded the Johan Setia Mahkota (Companion of the Most Esteemed Order of the Crown of Malaysia, 3rd Class) by the king. Five years later, the sultan of his home state of Perak made him Dato' Paduka Mahkota Perak (Commander of the Order of the Crown of Perak, 2nd Class). Topping his awards is the Panglima Setia Mahkota (P.S.M. — Commander of the Order of the Crown of Malaysia) which he received in 2008, again from the king.

Now rightly addressed as Professor Emeritus Tan Sri Dato' Dr Khoo Kay Kim, he has published more than 200 items in his lifetime. About 60 per cent of his works were written in English and the rest in Bahasa Malaysia. It has also been noted that only two of these were collaborative efforts. Although he generally worked alone, his other interests ranged from sports to literature. From 1994–96, he was director of the university's Sports Centre, during which time he launched the country's first sports degree academic programme. He was also a member of the National Advisory Council on Culture (1974–76, 1990–); the National Literary Award Panel (1972–76); and the Board of Control and the History Terminology Committee of the Literary and Language Agency (1968–77). Incidentally, his three sons — whose mother is of Indian origin — are all involved successfully in cultural activities.

Khoo also served for three years as president of the Malaysian branch of the Royal Asiatic Society (1992–95), after having been honorary editor for numerous historical journals such as the Malaysian Historical Society (1979–87) and the Malaysian Museum Society (1982–). He is also a member of the board of directors of the Institute of Strategic and International Studies; corresponding member of the Journal of Southeast Asian Studies, published by the National University of Singapore's Department of History; and member of the editorial advisory board of the American Asian Review.

His international stature was reflected in his role as external and academic examiner for universities such as Monash University, Australia; University of Auckland, New Zealand; National University of Singapore, and University of Brunei.

Professor Khoo's contributions to public discourses go far beyond the academic world. His propensity to make contentious statements to highlight what he sees as growing ignorance among Malaysians often led to heated debates in the mass media with his peers. For example, in January 2012, he challenged critics to prove that supposed historical figures such as Hang Li Po (purportedly the fifth wife of Malacca's Sultan Mansur Shah), and Hang Tuah and his group of warriors, ever existed. His main concerns, he later stated, were that facts were not being differentiated from fiction, and the real heroes of the country were being overshadowed by myths.

Most hotly debated has been his disapproval of the vernacular school system in Malaysia. For the sake of national unity, he claims, there should be only one streamlined educational system using Bahasa Malaysia as its medium of instruction. Not strangely, this runs him foul of Malaysian Chinese groups who understand their culture to be under threat from government policies favouring Malay culture.

Professor Khoo's arguments in defence of hot topics such as the Malay special position and the position of the sultans rely strongly on his understanding of the historical conditions from which they have sprung. Such a viewpoint, his many critics argue, assume a one-dimensional interpretation of history. And even if his interpretation is accepted as grounded, it nevertheless overstates badly the ethical dependence of the future on the past — and mistakes the descriptive for the prescriptive.

Being critical of how the subject of history has been politicized in Malaysia, he argues for cultural history to be taught so that Malaysians can understand more deeply the diversity of the ethnicities in their midst. Often accused of being a proponent of ethnic assimilation, he famously said, "When you are a true Malaysian, you are a very lonely person."

Khoo Kim Hai, Eric

(邱金海,Qiu Jinhai, 1965–)

Film director and producer, Singapore

Eric Khoo is the celebrated director who put Singapore on the global film map by having his films selected for the prestigious Cannes Film Festival. His award winning works are distinguished by a passion to tell the stories of little people living dismal lives on the fringe. This has given him a certain rebel status in a country that tends to highlight how life is so wonderful for its citizens. Khoo also deserves credit as a pioneer film-maker who helped jumpstart Singapore's moribund movie industry.

Khoo was born on 27 March 1965 to Khoo Teck Puat and Rose Marie Wee in Singapore. The youngest of fourteen children, he attended the Anglo-Chinese School and United World College. Khoo was immersed in the world of cinema very early in his life. At the age of three, his film buff mother started to take him to the movies and at eight, he was making films about his toys using her Canon Super 8 camera. At eleven, he saw Martin Scorsese's Taxi Driver and was deeply moved by Robert de Niro's portrayal of the maniacal lead character, which may have provided the early imprint of grit, violence and the anti-hero to be found in many of his works. Khoo had his training in film-making at the City Art Institute of News South Wales, Australia, where he graduated in cinematography in 1985.

For Khoo's generation, a career in film-making had to be fashioned out of nothing because Singapore's film industry of the 1950s and 1960s had long since disappeared. Riding on video technology in the late 1980s, the experimental short film came into its own. This was Khoo's first step into a film-making career.

A series of award-winning short films — A Question of Lust (1987) and Barbie Digs Joe (1990) at the Singapore Video Competition, organized by the People's Association, and Pain (1991) at the Singapore Short Film Award, organized by the Singapore International Film Festival — established Khoo as a talented young director to watch. The quirky and controversial content of these films also earned him an enfant terrible reputation. Pain, dealing with masochism may have won Khoo the Best Director Award, but graphic scenes led to the film being banned. In 1992, another short film, Carcass, became the first Singapore film to be given an R(A) rating, a classification that restricts the film's audience to those twenty-one years old and above. The film tells the story of a butcher's wife who left her family to be a prostitute. Khoo's first full-length film, the iconic Mee Pok Man in 1995, also featured a prostitute, this time as a bizarre love fetish of a slow-witted noodle seller who kept her decaying corpse. It received an R(A) classification too.

Mee Pok Man went on to capture international attention by picking up awards on the film festival circuit beyond Singapore. Capping that in 1997, Khoo's second full-length work, 12 Storeys, brought him the affirmation most serious film-makers aspire to by being the first Singapore feature to be shown at the prestigious Cannes Film Festival, albeit as a non-competing entry. Since then both films have been screened at over sixty film festivals around the world.

Khoo's third feature film made an even bigger impact. Called Be With Me, it was chosen to open the 2005 Cannes Film Festival's Directors' Fortnight — a showcase for the world's cutting-edge cinematic works — where it received a standing ovation. In 2008, Khoo returned to Cannes again with his fourth feature, My Magic, this time as a full-fledged competing entry for the festival's top Palme D'Or award. Although My Magic did not win, being one of nineteen contending films shortlisted from some 4,000 entries has placed Khoo in the same league as some of the biggest names in film-making.

With four feature films released over fourteen years, Khoo is not a prolific director. Be With Me came after a pause of eight years. The paucity of work is partly related to his involvement in production work at Zhao Wei Films, a company he set up with a friend in 1995. Through Zhao Wei, he has produced music videos, television commercials and a range of successful films such as Liang Po Po — The Movie (1999), One Leg Kicking (2001), 15 (2003) and 881 (2007). This is the part of his career that is about doing what is needed to survive market forces in the film industry. In that capacity, Khoo has played a part in setting up an infrastructure for film-making in Singapore. Many people working in the film industry today began their careers with Khoo.

Khoo's works famously depict the underbelly of Singapore society where the poor living in the nation's ubiquitous public housing estates lead bleak lives as they grapple with sexual fantasies and dysfunctional families. This may be an artist's stab at realism, very much a touchstone of his cinematic language, and has won him kudos for providing an alternative perspective to life in Singapore, independent of the glowing official narrative. However, the fascination with the poor has attracted its share of critics who questioned Khoo's ability to understand the poor with honesty or depth because his family, which owns the Goodwood Park Hotel Group, is one of Singapore's richest. It does not help that Khoo's works are not box office hits, which means the heartlanders whose lives he seeks to capture find watching his films an acquired taste. Those seeking Singapore films that has greater market appeal should look to the works of another of the country's film pioneers Jack Neo.

In person, Khoo's behaviour does not conform to his status of great wealth. An unassuming man, he mixes easily with people from all socio-economic classes, dresses casually and enjoys eating and drinking in rough and ready venues around Singapore. Tired of having the irony of a rich kid making films about poor people pointed out to him, Khoo's response to the media has been, "You know, all that talk about how you've got to be tortured and penniless to understand life, all that chatter about the suffering artist — I don't buy it. Sorry, but I really don't. I think that if you've got a pair of eyes and a functioning heart, you can understand, sympathise and empathise."

Choice of actors also underscores the realism in Khoo's works. He prefers to work with unknowns who fit the role in the most natural way rather than have actors working hard to look and sound like the characters they are playing. Ultimately these untried actors have turned in convincing performances that not only burnish the films, but also attest to Khoo's strength as a director in drawing these deliveries out of them. An excellent example of this is found in Be With Me, where he cast a deaf and blind Theresa Chan to play herself and interwove her real-life story with the make-believe drama of two other subplots. In doing so, he serves up an emotionally powerful mix of fact with fiction, which makes Be With Me possibly Khoo's most sophisticated work. In a departure from the bleakness of his two previous films, this film touches many with its message of hope and love.

Khoo's films display vividly Singaporean traits. The dialogue usually comes in a variety of languages and dialects reflecting the multilingual reality of the city state. My Magic was largely done in Tamil, a language spoken by Singapore's Indian minority. His camera lingers on icons of the Singapore landscape: blocks of public housing flats, neighbourhood coffee shops, old shophouses in the final throes of their existence as shopping moves to the malls, etc.; all of which are visual cues for a national form of nostalgia. Love of food, another Singapore hallmark, is a motif in his works. Mee Pok Man carries the name of a very popular Singapore noodle dish. 12 Storeys has a man selling "yong tau foo", another well known street food. Besides a glutton who gorges on hawker food, Be With Me has a man who loves to cook. Hawker food and cooking also hover about in My Magic.

With only four features under his belt, Khoo's directorial career is relatively young. But his oeuvre has established two things: firstly, he has a distinctive cinematic style and secondly, the accolades it has won in the international arena point to great possibilities, not just for Khoo himself, but for the budding Singapore film industry.

His fifth feature was a full-length animated film highlighting the works of celebrated Japanese manga artist Yoshihiro Tatsumi. This piece of work reminds Khoo's fans of his earlier passion for drawing comics, some of which used to be syndicated in Singapore's Sunday Times. Entitled Tatsumi, the film was shown at the 2011 Cannes Film Festival in the Un Certain Regard section.

A series of awards have been conferred on Khoo for his achievements in film-making. The more recent ones include the Cultural Medallion (Singapore's highest arts honour) in 2007, and the French culture minister's Chevalier de l'Ordre des Arts et des Letters in 2008. He is a board member in Singapore's Media Development Authority (MDA) and the NYU Tisch School of the Arts Asia.

Khoo is married to Kim Eun Choo and they have four sons, Edward, James, Christopher, and Lucas.

Khoo Oon Teik

(邱恩德, Qiu Ende, 1921–)
Physician, Singapore

Khoo Oon Teik was a clinical physician, dermatologist, nephrologist, and founder of the National Kidney Foundation in Singapore.

Khoo was born in Penang on 30 March 1921, the second of eight sons of Reverend Khoo Cheng Hoe and Kuan Chin Poh. He was educated at the Anglo-Chinese School in Penang where he was an outstanding student, and later awarded a King Edward VII College of Medicine scholarship to study medicine in Singapore. He commenced his medical studies in 1937, but the onset of war interrupted his studies.

During the Japanese Occupation, Khoo was responsible for deploying senior medical students in operating theatres at the General Hospital. He later worked in Penang as a medical officer and was sent to the infamous Burma-Siam railway. When the war ended, he returned to Singapore and worked briefly as a nutrition officer under the British Military Administration. In 1946 he returned to King Edward VII College and finished his final year, obtaining his LMS in 1947. Khoo was then appointed tutor in clinical medicine and subsequently became chief clinical assistant to Professor Gordon A. Ransome.

In 1948, together with Professor Ernest Monteiro, Khoo started Medical Unit II, one of the two medical units of the University of Malaya situated at the Singapore General Hospital (SGH). In 1950 Khoo was awarded the Liew Wing Chee Scholarship to do postgraduate work in London, specializing in diseases of the chest, dermatology, and neurology. In 1952 he was admitted as a member of the Royal College of Physicians in Edinburgh, and the following year, the Royal Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons in Glasgow. He was awarded the China Medical Board fellowship in 1959 to further his studies in Canada and the United States. In 1966, he was admitted as fellow of the Royal College of Physicians in Edinburgh.

Khoo rose through the ranks, becoming senior lecturer in 1954 and was promoted to Professor of Clinical Medicine at Medical Unit II in 1965, succeeding Professor Monteiro who had retired. In 1971, he became the first chairman of the combined University Departments of Medicine. From the time he joined the university until his retirement in 1979, Khoo pioneered numerous initiatives, and his push for greater medical specialization led some to consider him "Singapore's Father of Modern Medicine". By the time he retired, specialities in cardiology, endocrinology and metabolism, gastroenterology, dermatology, and nephrology in the Department of Medicine had been started.

As a junior lecturer, he started the Skin and Leprosy Clinic at the General Hospital in 1948, and in 1961, established the Renal Unit at the hospital, becoming its first director. Other key units he established at SGH included the first Intensive Care Unit (1964); the Coronary Care Unit (1967); and the Drug Dependence Clinic (1971). Khoo also established Alcoholics Anonymous in 1957. He was a founder member of the Academy of Medicine and was its master from 1964 to 1966. He was also a founder member of the Association of Physicians of Malaya, as well as the Singapore Dermatological Society, serving as its president from 1960 to 1975.

The death of his younger brother, Reverend Khoo Oon Eng, in 1958, after a long and painful battle with kidney failure spurred Khoo Oon Teik to establish the Renal Unit at the SGH. In 1969, together with colleagues Gwee Ah Leng, Lim Cheng Hong, and Lee Yong Kiat, he to set up the first Renal Dialysis and Transplant Unit in an attic at SGH. In the 1960s, about 200 persons died of kidney failure annually. Realizing that most people could not afford the cost of dialysis, he established, with a group of volunteers, the National Kidney Foundation. Khoo organized a film premier to raise funds and the foundation was registered as a society in April 1969. It was inaugurated by President Yusok Ishak. Khoo remained active in the foundation, chairing it till he was forced to retire in 1995 after suffering a stroke and having a brain tumour removed.

In 1999 the Khoo Oon Teik Professorship in Nephrology was set up by the National University of Singapore to carry out further research into kidney disease, expand clinical and laboratory programmes, and fund a world-class expert to assist and advise local doctors in the field. It had an initial endowment of S$6 million, of which S$4.5 million was from the government and S$1.5 million from the NKF.

A devout Methodist, he served as chairman, and later president, of the International Congress of Christian Physicians. Khoo was also a keen chess player and used to participate actively in local chess competitions. In 1947, Khoo married Adeline Phoa, and their first of their four sons, Christopher, was born in 1948. Wilfred was born in 1951, followed by Walter in 1953, and Arnold in 1957.

Khoo Seok Wan

(邱菽园, Qiu Shuyuan, 1871–1941)

Firm supporter of Kang Youwei's reformism, leader of the Confucianism revival campaign, poet, journalist, Singapore

Khoo Seok Wan was the most romantic traditional literati at the turn of the twentieth century in Singapore and Malaya. In him, one could see the traits of the late Qing intellectual — he was a chivalrous man, a Confucianist, a man of many romantic affairs in his younger days, and a devout meditating Buddhist in his mellower years. Inheriting his father's business, Khoo was also a rather prominent businessman of his time. However, he exhausted his family fortune within a decade. After reaching middle age, he gradually embraced Buddhism and meditation. His literary works gained him fame and he became known as "the First Poet of Nanyang". He published rigorously, displaying the charms of traditional Chinese culture in Singapore and Malaya and promoting Chinese cultural exchanges in the East Asian region. He was also a very active journalist who was attached to twelve dailies and weeklies altogether in his career. However, what made Khoo's life legendary were the political activities he had engaged in to support Kang Youwei's reform movement, and the Emperor Protection campaign. Related to those activities was also his involvement in female education, Confucianism revival, and social reform.

Khoo's father was Khoo Cheng Tiong, a native of Haiteng County, Fujian Province, China. He came to Singapore at about the age of twenty and single-handedly carved a career out of rice trading, becoming one of the best known rice merchants and social leaders in the region. He placed a lot of importance on his son's education and arranged for the young Khoo to receive traditional education back in China. Khoo Seok Wan, who was born in Haiteng on 10 November 1874 had come to Singapore at the age of eight and returned to China seven years later for his studies. At twenty-one, he acquired the title of juren in China. Khoo settled in Singapore in 1897, a year after his father passed away. From his father, Khoo inherited more than $700,000, which enabled him to afford a lavish lifestyle. He had two marriages. His first wife, Wang, whom he married when he was eighteen, passed away a year later. Khoo then married Lu at the age of twenty.

Khoo exhibited the traits of intellectuals during the late Qing dynasty. Caught up in chaotic times, these intellectuals worried for their lives and longed for the appearance of heroes. His interpretation of life was guided by an affective drive, and he was disposed towards Buddhism. A highly sociable person, he befriended as many as 150 notables during his time. He was a flamboyant and romantic man who lavished attention on no fewer than thirty prostitutes and dancers, and penned more than 200 poems about romance. He was a chivalrous man, generous in helping the underprivileged and unfortunate. Fond of mediating as he aged, he wrote poetry which exuded the Zen influence in abundance.

Khoo was rooted in the soil of Chinese culture and mastered the cultural spirit and form of the times. He was a cultivator of Chinese culture, making the greatest contribution in poetry. His Collected Poems of Khoo Seok Wan (Qiu Shuyuan Jushi Shiji), containing a compilation of selected poems, numbered more than a thousand, and Khoo was regarded as "the First Poet in Nanyang". His three major published journals were each over a hundred thousand words. Ramblings of Seok Wan (Shuyuan Zhuitan) is one of them. Khoo also wrote and critique novels, and was considered one of the finest novel critics of his time. He was also an artist who loved to draw and review art. A lover of seals, he had hundreds of them in his collection. Transmitting Chinese culture overseas, Khoo wrote and published rigorously, was well networked with many literati, and made good use of the new media of the times — the press. Khoo's works, therefore, were not only read in Singapore, but also helped forge exchanges between Southeast Asia, Hong Kong, Taiwan, and other countries.

To Khoo, journalism was his career and also his profession. From 1898 to 1931, he was closely associated with twelve dailies or weeklies. He had either established or sponsored many kinds of newspapers, including Tian Nan Shin Pao and Zhen Nan Pao; he had also served as editor of literary supplements and contributing writer for newspapers in Shanghai, Guangzhou, Hong Kong, and Singapore. At the same time, he often wrote articles for newspapers in Singapore and Malaya. It was rare in the history of local journalism that someone could be so actively involved in so many different newspapers for so long and in multiple roles.

The most legendary part of Khoo's life was his involvement in Kang Youwei's reformism and Emperor Protection activities. From 1888 to 1896, he returned to China for his studies and examinations. That was a time of turmoil and rapid changes — China was confronted with a national crisis and the impact of new ideologies. Khoo was at the time influenced by a few radical teachers. He had also acquired new experiences on trips to Fujian, Guangzhou, Macau, Beijing, and Hong Kong, and read profusely the works of reformists and western scholars.

Khoo's reformist ideas were thus formed before he settled in Singapore. At this time, the reformist careers of Kang Youwei and Liang Qichao had reached a peak. Living in a British colony actually gave Khoo the chance to support Kang's political activities both in words and deeds, leading him to become a rather prominent overseas reformist hero. From 1894 to 1902, he tried to realize his ideals. His activities could be classified into two kinds. The first kind was related to: 1) the establishment of literary societies, dissemination of culture, and intellectual interactions; 2) the establishment of Tian Nan Shin Pao as a propagandist tool to advocate reformism; 3) the planning of a school set-up to nurture talents and building a girls' school to promote female education; 4) leading Confucianism renaissance in Singapore and Malaya.

The second kind of activities included: 1) the sending of a petition signed by 500 businessmen to Tsungli Yamen in Beijing, requesting the Empress-Dowager to surrender her power; 2) the welcoming of Kang Youwei to Singapore and the arrangement of a safe place for him to stay; 3) the participation in the Emperor Protection movement, enabling Kang to direct the activities of the Emperor Protection Society at different locales; 4) the sponsoring and planning of the Hankow Uprising, which also spelt the last chapter in Kang's reformist career.

In Southeast Asia, Khoo's cultural societies pushed for cultural and educational developments. Tian Nan Shin Pao was the first local newspaper which strongly responded to politics in China while the Singapore Chinese Girls' School was the first girls' school established by the Chinese themselves. The Confucianism campaign was an unprecedented cultural movement. Having taken on the task of Sinicizing Singapore, Khoo had an impact on the Chinese community in the region that was long-lasting.

Khoo's support for Kang's activities had shocked many inside and outside China. Although he was physically far away from China, he was intimately linked to some key historical events in China's contemporary history, thus forging a closer connection between China and the regions. The political and cultural activities that Kang Youwei and Liang Qichao were later prevented from partaking in, found continuity in Singapore and Malaya, bringing this region within the inner orbit of contemporary Chinese politics. Although Kang's and Khoo's reformist careers in Singapore was brief, their impact on the Nanyang Chinese's involvement in the political events in China was influential.

Despite his leaving his hometown in China, Khoo Seok Wan placed himself in the modern history of China through his thoughts and personality, his literary accomplishments, and political actions. Being in Nanyang provided him the opportunity to introduce to this region the ideas of political reform, and the literary and educational atmosphere in China then. That earned him a place in the history of Singapore and Malaya.

Khoo Teck Puat

(邱德拔, Qiu Deba, 1917–2004)

Banker, hotelier, philanthropist, Singapore

Known as one of Singapore's wealthiest man at the time of his death, Khoo Teck Puat is remembered as the owner and head of the Goodwood Group of exquisite boutique hotels in London and Singapore. At the time of his death, he had an estimated fortune of $4.3 billion. Forbes magazine had ranked him the one hundred and eighth richest person in the world in 2004. He was so successful at consolidating his wealth that he was still regarded as the second wealthiest person in Singapore in the Singapore 40 Richest in 2007, three years after his death. Following his death, his estate donated $80 million to the Duke-National University of Singapore Graduate Medical School Singapore (GMS). The bulk of his wealth came not from his chain of luxury hotels, but from his shares at the British bank of Standard Chartered.

Although he was born on 13 January 1917 to Khoo Yang Thin, a trader and landowner with stakes in several banks that later merged to form the Overseas-Chinese banking Corporation (OCBC), he was not born into easy affluence. His education was in fact minimal. After receiving his education at Saint Joseph's Institution and completing Standard 8, he left school at the age of sixteen to join OCBC as an apprentice bank clerk in 1933. He married Tan Geok Yin a year later and settled down to working life.

Due to his hard work and dedication to his job, Khoo rose steadily and rapidly through the ranks at OCBC. His strong work ethic enabled him to develop strong ties with OCBC founder Tan Chin Tuan. While still at OCBC, Khoo became the Chairman of the Central Provident Fund (CPF) Board for a year in 1958. However by 1959, he had a falling out with Tan Chin Tuan and left the bank. This was because Khoo felt that OCBC was growing far too slowly and not opening enough branches in the smaller towns in Peninsular Malaya.

On leaving OCBC, he called on all his experience in the banking sector and founded the Malayan Banking Corporation (later Maybank) in Malaya in 1960. During his tenure there, Maybank acquired various subsidies, among them the Goodwood Park and Cathay hotels. Within the next three years, the bank expanded rapidly and grew to 150 branches. In 1965 however, Khoo was ousted from Maybank by the Malaysian Government under the Tun Razak administration. The reason behind the Malaysian government takeover of Maybank lay in the allegations that Khoo had pumped the bank's money into his own private firm in Singapore. The pretext of this allegation was born out of the political tensions following the merger and break up of Malaysia and Singapore.

After leaving Maybank in 1965, Khoo set up the Goodwood Group, which became the centre of his business empire. His shrewd investments over the years and his sharp business acumen ensured that he was soon in a position to repurchase all the former Singapore-based investments from Maybank. In 1968, Khoo acquired all of Maybank's Singapore properties such as Goodwood Park Hotel and Central Properties for $50 million. At the same time, he progressed to buying out other hotels under his Goodwood Group banner. Some of the hotels he acquired were York Hotel, Holiday Inn, Ladyhill Hotel, Hotel Malaysia (later Omni Marco Polo). In the years between 1981 and 1988, Khoo also acquired the Southern Pacific Hotel Corporation, one of Australia's largest chains of hotel. Despite his residual bitterness over the Malaysian government's takeover of Maybank, Khoo held fast to his Malaysian citizenship. His patriotism notwithstanding, he ceased to a Maybank director by 1976.

Still very much interested in establishing himself in banking, Khoo was undeterred by the Malaysian government's takeover of Maybank. As he was unable to set up a bank in Malaysia, he opened the National Bank of Brunei (NBB) in the 1960s. However, the NBB proved to be a rather controversial patch in Khoo's career as a banker. Similar to the Malaysian government's allegations that Khoo was pumping Maybank's money into his private firm in Singapore, the Sultanate of Brunei made comparable charges against Khoo in the mid 1980s. The Sultanate of Brunei accused Khoo of plundering the NBB, which was owned by him and his family. As an upshot, Khoo's eldest son, Khoo Ban Hock and three accomplices were arrested in November 1986 and charged with conspiring to siphon funds from the NBB. It was alleged that the NBB's financial statements were anything but 'true and fair' because over 90 per cent of a billion Brunei dollars (worth US$450 million at the time) were 'loaned' to Khoo's numerous businesses with little to no documentation.

It was expected that Khoo, whose wealth was worth more than US$1 billion during this time, would make restitution to the NBB and appease the Brunei officials. However, Khoo did not resolve the matter financially after his son was arrested. Instead, Khoo spent the next six months acquiring Standard Charted Bank shares. Although he had initially bought 5 per cent of the shares, he soon became one of the three financiers who rescued Standard Charted from a hostile takeover bid by Lloyds Bank in the UK. He did so by buying up 11.55 per cent of Standard Charted Bank, effectively making him the bank's single largest shareholder.

When the hoped for restitution did not materalise, a warrant was issued for Khoo's arrest on the even of his eldest son's trial in 1987. Despite the fact that the warrant charged him for five counts of conspiracy over the NBB allegations, Khoo fled from Australia to Korea and thence to Taiwan. His eldest son was subsequently sentenced to a prison term of four years and four months (later reduced to three years) in February 1988. In response, Khoo Teck Puat sold the Southern Pacific Hotel Corporation he had acquired in 1981 to liquidate some of his assess. With the money from the sale, he was finally able to make restitution to the Brunei government on 11 August 1988 without ever being taken into custody. Thus, the NBB controversy could be said to have heralded the end of Khoo's banking career.

With all the money he had amassed throughout the years as an influential business and hotel magnate, he established the Khoo Foundation with $20 million in 1981 to aid his philanthropic endeavours. In order to assist the less fortunate of society, especially a society in which he achieved tremendous success, Khoo and his foundation donated over $10 million to charity so as to benefit, the elderly, the disabled and disadvantaged children. To commemorate all that he done for society and to continue to promote his memory as a philanthropist, the Khoo Teck Puat Hospital opened in Yishun in 2010.

At the age of 87, Khoo succumbed to a heart attack and is survived by fourteen children. Following his death on 21 February 2004, the family moved to sell their stake in Standard Charted for US$4 billion to Dover Investments, a subsidiary of Temasek Holdings.

Khun Sa

(张奇夫, Zhang Qifu, 1933–2007)
Liberation fighter, drug warlord of the Golden Triangle, Myanmar

Khun Sa was the infamous Burmese warlord, also dubbed the "Opium King" of the Golden Triangle, which covers parts of Myanmar (Burma), Laos, Vietnam, Thailand, and Yunnan. He became the leader of the Shan United Army after expanding his army and conspicuously fought for the autonomy of the Shan from the Burmese Government while trading in drug. Later in his life, he managed to avoid being extradited to the United States, and lived peacefully in the Rangoon area with substantial business investments.

As a young man in his early thirties, U Khun Sa was already in command of a rebel armed group comprising about 800 men who had broken away from the Kuomintang (KMT) army. Based in the Shan State of Burma, the armed group was funded by money from the production and sale of drugs to support U Khun Sa's fight for an independent Shan State, one of the most populous ethnic states in Burma.

By 1996, when U Khun Sa surrendered to the Burmese authorities in exchange for his freedom and rights to live a free life in Rangoon, his Mong Tai Army (MTA) was reported to have as many as 20,000 fighters armed with modern military equipment. The villages situated in his territories were reported to be equipped with modern amenities and state-of-the-art facilities such as satellites and computers. There were also schools for children. The MTA had traded goods and services freely on the Thai market without any problems until the early 1990s. U Khun Sa was a counterpart of Lo Hsing Han, another notorious drug warlord who led a separate breakaway faction of the remnant KMT army, based in the China-Burma-Yunnan border.

In 1963, the Ne Win government introduced the Ka Kwe Ye programme, which allowed the creation of local militias in the territories bordering China, Burma, and Thailand, to fight insurgents. In return for such services, they were allowed to rule the areas without intervention. However, instead of countering insurgency, most of the militias became actively involved in the lucrative opium trade.

On 20 October 1969, U Khun Sa was captured by the Burmese authorities and sent to Mandalay Prison. On 16 April 1973, his trusted aide, Charlie Yang, mounted an operation to kidnap two Russian doctors working in Taungyi and demanded the release of U Khun Sa. The negotiation was successful, and by 1977, U Khun Sa was already in control of the Shan United Army, which later merged with other militia factions to form the MTA, which became notorious for its production of opium and other drugs. U Khun Sa, nicknamed the "Opium King", attracted international attention. In 1995, the MTA was reported to be involved in the production of yaba, methamphetamines.

On 16 April 1977, U Khun Sa met with Joseph Nellis, an aide to Congressman Lester Wolff, chairman of the U.S. House Select Committee on Narcotics, to work out a "Six-Year Plan" to eradicate the production of opium in exchange for immunity from prosecution. The plan was, however, rejected by then US President Jimmy Carter.

For more than two decades, the MTA and the Myanmar army reportedly engaged in several fierce battles, but U Khun Sa proved to be a difficult opponent. In 1996, however, he decided to surrender to the Myanmar Government. After his surrender, the MTA fragmented into various factions and some yaba producers moved deeper into the Wa region and Kokang areas.

When U Khun Sa first signed the agreement to surrender his MTA to the military government of Myanmar on 7 January 1996, it took everybody by surprise. He reportedly invited the Burmese authorities to his headquarters in Ho Mong near the Thai border, where entry was possible only after fierce battles. Apart from this, the agreement he signed ensured that he could live safely and luxuriously in Yangon under the protection of the government.

In a test of wills, the Government of the United States of America requested the Myanmese Government to extradite U Khun Sa to face charges of drug trafficking in the United States. Myanmar turned down the request, saying that U Khun Sa had not violated his 1996 surrender agreement, which included a promise that if he ended his insurgency and retired from the drug trade, which he did, he would be allowed to live under the protection of the Government of Myanmar and be allowed to conduct legitimate business.

U Khun Sa was born on 17 February 1933 in Shan State. His father was a Chinese from Sichuan Province in China, and his mother was from the Shan State, reportedly a Shan princess by descent. She named him Khun Sa, meaning "Prosperous Prince". U Khun Sa passed away on 26 October 2007 in Yangon at the age of seventy-three. Reports said that he had suffered from diabetes, partial paralysis, and high blood pressure. Khuensai Jaiyen, U Khun Sa's former secretary who worked with his ethnic Shan minority guerrilla groups, confirmed the death of his boss. A Myanmar official in Yangon also confirmed his death. He was cremated and buried at Yay Way cemetery in the outskirts of Yangon.

U Khun Sa was reported to have married, but little was known or written about his family. According to one report, after he surrendered and disbanded his private army in 1996, he moved to Yangon with four young Shan women, who served as his mistresses in his retirement. His three daughters and five sons were allowed to do business in Myanmar. His favourate son runs a hotel with a casino near the Myanmar-Thai border town of Tachilaik, while one of his daughters has a well established business in Mandalay.

Kim Beng

(金明, Jin Ming, 1914–99)
Buddhist leader, educationist, Malaysia

Kim Beng was a leader of the Buddhist circle in Malaysia and an educationist. His biggest contribution was initiating the establishment of the Malaysian Buddhist Association (MBA, formed in 1959) during the period when Malaysia was fighting for independence. He led the MBA for twenty-four years (from 1974–95) after the first president, Reverend Zhu Mo, stepped down. In 1982, he also proposed the setting up of Malaysian Consultative Council of Buddhism, Christianity, Hinduism, and Sikhism (MCCBCHS) to promote unity and harmony among the non-Islamic communities. Furthermore, he proposed to form the Malaysian Buddhist Sangha Association (MBSA) in 1994. Other than playing the role of a religious leader, Kim Beng was also an educationalist. In 1951, he established Siang Lin School (香林小学) in Malacca, the only Buddhist school in southern Peninsular Malaysia. This school became one of the mainstream government Chinese primary schools after the independence of Malaya. However, its most unique characteristic lies in its listing of Buddhist education as one of the compulsory subjects.

Kim Beng was born on 7 January 1914 to the Zheng family of Qiu Lu Dong Zhang Tian Cuo (秋芦东张田厝) in Putian (莆田) County, Fujian Province, China. His original name was Zheng Qingquan (郑清泉) and he was the only son of the family. His mother raised him after his father passed away when he was still very young. Though living a poor and hard life, his mother still let him attend a traditional private school to learn the classic texts. This laid the foundation of his knowledge and education. Having a mother who was a staunch Buddhist, the young boy had the opportunity to frequent the temple to pay respect to the Buddha and get acquainted with benevolent people. When he grew up, he started to study the Buddhist scriptures. He was deeply moved by Buddha's compassion in helping all beings and when he realized that Buddhism was the ultimate truth in life, he resolutely renounced the worldly life to become a monk. In 1931, Zheng Qingquan who was only seventeen years old went to Fu Qing Temple (福清禅寺) of Guishan (龟山), Putian to be tonsured by Reverend Xianglin (香林法师). Not long after that, he followed Reverend Ding Guang (定光法师) to Malacca's Cheng Hoon Teng Temple to perform religious duties. Other than returning to his hometown in 1938 for his initiation ceremony into monkhood, he was in Malaya most of the time. In 1945, he established the Siang Lin Chiao Yuen Temple (香林觉苑) in Malacca and was the abbot until 1998.

Kim Beng was a very inquisitive and meticulous monk in whatever he did. He would think through every matter thoroughly and grasp all details before putting it into action and was willing to give many ideas a try. He once studied the Buddhism thoughts of Hetuvidya (因明) and Vijnaptimatra (唯识) under Reverend Ci Hang (慈航法师). The study of Hetuvidya emphasized the clear distinction between right and wrong, ensuring that reality matched what was advocated. Hence this study very much correlated with his strong inquisitiveness and insistence on a clear understanding of any matter. This strength of his helped him tremendously when he dealt and debated with officials when fighting the rights of Buddhists. For example, he proposed to include Buddhism Studies in mainstream education when he founded Siang Lin School in Malacca (1951). However, he faced objections from the government officials for this. He fought and argued strongly on just grounds, quoting the clauses on freedom to practise one's own religion from the Constitution until finally Buddhism Studies was allowed to be taught as one of the mainstream subjects. Other than this, Kim Beng proposed the setting up of the MBA in 1959, fought to have Vesak Day made a public holiday, opposed the Education Department's instruction to force all school pupils to perform prayers the Islamic way, protested against the local screening of films that insulted Buddhism, formed the non-Islamic interfaith religious council of four main religions, MCCBCHS in Malaysia (formed in 1983), established the MBSA (formed in 1995), etc. All these contributions in defending the rights of Buddhists and non-Muslims were closely related to his education background and his attitude in handling matters seriously.

Other than defending the rights of Malaysian Buddhists and non-Muslims, another of his obvious contribution was his promotion of Buddhist and Chinese education. In terms of Buddhist education, he played more than the role of a Buddhist monk. A noteworthy contribution from him is the series of books on The True Meaning of Yu Lan Pen (Ullambana) (盂兰盆) (Hungry Ghost Festival) which he edited in 1987, as well as the essay competition on "Understanding The True Meaning of Yu Lan Pen" that he organized. Kim Beng attempted to educate the public through this competition to help them understand the real meaning of Yu Lan Pen so as to propagate filial piety and also revolutionize Buddhist ceremonies and simplify the folk custom of celebrating the Festival of the Dead Spirits during the seventh month of the lunar calendar in an extravagant and wasteful manner (most people mistake the Buddhist Yu Lan Festival for the Taoist Festival of the Dead Spirits and think of them as one). The campaign to revolutionize this folk custom continued until the year 2000.

Another matter worth mentioning is his contribution to Chinese education. After establishing Siang Lin Chinese Primary School in 1951, Kim Beng personally saw to all matters — whether human resource or infrastructure — pertaining to the school's development. Since the unique feature of this school was the Buddhism course taught as part of the compulsory curriculum, Reverend Kim Beng personally wrote ten textbooks and teaching aids for the use of pupils from Year 2 to Year 6. Moreover, he became the teacher of the Buddhism subject, teaching it for over thirty years. A decade after Siang Lin School was established, it became one of the most prestigious schools in Malacca. When the school opened for enrolment, all places would be snatched within two hours by parents who wanted to send their children to this school. As for the infrastructure, from the construction of the first school building in 1959 to the second phase in 1960, and then the expansion work of the school buildings in 1994 until the completion of the new school building in 1997, Kim Beng was zealously involved in every detail, from planning, fund raising to monitoring the construction. In 1961 he also founded Siang Lin Kindergarten. He once proposed the two key principles of Siang Lin Education, viz. "Mandarin must be used as the medium of instruction" and "Promoting education that imparts morality and virtues in people's hearts". In 1997, Kim Beng was awarded with the highest honorary award in the Chinese education circle, namely the Lim Lian Geok Spirit Award (林连玉精神奖), because of his contribution to Chinese education.

It is believed that Reverend Kim Beng's personal traits of attending to matters thoroughly and adhering to his principles firmly were the driving force behind his remarkable contributions and achievements. More importantly, he was willing to try anything worthwhile and meaningful. He once uttered these words of wisdom, "Since ancient times, success comes from trying".

To commemorate and commend Kim Beng upon his contribution towards religion and education, the Malacca state government, under the proposal of Malaysian Chinese Association, has named one of the streets in the city as "Jalan Rev Seet Kim Beng" on 11 Jan 2010. This is the first ever street in Malaysia that is named after a Buddhist monk.

King, Angelo A.

(龚诗贮, Gong Shizhu, 1926–)
Businessman, philanthropist, Philippines

Although Angelo King is a man of many business enterprises, he is more known for his philanthropic endeavours. His passion lies with farmers and their plight — that they are working in one of the noblest professions, but cannot even live decent lives. He set up farmers' centres all over the country for training, dialogues, and conferences. His Angelo King Building Fund supports cooperatives nationwide through the building of multipurpose centres, and training and technology-livelihood centres. In partnership with the Philippine Business for Social Progress, King has funded the construction of more than 147 building projects, serving about 92,240 landless rural workers, fisherfolk, marginal upland farmers, urban poor, and indigenous groups all over the country.

Angelo King, a low-profile, unassuming Chinese-Filipino philanthropist, believes true philanthropy helps others help themselves. His foundation, the Angelo King Foundation Inc., in existence for the past three decades, is testimony that he is right.

Born on 11 November 1926 in Binondo, Manila, Angelo King is the third child of King Su and Ang Tiu Ong, who migrated from Xiamen, China, to the Philippines. During the American occupation of the Philippines, he went to the Chinese Republican School, a private school in Manila, and attended secondary school at Chiang-Kai Shek College, where he learned and imbibed Confucian ethics and formed Christian values.

The Confucian proverb "teach them how to fish" was reinforced in him in his own home by the example of his mother. "I would see mother helping our relatives who were in need. The little, simple things. Those were deeply engraved in my mind," he recounts.

King helped his parents with their glass business which closed shop when World War II broke out. Not wanting to be idle and being a voracious reader, he bought second-hand books, devoured them, and loaned them or sold them in a small book shop he set up. He also sold komiks (vernacular for comics in the Philippines) and sundry reading materials that sold like hot cakes. At the end of the day, he would count his coins and keep track of his earnings in a small notebook. This was his baptism of fire into the world of commerce.

When the war was over, he went back to finish secondary school. At age nineteen, he was offered a scholarship at the Mapua Institute of Technology and enrolled in an electrical engineering course. However, being young and restless, he quit university and started his own glass business named Pacific Glass Company. A client he is proud to mention is the De La Salle University, which acquired a six-hectare lot in Ortigas Avenue in Mandaluyong City in the early 1950s. Pacific Glass Company supplied the glass materials during its construction. Propelled by early success, he ventured into finance, insurance, trading, real estate, and hotel business.

At one he time he earned the moniker, "Motel King of the Philippines", for operating Anito Lodge, and Victoria Court, popular motel in the country. Years later he relinquished control of his motel business to his sons, Archimedes and Wyden King. Wyden later decided to diversify into the hotel business.

Despite the success of his flourishing businesses, King felt there was something else he wanted to do. In 1961, he joined the Philippine Jaycees (now known as the Junior Chamber International), a network of young dedicated citizens who aimed to make a positive change. He was elected chapter president of the Capitol Jaycees. This opened his eyes to public service and awakened his spirit of reaching out to the less privileged.

Eager to implement ideas he deemed beneficial for the organization, he thought of running for national presidency on the encouragement of his fellows Jaycees. He had been at first reluctant knowing that there could be possible conflict of interests and time management issues between his own business matters and the organization's demands. However, he later chose to trust his instincts, confident that he could put things under his control.

When he was elected as the seventeenth national president of Jaycees in 1965, he marked history by becoming the first Chinese-Filipino president of the organization. During his term, community service became its priority focus. His presidential theme was aptly titled, "Youth for Nation Building", to make the Jaycees relevant to the changing times. To this end, the constitution and by-laws were amended to streamline national operations. The Philippine Jaycees participated in a crusade against violence and took a greater leap when it launched the "World Tensions" project that prodded Asian Jaycees to discuss peace in the region. The first ever "Jaycee Week" was launched during the National Convention in Iloilo.

King initiated projects such as "Community Self-Help" and "Playland", among other things. His plan was to let an idea take root in the minds of the members of the community and encourage them to take over the projects started by the Jaycees.

With him at the helm, the Jaycees increased its membership and became active in projects pertaining to economic development and business enhancement. He insisted that the Jaycees should not limit their activities to civic projects, but should also extend assistance, either in the form of material help or legal aid, to unjustly persecuted citizens who have no means to defend themselves.

After his active years with Jaycees, he put up the "K" — Anonymous Scholarship Fund, his first institutional project, which is a programme for academically deserving and needy students enrolled at the Silliman University in Dumaguete City. Continuing his momentum, he organized the Angelo King Foundation (AKF) Inc. on 20 September 1978, with the help of former Ambassador Bienvenido A. Tan, Jr., the first person who helped, and brainstormed with him in conceptualizing the foundation and setting it up formally.

The AKF provides opportunities for empowerment, self-reliance, and excellence in the areas of community development, education and culture, health and spiritual matters, through collaborative efforts with non-governmental organizations, partner organizations, and civil society groups. Unlike operational foundations, the AKF leaves project management and implementation to partners, but provides financial assistance so existing organizations will maximize their resources and tap their expertise.

Since its establishment, the AKF has engaged in more than 400 projects. Among its first projects were the construction of the Don Kingsu-St Martin de Porres Charity Hospital building, its foremost infrastructure project, and a microbiology laboratory in 1980, and the Chiang Kai Shek Teachers Welfare Fund in 1981.

When former Secretary of Agriculture Ernesto Garilao met Angelo King, he showed King the plight of the farmers and introduced him to a farmer's centre in Calauan, Laguna. This gave King the idea of installing farmers' centres all over the country for training, dialogues and conferences. In 1991, a partnership between the AKF and the Philippine Business for Social Progress (PBSP), which has become the foundation's most active major partner, was formed.

The partnership's projects support cooperatives nationwide through the building of multipurpose centres, and training and technology-livelihood centres. The first project was the Minoyan Farmers' Multipurpose Center in Bukidnon. According to Ester Asuit, executive director of AKF, King was the first to use the term "multipurpose centres" in the Philippines.

Under the PBSP banner, King has funded the construction of more than 147 building projects which serve 92,240 landless rural workers, fisherfolk, marginal upland farmers, urban poor, and indigenous groups all over the country.

More significant than King's financial largess is his cultural rootedness. Humbled by his beginnings and the plight of his immigrant parents, he involved himself in a project spearheaded by the Peking University in China. This project produced the twelve-volume Chinese Overseas Encyclopedia documenting the migration of Chinese to other parts of the world, and is the result of the collaborative efforts of seventy scholars from premier schools in China, international research consultants, and the Peking University. He also provided a research fund for the publication of books on the Chinese overseas. In recognition of his support, he was accorded the honour of being its only Filipino adviser. He shares this honour with, and acknowledges Go Bon Juan, who helped make this possible.

Another display of his cultural rootedness is his support for Kaisa Para sa Kaunlaran Inc., a Chinese-Filipino non-governmental organization. He provided the seed money for the construction of the only Chinese-Filipino Cultural Center, which was completed with the support of other Chinese-Filipinos, and inaugurated on 19 January 1999. This cultural centre known as the Kaisa-Angelo King Heritage Center, in Intramuros, Manila, houses the Bahay Tsinoy, the museum of Chinese in Philippine life, the Chinben See Memorial Library, and a research and data bank of artefacts and materials on Chinese life and prominent Chinese-Filipinos in the country.

Ko Kwat Tiong

(Mohamad Saleh, 高厥忠, Gao Juezhong, 1897–1970)

Politician, leading lawyer, Indonesia

Ko Kwat Tiong was a leader of the PTI (Partai Tionghoa Indonesia) who replaced Liem Koen Hian as president in 1934. The following year he was elected as one of the Chinese representatives in the Volksraad (Dutch sponsored "People's Council") and became involved in pre-World War II Indonesian politics.

Ko was born on 4 August 1897, the second son of Peranakan's Lieutenant, Ko Djie Soen, who was the son of Hokkien immigrant Ko Tai Tek. Ko Kwat Tiong was hence a third generation Peranakan. He was brought up by his fifteen-year-older brother, Ko Kwat Ie, who would become the founder of a cigar factory and one of the initiators of the Tiong Hoa Hwe Koan movement in Magelang in Central Java. The young Ko was educated first at ELS (elementary school for Europeans) in Magelang. He was later sent to HBS (Dutch secondary school) in Semarang where he founded a Western style club, Djien Gie Lee Tie Sien, named after the five pillars of Confucian ethics (仁义礼智信). It should be noted that Ko was not proficient in the Chinese language as he studied Chinese classics through Western languages.

Ko's plan to continue his studies in Europe was postponed because of the outbreak of World War I. He worked for several years in Yogyakarta, first as an editor of the Chinese-Malay daily, Palita, and later as a staff member of the Escompto Bank and in a post-office. In his Yogyakarta days Ko tried to form an organization named Centrale Vereeniging Tionghoa, but without much success.

In 1920 Ko left the Indies with his first wife, Lie Giok Ing, for the Netherlands to study law at Leiden University where he obtained an MR (Meester in de Rechten) degree in 1926. He was probably one of the first Chinese from the Dutch East Indies to obtain this degree that allowed the holder to practise as a lawyer. During his stay in the Netherlands, he joined the Chung Hwa Hui Nederland where he associated with the Peranakan Chinese elites. At the same time he mixed with indigenous Indonesian students, especially those who studied law at Leiden such as Sartono, Sastromulyono, Besar, Suyudi, Sunaryo, and others who would become leading nationalist leaders in the Partai Nasional Indonesia (PNI).

After his return to Java, Ko opened a number of law offices in Semarang and a few other cities. He and his nephew, Ko Tjay Sing, also a Leiden-educated lawyer, shared an office with the indigenous lawyers mentioned above. It thus seemed natural that they had an in-depth understanding of, and sympathy for, the Indonesian nationalist movement.

However, their association with the indigenous nationalists was limited to the individual level. At the organizational level, both Ko and his nephew were closer to the Chinese community-based organizations. When Chung Hwa Hui (CHH) was established in 1928, Kwat Tiong joined the organization, perhaps due partly to its continued commitment to CHH Nederland of which he was a member, and partly because of CHH's orientation, as it regarded the Indies, not China, as the homeland of the Peranakans. When it became clear that CHH, under the leadership of Kan Hok Hoei, represented the interests of Chinese entrepreneurs and was overly loyal to the Dutch colonial rule, Ko and other Peranakan leaders such as Liem Koen Hian and Ong Liang Kok left the organization.

When Liem founded Partai Tionghoa Indonesia (PTI) in Surabaya on 25 September 1932, Ko responded quickly. He, together with Ko Tjay Sing and some journalists in Central Java set up a Semarang branch on 9 October. Ko Kwat Tiong became the chairman and Ko Tjay Sing, the secretary.

After the founding of the Semarang branch, PTI changed its membership policy.

It opened its door not only to local-born Peranakans, but also to foreign-born Totoks. The change was made as a result of Ko Kwat Tiong's insistence that there should not be any discrimination among Indonesian Chinese. Liem Koen Hian was not happy with the change as he believed that Peranakans should be distinguished from Totoks, and the distinction by birth would enable Peranakans to be united with their homeland, Indonesia. But at this stage Liem agreed to compromise with Ko. There were actually very few Totoks, if any, who had joined PTI.

In 1934 Ko Kwat Tiong became the second president of PTI after Liem Koen Hian had resigned from the post to study at the Law School in Batavia. In the elections of the Volksraad the following year Ko won one of the four seats allotted to the Chinese community. During the four years of his term in the council Ko worked hard to promote equality in law for all races, especially with regard to the rights of the labourer. Also, together with indigenous and Arab Indonesians, he took part in submitting the Sutarjo Petition in 1936, which became the highlight of his political life. Ko, as one of six signatories of the petition, made a speech on 19 September 1936, arguing for autonomy for the Indies within the framework of the Dutch Kingdom. But the petition was ignored for a long time and eventually rejected by the Dutch Government in 1938.

Ko's involvement in the Sutarjo Petition and his speeches in Volksraad reflected his rather conservative stand in promoting associatie (association) politics, as opposed to Anti-Dutch and non-cooperative nationalism. His stance seemed to widen a gap between him and PTI's Surabaya group consisting of Liem Koen Hian, Tjoa Sik Ien, and Tan Ling Djie, all of whom were leaning towards socialism or even communism. On the eve of the 1939 elections of the Volksraad, conflict erupted between Liem and Ko, resulting in the expulsion of Ko from the party.

Ko had actually been a freemason since the colonial period. The tenets of this organization — among them, "fraternity of all mankind" — coincided with Ko's belief in "all men are brothers". He was also a committed member of the Theosophical Society, which professed to uphold the universal value of uniting people of different races, nations, religions, etc.

After Indonesia became independent in 1945, Ko worked for a long time as head of Central Java's Provincial Office for Property Inheritance under the Department of Justice. He also joined the PNI (Indonesian Nationalist Party) after World War II, but was not an active member.

After the war Ko underwent certain changes in his private life. Around 1947 he changed his Chinese name to Mohamad Saleh as a result of his second marriage to his former secretary, a Sundanese Muslim woman named Roemini, after his first wife passed away due to illness. His conversion to Islam might not have been just a nominal one as he also became a member of Muhammadiyah, an Islamic organization. Although Ko became a Muslim and changed his name, he never took the initiative to join in the assimilation movement.

After retiring from the Office for Property Inheritance around 1960, Ko taught law at several local universities including Diponegoro University (UNDIP), Semarang. He passed away in Semarang on 17 June 1970 and was buried in Magelang with the epitaph, "Mohamad Saleh (Mr. Ko Kwat Tiong)". In 1993 his grave was moved to Semarang by Untung Sapari (Ko Hian Oen) the only son he had with Roemini.

Koa Chun Tee

(柯俊智, Ke Junzhi, 1907–86)

Businessman, newspaperman, community leader, Philippines

Koa Chun Tee was one of the respected elders of the Chinese-Filipino community at a time of great difficulties. In 1954, at the height of post-Independence Philippine nationalism, the community was faced with anti-Chinese discrimination and a series of Filipinization measures that made everyday life difficult and curtailed normal business activities. Koa was one of the advocates behind the formation of the Federation of Filipino-Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry in order to unite the community and have a stronger voice and representation with the Philippine Government. He was an active member of the Kuomintang Party (KMT, 国民党) and had strong ties with Taiwan throughout his life, which was acknowledged and instrumental in paving smooth, cordial, and mutually beneficial relations between the Philippines and China/Taiwan.

Koa was a workaholic and people who worked with him had to match his long working hours. He was able to train many youngsters to appreciate the value of hard work, and see that time is gold. He was a simple man in terms of his lifestyle. As he was known to be fair and discerning, he was much sought after by fellow Chinese to act as mediator and settle disputes. His intercessions were always happily accepted by both sides and no conflict or antagonism remained afterwards. His house was open to everyone, rich or poor, weak or influential, and he never turned away anyone as long as he was in a position to render assistance.

Koa was born in 1907 in Fujian, Jinjiang in Yinglin (英林), Xiakekeng (下柯坑). His father died before he was born, and he was raised entirely by the widowed Cu Mary. He was already exceptionally talented and very studious in his youth and believed in the thoughts and teachings of Sun Yat Sen. He joined the KMT revolutionary party at the young age of seventeen, and supported Sun's efforts to push his vision of the Three Principles of the People (三民主义).

When Koa migrated to the Philippines, he first became principal of Iloilo Sun Yat Sen High School and served as secretary general of the Kuomintang Philippine General Headquarters. He founded the Great China Daily Press (《大中华日报》) and served as its chairman of the board, distributor, and publisher. He encouraged and supported many youngsters to join the KMT, and actively promoted Chinese culture and education among them. His continued membership of the KMT made him a natural bridge between the Philippines and China, which served to cement good relations between Manila and Taipei. Diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China was established in 1975.

One decade after 1975, Koa and the KMT still held sway over the Chinese-Filipino community. At the time Taiwan's influence in community affairs, especially in education and the management of different community organizations, was still quite strong. Koa was therefore an acknowledged leader in community affairs up to the time of his death on 7 August 1986.

At the outbreak of the Pacific War and as soon as the Japanese forces occupied the Philippines, Koa, together with other Chinese Filipinos, organized the Chinese Volunteers of the Philippines (CVP), an underground anti-Japanese guerilla organization for which he served as chief of staff. The CVP was among the guerilla groups to receive arms and ammunitions from the United States Armed Forces in the Far East (USAFFE) in recognition of their anti-Japanese efforts. At great risk to his life, he spied on the enemy forces and helped actively in war efforts. CVP operations accounted for a number of Japanese casualties and was conferred numerous awards by the American forces for its bravery and heroism in combat after the war.

Due to his excellent showing in the Anti-Japanese campaign, he was summoned back to Chongqing (重庆) in 1944 to meet with Chairman Chiang Kai Shek (蒋介石) and brief him on the Philippine situation and the huaqiao (华侨) guerrilla activities. While in China, he was able to skirt the areas where the Japanese centred their activities in order to return to his hometown to be reunited with his aged mother and his wife, and to visit other relatives. He had four sacks of letters to distribute to relatives and townmates in his hometown in Yinglin. Because of the disruption of communications between China and the Philippines, people were hungry for news about their loved ones suffering back home in the Philippines, and many even came from afar to see him and had to sleep in the stone courtyard outside his home. Although Koa risked being suspected by the Japanese, he did not turn away anyone who came from afar to ask about the fates of their relatives in the Philippines.

In 1949, with the defeat of the KMT, the government moved to Taiwan. When the opportunity arose, Koa organized the Chinese in the Philippines to visit Taiwan, Jinmen (金门), and Matzu (马祖) where Koa personally paid a call to the old soldiers who had moved to Taiwan from China to support and comfort them. In 1962, in another visit to Taiwan, President Chiang met with him and invited him to talk about the situation of the Chinese in the Philippines. In 1982, Koa was given an award of merit by the KMT Central Committee in gratitude for his support throughout the years.

As he was a newspaperman, teachers, directors, and principals from the provinces and suburbs always went to see him in Manila during the summer vacation. They shared with him their difficulties and their wish to remain in their positions or be reassigned elsewhere. Koa listened to them carefully and became de facto the biggest recruiter of teachers to even the most remote areas. Their high respect for him showed that they were all contented with whatever teaching position Koa had arranged for them.

It was the mid-fifties when the Chinese-Filipino community was faced with discrimination and many challenges. Philippine post-Independence nationalism translated into anti-foreign, especially anti-Chinese, policies. Filipinization measures were proposed one after another and the Chinese-Filipino community found it necessary to unite in order to face and overcome these challenges. The Great China Daily Press was one of the advocates of the need for unity, and Koa was an ardent supporter of the idea to form a federation of all businesses in order to have a stronger voice and representation with the Philippine Government. In 1954, the Federation of Filipino-Chinese Chambers of Commerce was formed and Koa was one of the crucial organizers that led to its success. In 1973, upon the declaration of martial law in the Philippines, the Great China Daily Press was merged with Kong Li Po (《公理报》) to become the United Daily News (《联合日报》).

After Kao's demise in 1986, his sons established the Koa Chuntee Cultural-Educational Foundation, to promote educational and cultural activities in the Chinese-Filipino community.

One of his sons, Koa Sun Kok, was born in 1939 in his father's hometown. Koa Sun Kok graduated with a degree in economics from the National Taiwan University and upon graduation, worked as a writer-journalist with the United Daily News, later rising from being a sub-editor to assistant publisher. Through the foundation, Kao Sun Kok has helped to publish selected literary works from literary supplements of Chinese-language dailies in a monograph titled, Feihua Wenxue (《菲华文学》), which already has five volumes. The monograph is a primary resource material for research on literary works of Chinese overseas.

Koa, Johnlu Go

(柯遵儒, Ke Zunru, 1958–)
Entrepreneur, Philippines

Koa's bakeshop, The French Baker, is a familiar sight and smell to Filipinos. Bread and pastries are part of the Filipino diet, although bakeshop goods are seen more as snacks or part of a quick breakfast. Thirty years ago, most bakeshops were limited to a few products familiar to the Filipino taste buds — loaf bread, pan de sal, monay, and ensaymada. There was hardly any middle ground between these bakery goods and expensive specialty breads found in hotels. Today, a lot of things have changed in the bakery business — thanks to new techniques and skills, innovations, and equipment. These have opened up new possibilities and opportunities for growth.

Koa's vision is rooted in his formative years and early family life in Manila's Chinatown, Binondo. He was born on 18 April 1958, and in the early 1950s, his father, Raymundo, pioneered shirt manufacturing, and his mother, Cristina, opened a Chinese casual dining restaurant, Yamy House, in 1971. Like most Chinese families, his parents trained and exposed him to business practices at an early age by buying him toys that he would sell to his neighbourhood friends and classmates. On completion of his secondary education at Xavier School, Koa continued to help his mother run her restaurant, and also sold dried mangoes produced by his cousins in Cebu to various establishments such as Mercury Drugstore. He did all this throughout his university days, and earned a bachelor's degree in business administration from the University of the Philippines in 1979, and a master's in business administration from the same university in 1984. Koa received further preparation and training for entrepreneurship by accepting an assistant professorship at his alma mater. He taught at the College of Business Administration from 1980 to 1995, and was appointed college secretary from 1984 to 1990 at the young age of twenty-five. Koa kept this post till 1990. He has said that his career in the academe taught him how to handle responsibility and pressure in a large organization with many people from diverse backgrounds.

While teaching, Koa borrowed 50,000 pesos from his father, and fulfilled his parents' long-time wish of opening a bakeshop, named Honey Bread. Taking advantage of the flexible working hours afforded to him by the university, he ran Honey Bread and gained valuable practical management experience. The bakeshop made and sold typical Philippine bakery fare such as pan de sal, hamburger buns and hotdog buns. His parents' suggestion that he go into bakery later grew into a passion with him. However, as he lacked formal qualifications in the culinary field, Koa dedicated himself to technical training in baking. The Center for the Culinary Arts recognized his hard work and dedication by awarding him an Honorary Chef Degree in 1994.

Honey Bread became the experimental laboratory for what The French Baker would become later on. Initially rejected as a caterer for the Manila Electric Company (Meralco) canteen, Koa shifted gears and proposed to provide goods for the "graveyard shift" linesmen. Meralco approved his idea and appointed him as supplier. Soon afterwards, Koa became a one-man bakery — baking, selling, and delivering his wares to other "graveyard shift" workers in other companies. He also began the constant practice of business innovation by guaranteeing fresher breads than his competition through twice-daily deliveries to his supermarket clients. His business decision to service the work shift that no one else wanted — thereby guaranteeing him virtually no competition — paid off. The late hours and early mornings earned him a comfortable living.

The radical shift in his outlook towards the Philippine baking industry was sparked after Koa's two-month backpacking trip to Europe in 1985. In Paris, Koa began a love affair with French baguettes that later blossomed to include other bakery fare from other European countries. The long lines and high sales volumes at bakery-cum-fast food outlets in Singapore and Hong Kong malls also showed Koa the possibility of this eatery concept being introduced and sustained in the Philippines.

After an invitation from Shoemart tycoon Henry Sy to open "something new" at SM City, Koa borrowed two million pesos from his parents, and opened The French Baker in September 1989, against an unstable political climate marked by the numerous coup d'état attempts against President Corazon Aquino's government. In just a year, he was able to pay his parents back, and sustained a steady growth thereafter, with more than thirty outlets nationwide to date. The French Baker introduced many innovations that other food establishments have since adopted. This bakery-restaurant assured patrons of hygiene and sanitation by showing customers that all servers wore gloves and hairnets. All baked goods are lined up in pretty rows, instead of being covered in plastic wrap and bunched together in a glass case. Food items, previously unknown to Filipinos, such as baguettes, croissants, Danish pastries, fruit tarts, quiches, would be wheeled out of the oven and placed neatly on shelves in full view of customers, who are thus assured of their freshness. According to Koa, "I was also the first to allow customers to make their own selections by providing clean trays and a pair of tongs." In 1991, Koa combined the fast food restaurant concept with the bakery by launching The French Baker's quick service restaurants, where menu items are prepared hot and fresh from what was available in the store. He also listened to a customer's suggestion to adopt the American practice of selling his breads at half price half an hour before closing time.

What separates Koa from other entrepreneurs is that he saw and realized a potential business market that no one else did, and in effect, created his own market that initially had no competition. In 2008, Koa was commended for practising the Blue Ocean Strategy sixteen years ahead of anyone else in the country. Koa adds that what separates The French Baker from its competitors is, "[the company's] willingness to keep on improving ourselves. We constantly challenge our system to anticipate for shortcomings in the future". He is an inspiration to what an entrepreneur can learn and achieve with a trailblazing, risk taking, and pioneering spirit.

Even after Koa resigned from university and put on his baking hat full time, he never really quit teaching. He generously shares his knowledge about baking and the baking industry with smaller bakers, and also provides his insights into entrepreneurship development in the country as a resource speaker in countless engagements. After thirty years in the business, Koa says, "I am very privileged to have started my business by CHOICE and not by Chance or by Circumstance or Crisis. Being an entrepreneur may be all about taking risks, but one should not forget that in so doing, it's also all about improving other people's lives which we call our Primary Target Market."

Koh Thong Bee, Tommy

(许通美, Xu Tongmei, 1937–)

Lawyer, academic, diplomat, intellectual, Singapore

Professor Tommy Koh is arguably Singapore's best known diplomat, negotiator, and intellectual. A key player in Singapore's relatively high profile in international diplomacy, Koh represents the intellectual, cultural, and diplomatic soft power that Singapore has aspired towards as an active member of the international community. Known affectionately as Tommy,

Koh's impressive credentials, charming wit, humility, and his infectious joie de vivre make him a contemporary Renaissance man always striving for the betterment of society.

Born on 12 November 1937, Koh is the eldest of three sons born to Koh Han Kok and See Tsai Ying. Educated at the prestigious Raffles Institution (RI) (1952–57), Koh honed his leadership and people skills through an extremely active extra-curricular life. He was a school prefect, a scout patrol leader, school badminton player, and president of the literary and debating club. After RI, he proceeded to pursue a Bachelor of Laws (LLB) degree at the University of Malaya in Singapore where he was a member of the pioneer class of twenty-two law students in Malaya and Singapore. Koh topped his class and was the only law first class honours recipient that year (1961).

Koh practised law briefly with David Saul Marshall, Singapore's former (and first) chief minister, before opting for an academic career with his alma mater in 1962. He earned a Master's degree in law from the Harvard Law School (1964) and a diploma in criminology from the University of Cambridge (1965). At age 30, Koh was, in his own words, "borrowed by the Government" to serve the nation in its pioneer cohort of diplomats. Between 1968 and 1971, he was Singapore's first resident permanent representative to the United Nations in New York (and concurrently accredited to Canada).

When Singapore gained independence abruptly in August 1965, Koh and his colleagues at the newly formed foreign ministry were given the heavy responsibility of securing diplomatic recognition of the fledgling nation state and enhancing Singapore's standing and reputation in the international arena. Although Koh had neither training nor experience in diplomacy, his intellectual ability, cultural nous, and charming personality enabled him to execute the onerous task with aplomb and excellence. He also served a second stint at the United Nations between 1974 and 1984 (with concurrent accreditations to Canada and Mexico).

Although Koh was on leave from the university, his colleagues elected him dean of the Faculty of Law (1971–74). By all accounts, Koh was a well loved dean who lived on the university campus with his family and he knew all the law undergraduates by name. In 1978, Koh became the first local graduate to be made a full professor by the University of Singapore.

At the United Nations, Koh was untiring in lobbying Singapore's and the Association of Southeast Asian Nation's (ASEAN) cause and efforts between 1979 and 1991 to win overwhelming international support for the ASEAN's efforts to resolve the occupation of Kampuchea (now Cambodia) by communist Vietnam. ASEAN's eventual diplomatic triumph brought tangible benefits to it as a regional organization and peace to the troubled Indochina region. Cambodia and Vietnam are now full-fledged members of ASEAN.

After his second stint at the United Nations, Koh was appointed Singapore's ambassador to the United States between 1984 and 1990. Since 1990, he has been ambassador-at-large, leading many successful negotiations for Singapore, including the establishment of diplomatic relations between China and Singapore (1990), and the United States-Singapore Free Trade Area agreement (2003) — the first free trade agreement between the United States and an Asian country.

What enabled Koh to thrive and excel in the diplomatic arena is his principled and friendly approach in the interest of bilateral and international comity. Koh's diplomatic endeavours underline his belief that "size is not destiny". Indeed, Koh's own dynamic career in diplomacy exemplifies this very belief that small states, through individual and collective action and a principled adherence to international law and norms, can play a contributory role in the international community.

Koh is not just an adroit practitioner in diplomacy at the bilateral level. He is also well versed in the art and practice of diplomatic craft and negotiation at the multilateral level, engaging with characteristic calm, foresight, and empathy for the various stakeholders and perspectives in contentious issues. His affable, warm personality, complemented by emotional and cultural intelligence, are often tapped to good effect in the international fora for various multilateral negotiations on critical issues, such as international law, the environment, and conflict resolution.

These positive personal qualities are bolstered by Koh's steadfast belief in and advocacy of the international rule of law, dialogue and cooperation, and dispute resolution incorporating mutual accommodation as the bedrock of international comity. In particular, Koh is a well regarded "bridge-builder", especially on issues that have the sharp edge of the North-South divide.

Koh was president of the third U.N. Conference on the Law of the Sea between 1980 and 1982. He oversaw the last and most critical leg of negotiations that had begun in the mid-1970s and successfully brokered consensus and agreement which saw the Convention on the Law of the Sea (UNCLOS) coming into force in 1994. The landmark Convention not only codified existing international law but also created a new legal order covering all major aspects of the uses and resources of ocean space and embraced innovative concepts such as exclusive economic zones.

Another facet of Koh's contributions to the international committee is his passionate commitment to sustainable development. Koh chaired both the preparatory and main committee of the U.N. Conference on Environment and Development (1990–97). At the Rio Earth Summit in June 1992, the Framework Convention on Climate Change was signed and subsequently ratified. This Framework Convention had set the stage for further discussion and agreement on the environmental challenges facing the international community, including the emission of greenhouse gases (Kyoto Protocol 1997).

Between 1993 and 1995, the U.N. secretary general appointed him to the High-Level Advisory Board on Sustainable Development. Even in the early 1980s, Koh's concerns and ideas for the environment were progressive and prescient. In 2006, Koh was presented with the "Champions of the Earth" award by the United Nations Environment Programme.

In 1993, Koh was the U.N. secretary general's special envoy to the Russian Federation, Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia tasked with the withdrawal of Russian military forces from the Baltic States, which were once part of the Soviet Union, and the welfare of Russians who had settled in those three countries. He was also a member of three World Trade Organization dispute resolution panels, two of which as chairman.

Koh's ability, talent, and commitment to institution building have resulted in his being much sought after to spearhead the implementation of novel ideas and institutions. For instance, between 1997 and 2000, he was elected the inaugural executive director of the Asia-Europe Foundation (ASEF), a partnership organization created under the auspice of the Asia-Europe Meeting (ASEM) process. ASEF seeks to promote mutual understanding, deeper engagement, and continuing collaboration among the people of Asia and Europe through greater intellectual, cultural, and people-to-people exchanges.

More recently, Koh was Singapore's representative to the ASEAN High-Level Task Force (HLTF) to draft the ASEAN Charter. He chaired the HLTF from August to November 2007 and played the leading role in consensus- and confidence-building in the ASEAN Charter drafting process. The ASEAN Charter provides the legal and institutional framework for the ten-member ASEAN and seeks to catalyze the creation of an ASEAN Community.

Koh's manifold contributions and talent are not confined to only diplomacy and the law. Ever since he returned to Singapore in 1990, Koh has served in various capacities, leveraging on his love for arts and heritage, his public policy experience, and his appreciation of the diverse cultures that are part and parcel of Singapore's potpourri. Koh was the founding chairman of Singapore's National Arts Council (NAC), a statutory board tasked with the development of a vibrant arts sector that is accessible to all Singaporeans, between 1991 and 1996. Between 2002 and 2011, Koh was chairman of Singapore's National Heritage Board (NHB) which aims to develop Singapore's vibrant cultural and heritage sector.

Given his vast experience in the policy arena and academia, Koh served two stints as the director of Singapore's Institute of Policy Studies (1990–97 and 2000–04) before becoming its chairman and then special adviser. Between 1991 and 1992, he chaired Singapore's Censorship Review Committee, which recommended an enlightened and principled approach to censorship in a global city state that still held fast to its traditional norms and values. From 2000 to 2006, Koh was chairman (now honorary chairman) of the Chinese Heritage Centre at Singapore's Nanyang Technological University. He remains deeply involved in university life at the National University of Singapore where he is chairman of the Centre for International Law, and Rector of Tembusu College at the University Town. Koh chairs the SymAsia Foundation of Credit Suisse.

In recognition of his many services and sterling achievements, he was awarded by the Singapore Government the "Bintang Bakti Masyarakat" (Public Service Star, 1971), the "Pingat Jasa Gemilang" (Meritorious Service Medal, 1979), the "Darjah Utama Bakti Cemerlang" (Distinguished Service Order, 1990), and the "Darjah Utama Nila Utama" (Order of Nila Utama [First Class], 2008). His stature as an international diplomat is evident in the state decorations bestowed on him by Chile, Finland, France, Japan, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, and Spain. He holds honorary degrees of Doctor of Laws from Yale University (1984) and Monash University (2002), in addition to numerous awards from Columbia, Curtin, the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy, Stanford, and Georgetown universities.

Koh is married to Poh Siew Aing and they have two sons, Wei and Aun.

Koh Tsu Koon

(许子根, Xu Zigen, 1949–)

Academician, former chief minister of Penang, political leader, Malaysia

Many Malaysians know Koh Tsu Koon as the chief minister of Penang from October 1990 to March 2008, and the current head of Parti Gerakan Rakyat Malaysia (more commonly referred to as Gerakan). He is married to Chui Kah Peng, with whom he has two children. Prime Minister Najib Tun Razak appointed him senator and minister in the Prime Minister's Department in April 2009.

He was born in Penang on 26 August 1949 to Datuk Koh Pen Ting, a rubber tycoon and a well respected community leader. Koh received his primary education at Phor Tay Primary School and subsequently attended Chung Ling High School in Penang. It was undoubtedly at Chung Ling that Koh learnt the importance of education and came to realize that he could contribute to the community as his father had done by educating young people of the future. Due to his hard work and his excellent academic performance, he proceeded to Princeton University in the United States for his tertiary education. Never once did his passion for learning falter, for he did consistently well throughout his undergraduate studies. He received the University Scholar Award (1969–70) while he was at Princeton and had received "Phi Beta Kappa" honours by the time he graduated with a bachelor's degree in physics in 1970. His dedication to learning, unwavering belief that he could contribute much to society as an educator, and desire to shape the minds of young Malaysians by instilling in them a sense of awareness that they could make something of themselves through hard work and good education, led Koh to undertake further education in the University of Chicago, from which he graduated with a Ph.D. in economics and sociology of education in 1977.

His formal education now complete, Koh returned to Malaysia and embarked on a career as a lecturer at the Universiti Sains Malaysia in Penang in 1975. By 1978, he was deputy dean at the School of Educational Studies at the same university. His research and perseverance in academic excellence paid off, for he attended Stanford University in the United States in 1980–81 on a Fulbright Scholarship.

Despite the many academic accolades he garnered for his contributions to education, Koh left academia in 1982 to join Parti Gerakan Rakyat Malaysia. It may be speculated that Koh left academia because he felt he could contribute better to society and be in a better position to reform the state of education if he entered politics. Not long after resigning from his teaching post at Universiti Sains Malaysia in Penang, Koh became part of Gerakan and contested in the third Malaysian General Elections in 1982. His first foray into politics was successful, as he contested and won a parliamentary seat in Penang. However, he lost that seat in the subsequent election to Lim Kit Siang of the Democratic Action Party (DAP). This setback notwithstanding, Koh rose quickly within the ranks of Parti Gerakan.

Koh served Gerakan as the chief of its Youth Wing from 1983 to 1990, as the party's vice-president from 1991 to 2005, and as deputy president from 2005–07. After briefly serving as Acting President, he became the party's President in October 2008. Although he was a Member of Parliament for one term (1982–86), he was a member of the Penang Legislative Assembly for four terms, from October 1990 to March 2008. Before he gained his seat in the Penang Legislative Assembly, Koh served the then chief minister of Penang, Dr Lim Chong Eu, as a political secretary from 1986–90. Koh came into his own politically when he was elected an assemblyman of the Penang State Legislative Council in October 1990. As Dr Lim Chong Eu lost his seat in the same election, Koh was made the third chief minister of Penang since the country's independence.

He remained in this position for four terms, from October 1990 to March 2008 during which he continued the industrialization policy of his predecessor, and sustained the inflow of foreign direct investment into the state. He facilitated the economic transformation of Penang by changing its economic focus from labour-intensive assembly to high technology and greater value added manufacturing activities. He also worked hard to sustain the inflow of foreign direct investments, which resulted in increased number of factories, the expansion of existing manufacturing plants, and enlarged industrial estates. As a consequence, the manufacturing sector continued to dominate Penang's economy, accounting for almost one half of the state's GDP. Towards the later part of his administration, he contributed to the continued transformation of the state's economy. Due to increasing competition from other low-cost production centres in neighbouring countries, Koh gradually but successfully guided Penang away from labour-intensive assembly operations to higher value added, higher technology content activities, both in manufacturing and manufacturing support services. During the nearly two decades of his tenure as chief minister, Koh helped to steer the state — which is highly export-oriented and dependent on external factors — through a series of world and national economic downturns, including the 1997–98 financial crisis, the September 2001 World Trade Center attacks in the United States, the 2003 Iraq war, and the SARS epidemic in the Asia Pacific.

In acknowledgement of his service to the country, Koh was awarded the Panglima Setia Mahkota (PSM) in 1995 and henceforth was addressed as "Tan Sri". In the 2008 general elections, he left the Tanjung Bungah state seat to contest in the Batu Kawan parliamentary constituency, but was defeated by a DAP candidate, Dr P. Ramasamy, who was a retired university academic.

Koh is known as "Mr. Nice" due to his scholarly, unassuming, and contemplative approach. This helped him to stand out in the Malaysian political arena. In the early 1980s, Chinese educationist groups encouraged Koh to enter politics and seek representation and work in the government. This was how he came to contest in the 1982 Malaysian General Elections. His ascension to the post of chief minister of Penang, however, was unplanned and unexpected.

In the eleventh general elections in March 2008, he decided to move from his state-level stronghold to a parliamentary constituency, to play a more effective role at the federal level as the national leader of Parti Gerakan. Unfortunately, the political gamble did not pay off. Parti Gerakan was totally wiped out in the state of Penang, losing all the state, as well as parliamentary seats. As a result, Gerakan lost its hold on the chief minister post that it had had since 1969.

Kong Hee

(康希, Kangxi, 1964–)

Pastor, entrepreneur, Singapore

Kong Hee is an influential figure in the Christian community in Singapore. The founder and pastor of the hugely successful City Harvest Church (CHC), he has been instrumental in the spread of Charismatic Christianity and the increasing popularity of the Prosperity Gospel in Singapore. Apart from being a leading pastor in one of the "mega-churches" in the country, he is also an entrepreneur who co-owns with his wife a number of fashion retail outlets in the main shopping districts.

Born on 23 August 1964 in Singapore, Kong Hee comes from a middle-class background. He received some of the best education that Singapore can offer, spending his formative years first at Raffles Institution and Raffles Junior College, followed by undergraduate studies at the National University of Singapore. In 1988 he graduated with a degree in Computer and Information Sciences. For a short while after graduation, he worked for the Anglican Church and harboured hopes of becoming a missionary in the Philippines. 1989 was a momentous year for Kong: this was when he had an intense religious experience and felt the calling to establish a new church in Singapore. The result was the City Harvest Church, founded in May by a group of twenty young people with Kong Hee as the leader. He was then twenty-five. At the same time, to deepen his theological knowledge, he enrolled for a Master of Divinity programme with the New Covenant International Theological Seminary in the United States. He was awarded a doctorate in theology from the same institution in 1995.

In time, the CHC began to attract huge crowds to its services, partly due to Kong Hee's charismatic leadership and style of preaching, and partly due to the message he preaches. In the tradition of the so-called "Prosperity Gospel" that originated in the United States, members are exhorted to engage not only in constant "spiritual warfare" and intensive evangelization, but also taught that a good Christian is one who is successful both spiritually and materially. Church members are to adopt a this-worldly orientation to attain success in the different areas of their lives so as to reveal God's greatness and his abundant blessings. Not only is the "sinful" world to be overcome, but believers are also expected to transcend themselves continuously to achieve excellence in life. Kong Hee defines "excellence" as "to be superior in quality, greater in quantity, to transcend your job description, and to outdo yourself each time".

Holding doctorate degrees in both theology and business administration, like the leaders of many other "mega-churches" Kong

Hee consciously applies a business model to the CHC's mode of operation. The headquarters of the CHC is known as the "corporate office", and is located at Suntec City in Singapore's Central Business District. With a governing board just like a business corporation, it also has a human resource department, an IT department, and a finance department. The motto of the CHC, "kristos kai kosmos", refers to its commitment "to bring Christ into the marketplace and contemporary culture of society in a relevant way". Like a business enterprise, the discourse of CHC's success is often expressed in terms of "growth", especially in the number of members and new churches "planted". Today, through Kong Hee's leadership, the CHC has more than thirty affiliate churches and Bible schools in Asia, and claims more than 23,000 attendees in its weekend services.

The rapid success of the CHC can also be attributed to the way its services are conducted. The utilization of state-of-the-art sound and entertainment technologies in "praise and worship" sessions and the "ultra modern" image the CHC tries to project make it highly attractive to the younger crowd. The average age of the congregation over the years hovers around the mid-twenties. Kong Hee's wife, Sun Ho, is a popular Mandarin song singer and has been dubbed "the singing pastor". Kong's sermons and some of the CHC's stage and musical productions have been broadcast widely via the Internet and religious television networks. His success with the CHC thus combines both charismatic leadership and business management skills, and is reflective of a particular mode of operation that is behind the general phenomenal growth of Charismatic Christianity across the world.

Kong Hee's application of the business model to the running of the church has attracted his fair share of critics. So has the CHC's practice of tithes, whereby working adult members have to pay ten per cent of their monthly income to the church. When the CHC's new church building was unveiled in early 2002, it was hailed as an architectural gem by some while criticized for its extravagance by others. Built at a cost of around S$42.3 million, the titanium-clad structure boasts one of the world's largest fountains as well as an 18,300-sq ft auditorium. Its sound console is the world's largest, designed by the same sound and lighting consultant to the Sydney Opera House. To counter his critics, Kong Hee pointed to the stringent independent audit on the church finances (which are also available online), and has taken himself off the CHC's payroll to become a full-time "volunteer pastor". The CHC has also successfully obtained the ISO 9001 certification on excellence in business management, the first church in the world to do so.

An important component of Kong Hee's socially engaged and market oriented form of Christianity is charity work. He set up the City Harvest Community Services Association (CHCSA) to provide social and financial assistance to groups such as the elderly, the hearing impaired, the terminally ill, prisoners, youth, and married couples. In a society where the government is ideologically against a welfare state, civil society groups such as the CHCSA play a vital role in the provision of social welfare services. In the area of religious education, Kong Hee also established a School of Theology with an international faculty and student body. The CHC and Kong Hee suffered a setback in June 2010 when he and his wife, together with sixteen other people linked to the church, were questioned by the police over alleged misuse of church funds. This had happened soon after the CHC paid S$310 million for a share in the Suntec Singapore International Convention and Exhibition Centre. Not long after this incident, Kong Hee was again embroiled in controversy when he was accused by several American authors of plagiarizing their work in his writings.

The City Harvest Church continues to grow, with weekend services conducted in a variety of languages such as English, Mandarin, Chinese dialects, and Bahasa Indonesia. A new church building is to be completed soon to cope with CHC's rapidly expanding congregation and range of services. Kong Hee is also a highly sought after speaker who has frequently been invited to give talks in Asia and elsewhere.

Kong Hiap

(广洽, Guangqia, 1901–90)
Buddhist leader, educator, Singapore

Venerable Kong Hiap (广洽法师) was a Buddhist leader very dedicated to promoting Buddhism and education in Singapore. He was the founder of Chian Pok Ee (蒨葛院), and was the founder of Mee Toh School (弥陀学校), and was very interested in, and supportive of, arts and culture as well.

Ven. Kong Hiap — with the vernacular surname Huang (黄), given name, Runzhi (润智), other names, including Zhaorong (照融) and Purun (普润) — was born on 14 January 1901 in Nan'an County (南安) in Fujian, China. His father, Huang Disheng (黄鑅生), was an imperial scholar and a lover of antiques and calligraphy. He passed away when Kong Hiap was not even five years old. The young boy and his widowed mother, who died five years later, had to depend on the sale of the limited pieces of antiques and calligraphy they had inherited from Huang Disheng as the sole means of living.

In 1917, Kong Hiap was drawn to the monastic order, and stayed at Da-He Tang (大和念佛堂), where he became a vegetarian and led a simple life. For two years he attended night school while herding cattle in the day. This two-year class was crucial in his life — it was the only education he ever received. He learnt to make Chinese herbal medicine the following year.

Kong Hiap became committed into Buddhism over a period of two years from 1920 to 1922. He was enlightened by Ven. Zhuanfeng (转逢和尚) whom he followed to Nan Putuo Temple (南普陀寺) in Xiamen; ordained by Ven. Ruideng (瑞等上人), the supervisor at Puzhao Temple (普照寺); and received his precepts' order under Ven. Guxing (古性律师) at the Guanghua Monastery (广化寺) in Putian (莆田).

In the early 1920s, Ven. Kong Hiap went to Singapore for a brief stay at the Leong San See Temple (龙山寺) and then returned to China, first to Nanshan Temple (南山寺) in Zhangzhou (漳州), then Nan Putuo Temple, due to some unsettled administrative matters. Ven. Huiquan (会泉法师) was elected abbot the following year and founded the Minnan Institute of Buddhist Studies. Ven. Kong Hiap was tasked to receive guests, and when Ven. Taixu (太虚大师) succeeded Ven. Huiquan, Ven. Kong Hiap was reassigned to take charge of finances. In 1928, Ven. Kong Hiap met Ven. Hongyi (弘一法师), for whom he had great respect. After several invitations, Ven. Hongyi paid a few visits to Minnan, and after the third, agreed to stay on. This was when Ven. Kong Hiap regarded Ven. Hongyi as a mentor, furthering his studies on precepts, together with Ven. Ruijin (瑞今法师). During his stay, Ven. Hongyi was disappointed by the lack of discipline at the Minnan Institute and thus set up the Yangzheng College (佛教养正院) within Nan Putuo Temple in 1934 to upgrade the qualities of the younger monks. He planned the curriculum, while engaging Ven. Kong Hiap as Master of Discipline, and Ven. Ruijin, to teach.

Ven. Kong Hiap went to Singapore in 1937, when the Japanese War broke out. He stayed at Leong San See helping out in its management, and as the religious adviser and librarian at the Singapore Buddhist Lodge. Five years later, during the Japanese Occupation in Singapore, he joined the Rescue and Welfare Committee to save starving civilians.

In 1948, Ven. Kong Hiap founded Chiam Pok Ee as his base to promote Buddhism. This was converted to a memorial hall to commemorate him after his demise and was officially opened by the president of Singapore, S. R. Nathan, in March 2007. In June 1952, he succeeded Ven. Zhuangfeng, who recently passed away, as the new abbot of Leong San See, at the request of the Singapore Buddhist Federation to the Trustees and Management Committee of the Temple. Ven. Kong Hiap took up several other leadership positions in the Buddhist community in his lifetime including being president of the Buddhist Federation in 1986. However he stepped down from this role a few months after his appointment due to poor health.

One major contribution to education in Singapore by Ven. Kong Hiap was the founding of Mee Toh School in 1954. He felt the need to see more Chinese schools in Singapore, so much so as to replace the intention of building a Mee Toh Temple with that of having the school, which was converted from Leong San School (龙山学校). In addition, he was appointed vice-chairman of both Maha Bodhi School (菩提学校) and Manjusri Secondary School (文殊中学) in 1981. The former was the first Buddhist school in Singapore, and the latter, the first and only Buddhist secondary school.

Ven. Kong Hiap believed that before attaining enlightenment, one should first focus on the well-being of mankind, and so put in extensive effort in charity and social welfare. He initiated several trust funds to aid the aged and needy since 1978, and served as a committee member in various charity fund organizations, including the Buddhist Lodge Bursary Fund that provided financial assistance to needy students. Ven. Kong Hiap was also vice-chairman of the Singapore Buddhist Free Clinic, and chairman of its second branch. On Vesak Day every year, he would raise funds and distribute these among various charitable organizations in Singapore. Ven. Kong Hiap's charitable acts extended beyond Singapore, as he donated generously to his homeland China as well, including the contributions to construction funding of Donglin Temple (东林寺) in Lushan (庐山), and Jinshan Temple (金山寺) in Zhenjiang (镇江).

Ven. Kong Hiap was officially recognized for his various contributions to Buddhism and the society when the president of Singapore presented him with the Public Service Star (BBM) in 1988. Two years later, the Ministry of Education gave him the Meritorious Award for his contributions to education and the establishment of Mee Toh.

Ven. Kong Hiap was very enthusiastic about arts and culture. He maintained close contacts with famous artists and intellectuals in China, such as Ma Yifu (马一浮), Yu Dafu (郁达夫), Xu Beihong (徐悲鸿), and others, the closest being his teacher, Ven. Hongyi, and fellow disciple Feng Zikai (丰子恺). He collected many fine pieces from the masters, and was very supportive of their works. For example, he provided the most funding for the publication of Ven. Hongyi's collected works (《弘一大师遗墨》), supported the publication of Feng's "Paintings on the Preservation of Life" (《护生画集》), and held an exhibition in 1987 in memory of the late Feng.

Ven. Kong Hiap passed away on 24 February 1994 after a series of falls going back three years. Chiam Pok Ee was converted to the Kong Hiap Memorial Museum (广洽纪念馆), and is located at 8 Geylang East Ave 1, Singapore.

Kuan Yin Choi

(关英才, Guan Yingcai, 1923–)
Business leader, Brunei

Kuan Yin Choi's story is a story of from rags to riches. He is a well established entrepreneur widely known regionally, and even as far as Mainland China and Taiwan. He resides in Belait District, the biggest of the four districts of Brunei Darussalam. After the Japanese were defeated in 1945, he started as an apprentice of his elder brother who supplied electrical power generated from a generator. From then on, as he matured over the years and became more business savvy, he expanded into the hotel business, construction, shipping, and other endeavours. Upon the independence of Brunei in 1984, he ventured abroad, at first to Singapore, and later to China. He is now a successful regional and international businessman. For the past twenty years or so, he has been actively promoting and contributing to educational, cultural, and other charitable causes, domestically and in China.

Kuan was born in the Kaiping municipality in Guangdong, China. He does not possess any degree, diploma, or professional qualification, and only had primary education (1931–37) in China. In 1937, after landing in Belait to join his elder brother, he enrolled into a government English school until this was interrupted by the Japanese Occupation for three years and eight months. He speaks Mandarin and English fluently, and is able to communicate in the Malay, the national language of Brunei, as well.

He started his climb on the social ladder from the bottom rung. In 1945, at the age of twenty-two, he followed his elder brother into the business of supplying electrical power to private houses and shops on subscription. They were the first to do so, well before the government did so, as it was too preoccupied at the time with the urgent task of recovery immediately after the Japanese left for home. When his brother died of an industrial accident — heirless — Kuan had to take over from him and carried on the business under the business name of Belait Electrical Co.

His business as an electrical contractor led him into the construction trade which was mushrooming between 1960s–1980s. At the beginning, using the business name of Kuan Yin Choi Construction Co., he did a lot of electrical, maintenance, and constriction work for Shell and the Brunei Government. The completion of his huge four-storey complex consisting of ten units of flats in Kuala Belait in 1972 was the first of its kind. His landmark complex, limited by municipal law to only four-storeys high, was sited at Kuala Belait beach and completed in 1974. This project provided for a hotel, offices for Shell's international contractors, and a shopping centre. The grand hotel (named Sea-view Hotel) consisted of sixty-three rooms and twenty-eight apartments. In a small town such as Kuala Belait, Kuan Yin Choi described it a three-star hotel with four-star service. Kuan was very proud to point out that in the year it was declared open for business, it was the first high-rise building in Belait District approved by the Municipal Board.

He said that in this building complex, he was the first to install a commercial lift, fire equipment using water sprinklers, and automatic doors. He was also the first to use aluminum windows and steel roofs.

For these two big projects, approval for his application for a change of land conditions as endorsed on his land grants, was also unprecedented in Belait District.

On the basis of his achievements in the 1970s, he was one of the first, if not the first, to invite prominent and influential heavy-weights (some six of them) in the Malay community to be partners in his business endeavours. His willingness to share his business opportunities and know-how with locals was clear well before the independence of the sultanate in 1984.

In 1974, his application through a local lawyer to change his agricultural land on Kuala Belait river bank into one suitable for shipyard purposes was approved by the Land Office, two years after its submission. This marked a breakthrough in the history of the local industry. Kuan Yin Choi's shipyard strengthened his bid for, and indeed, in due course, enabled him to secure a contract to supply boats on hire to Brunei Shell Petroleum Co. Ltd. He now owns a fleet of some thirty boats — the number varies from time to time, depending on his client's operational requirement. This part of his growing business is currently run by two of his sons. It also broadens his vision and brings him into contact with regional and international contractors.

The minorities in Brunei, especially the Chinese, had always been insecure with their status, and started migrating since the late 1970s, to America, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Singapore, etc. In 1974, Kuan Yin Choi made a fateful decision. By investing S$1 million, he acquired Singapore citizenship. His Singapore passport made his business trips abroad more pleasant and pleasurable. Gone was the traumatic experience of being humiliated by Immigration officials because he was travelling on a document called "Certificate of Identity", issued by the authorities concerned in Brunei. As a regional entrepreneur, he found Singapore business-friendly, affording everybody an even playing field. He made money out of investments in real estate and dealings in Asian Currencies. His venture into Singapore was eye-opening. He hobnobbed with big names in the island republic and with those from neighbouring countries. He is now much more knowledgeable and sophisticated.

Since 1993, Brunei has allowed everybody to visit or do business in China. The two countries had established diplomatic ties two years prior to that. Kuan was impressed by the progress China has made since its opening up and reform in 1979. From Singapore he saw business opportunity in China's huge market. But what attracted him to China in the early years was his fervent desire to help Jin Ji (金鸡, Golden Rooster) the town of Kai Ping municipality in the province of Guangdong, where he was born. He knew how hard it was to get rid of poverty and backwardness, and he understood how his country folks must be desperately hoping he would give them a hand in changing their lives for the better. So he did, and with huge sums of money. He donated generously, giving over a period of twenty years or more, sums amounting to tens of millions in renminbi. With the money, he built schools, kindergartens, science laboratories, hospitals, roads, temples, and other infrastructure in furtherance of charitable causes.

Since 2002 he has ventured into businesses mainly in connection with hotels and tourism. His investment spread covers Shanghai, Henan, Hainan, and other places. In recognition of his contributions to China, he has received numerous awards from county and, municipal governments, such as "Honorary Citizen for Special Contribution". On 22 April 2002, at a grand dinner hosted by the Chinese Embassy in Brunei Darussalam, Kuan Yin Choi was invited as a special guest to meet in person President Hu Jing Tao, who was in the country on a state visit. In 2008, he received an award of a gold medal from the U.N. World Peace Foundation. Earlier, in the spring of 2004, he was invited by President George Bush, as part of his election campaign, to visit America. Bush sought Kuan's view on the Kuan Gong (关公) culture and spirit. Kuan is very touched by the appreciation of his contributions to charitable and good causes and the cultural role he now chooses to play actively.

Kuan Yin Choi claims to be the 72nd generation of Kuan Gong's descendents. He is currently president of the World's Kuans Association (in the United States), and president of World (the Lius, Kuans, Zhangs, and Zhaos) Long Gang Brotherhood Association headquartered in Taipei. In 2008, Kuan founded the Association for the Spread of Kuan Gong Culture with headquarters in Beijing. He is currently its president, actively promoting the Kuan Gong Culture and Spirit.

Kuan has three wives. His first wife, Wong Mee Lin, died in 1989, with one son, Antony, surviving her. His second marriage was with Chong Koon Thai in 1989. She is now seventy-two years old. This marriage produced seven children — two sons and five daughters. His sons run the shipping business and his daughters take care of office administration. He disclosed that he has a third wife (a common law wife) in Singapore. This relationship has produced one son aged twenty-nine in 2009, who is a non-practising lawyer keen to do business in London. Kuan's mother passed away in 1988, after having lived with him for thirty-two years in Brunei.

Though a prominent figure in the Chinese community, Kuan had been criticized for not being sensitive enough to community issues. An example cited is when the Brunei Government announced its intention to close down all Chinese schools or convert them into national schools. While the Chinese community was very concerned, Kuan remained largely indifferent throughout the whole controversy.

Kuek Ho Yao

(郭鹤尧, Guo Heyao, 1916–)

Community leader, promoter of Chinese education, businessman, Malaysia

Kuek Ho Yao is a recognized ethnic Chinese leader in Johor Bahru and a leader of the Chinese education movement, as well as vice chairman of Chinese Chamber of Commerce and Industry in Johor Bahru, Malaysia.

Born on 23 February 1916 in Fuzhou, China, Kuek left China for Malaya at the tender age of three, and grew up in a sundry shop run by his father and uncles in Johor Bahru, the capital of the sultanate of Johor. Bilingually educated, he first attended the Foon Yew (宽柔) School in Johor Bahru for four years before transferring to the Anglo-Chinese School in Singapore while continuing his Chinese classes at Foon Yew in the afternoon. He later attended the English College of Johor Bahru, where he had many Malay classmates, including Tun Dr Ismail Abdul Rahman who would be Malaysia's deputy prime minister from 1970 to 1973. Kuek quit the college two months before graduation after a fight with an English teacher over the latter insulting China.

On his own merit, as well as through his family, Kuek was well connected to the Chinese and Malay elite in Johor Bahru. Five years after leaving school, he found his first job as a clerk at Lee Rubber Co. Ltd, owned by Lee Kong Chian, a tycoon in Singapore and son-in-law of Tan Kah Kee, the most prominent overseas Chinese philantrophist of his time. Because of his English proficiency, one of his tasks was dealing with colonial officers and British planters. He left Lee Rubber as a director in 1957 before joining Kuok Brother Sdn. Bhd., set up by his uncles and cousins. He would retire from Kuok Brothers only forty-six years later.

In the run-up to the Japanese invasion, Kuek joined the local Chinese campaign against the Japanese Occupation of China and, later, an ambulance team when the war broke out locally. Dato Onn Jaffar, who later founded UMNO, was the officer in-charge of food control under the Japanese and had not only protected the Kuek/Kuok clan, but also made them the main distributor of food stock. This gave the family a good foundation with which to start their family business after the war. Although Kuek was forced by the Japanese to lead the vigilant corps in Johor Bahru answerable to the Japanese police chief, he used the position to help the community. As a result, unlike many others who served the Japanese, he was not persecuted by anti-Japanese guerillas.

Kuek joined politics for a brief period after the war. and was first appointed a municipal councillor for Johor Bahru from 1946 to 1949. In 1949, he joined the Malayan Chinese Association (MCA), formed by the more conservative Chinese elite to compete with the communists for Chinese political support, and which became UMNO's ruling partner by 1955. Kuek ran for and won a municipal council seat in Johor Bahru under the MCA banner in 1951. While remaining an MCA member, he was no longer politically active after his two-year term as councillor. In his capacity as a director of Lee Rubber, Kuek took on the powerful trade union movement in 1956. With the help of his old classmate, then Home Minister Dr Ismail Abdul Rahman, who sent in the riot police, Kuek broke a strike in Lee's pineapple plant.

As his business grew, Kuek also rose as a community leader. In 1972, he was elected as the president of Persatuan Foo Chow Johor Bahru and led it for eleven years after which he was re-elected for two more years in 1986. In 1978, he moved on from leading the Fuzhou (prefecture-level) community to leading the entire Fujian (province-level) community, chairing the Hokkien Huay Kuan Johor Bahru for three years and then again from 1986 to 1987. From 1979 to 1984 and from 1989 to 1991, Kuek became the leader of the entire Chinese community in Johor Bahru as president of the Persatuan Tiong-Hua Johor Bahru, an umbrella body for five dialectic communities, namely Teochew (Chaozhou), Hokkien (Fujian), Hakka (Ke), Cantonese (Guangdong), and Hailamese (Hainan) in the city. He also served the Johor Bahru Chinese Chamber of Commerce and Industry as vice president from 1978 to 1981.

Kuek's pro-establishment outlook led to an uncelebrated end to his communal leadership in 1991 that involved the controversial demolition of the historical gate of the Johor Old Temple (柔佛古庙), a temple built in the second half of the nineteenth century and under custody of the Persatuan Tiong-Hua Johor Bahru. In 1985, the Johor state government published in the government gazette its plan to acquire the land of the Old Temple for redevelopment. Kuek, then deputy president of the Persatuan, was open to the state government's proposal of compensation and relocation, but majority of his committee members rejected it. In the run-up to the 1986 general elections, Johor Chief Minister Abdul Ajid Ahmad promised that in acquiring some of the temple land the government modify its development plan to preserve the temple and its four walls. After the election, the Persatuan accepted the compensation of over RM5 million from the government, but the new Chief Minister Muhyiddin Yassin however ignored the Persatuan's request to formalize his predecessor's verbal promise to leave the temple's gate untouched. In 1989, Kuek, who was re-elected as the Persatuan's president, announced the Persatuan's plan to rebuild the Old Temple on the grounds that the building structure was no longer stable. He was strongly criticized by other community leaders who believed the heritage temple, which was a testimony of the Chinese contribution to the development of Johor Bahru, must be preserved in its entirety. In 1990, the state authorities asked the Persatuan to demolish the Old Temple's gate to make way for development, which the Persatuan rejected. The 1990 general elections, which saw the UMNO-led government being challenged vigorously by a united front of opposition parties, forced Chief Minister Muhyiddin Yassin to instruct officially in October the preservation of the Old Temple's gate. However, the next July, Muhyiddin Yassin insisted that the gate had to be demolished on the grounds that it obstructed traffic and that the Persatuan had already accepted compensation for this. In August, the disagreement in the association grew and Kuek tendered his resignation since the Persatuan ruled out the demolition of the gate. On 29 December, the gate was eventually demolished by force despite protest by members of the public.

This episode left the Johor Bahru Chinese community bitterly divided. Kuek who insisted on a non-confrontational approach in dealing with the state accused the defenders of the gate of heroism and inflexibility.

In contrast to the controversy his conservative social leadership, Kuek's contribution to the Chinese education movement was widely recognized and appreciated. When he was kidnapped twice, in 1984 and 1987, respectively, the schools he led as board chairman, together with a wide range of Chinese associations, advertised in newspapers or held mass rallies to appeal for his release.

Kuek and his conservative colleagues have not challenged the Malaysian Government's policy of restricting the number of Chinese schools in the country, but have worked hard to find ways around it instead to increase new schools such as setting up branch schools. From 1971, Kuek led the board of directors of Foon Yew Primary Schools for seventeen years and saw to the relocation and construction of five primary schools. Under his leadership from 1949 to 1957 and since 1973, another primary school, Kuo Kuang (国光), has grown steadily and now become the largest Chinese primary school in Malaysia with an enrolment of 5,000. In 1998, Kuo Kuang II Primary School was established in the school's vicinity. Kuek also assumed the leadership of the independent Foon Yew High School for some nine years (1982–88, 1990–92, 1996–97), steering it to become one of Malaysia's largest and best independent Chinese high schools. The Further Education section of Foon Yew High School was expanded in 1990 into the Southern College (南方学院), which Kuek led as the founding board chairman for four years. The Chinese community has worked since 1967 towards the establishment of Merdeka University, a Chinese-medium university to cater to the graduates of Chinese independent schools. As the Merdeka University (独立大学) project was crushed by the government's disapproval in 1979, and this was affirmed by the Federal Court in 1982, Southern College and two other community-run colleges using Chinese as the primary language medium, have become an indirect perpetuation of the original dream.

In a way, the achievements of the Chinese education movement in Johor Bahru under Kuek's leadership represents the "negotiation" (xieshang 协商) approach in response to UMNO's ethno-nationalist hegemony, which was more popular than the "pressuring" (shiya 施压) approach for the traditional elite of his generation.

Kuo Pao Kun

(郭宝崑, Guo Baokun, 1939–2002)

Playwright, theatre director, arts educator, cultural entrepreneur, public intellectual, Singapore

Kuo Pao Kun was the singularly most important dramatist of his era, which overlapped with the first four decades of post-independent Singapore. His theatrical work has been largely in search of a multicultural identity, while intellectually critical in its representation of Singapore's early nationhood. Since the 1980s, he has been a leading figure in the theatre scene, and a widely respected public intellectual, transcending cultural, ethnic, and linguistic boundaries.

Born in 1939 in a village in the province of Hebei, China, Kuo, after a brief two-year stay in Beijing, came to Singapore in 1949 to live with his father who was a merchant. He was bilingually educated in Chinese and English, and was exposed to the arts and drama as a student. Kuo's first experience in drama was with the Rediffusion Mandarin Drama Group in 1955, during which he wrote his first play, Plan for the Day (1956). In 1957, Cathay Kris Studios was set up in Singapore and conducted its first and only acting workshop, in which Kuo was taught primarily the Stanislavskian system of performance by veteran theatre practitioners Wang Qiutian, Lin Chen, Liu Renxin, and Zhu Xu. He eventually played a lead role in its graduating production of Gorky's Lower Depth, which toured Singapore and Malaya.

In 1959, Kuo left for Australia, where he worked at the radio station and later enrolled in the Theatre Production Programme of the National Institute of Dramatic Art (NIDA) in Sydney. Here, he received his professional training as a theatre practitioner, being exposed to ancient and modern Western classics, as well as hands-on experience at NIDA's affiliated Old Tote Theatre Company. After graduating in 1964, Kuo worked first as a construction worker, and later a lighting/sound technician of a theatre production touring New South Wales. It was in Australia that he gained knowledge and experience in a wide-ranging modern Western drama tradition, which was not commonly known in Singapore at the time.

Upon return to Singapore in 1965, Kuo cofounded, with dancer wife Goh Lay Kuan, the Singapore Performing Arts School, which emphasized both education and production in drama, dance, and music. In the early days, Kuo, as a translator and director, introduced little-known modern works such as those by Australian Alan Seymour, Africo-American Lorraine Hansbury, and German Bertolt Brecht, to Singaporean audiences. The staging of The Caucasian Chalk Circle in 1966, which sparked fervent debate on theatrical forms and dramaturgy, was the first introduction of the twentieth-century drama giant, Brecht, to Southeast Asia.

Kuo's debut as a playwright was with Hey, Wake Up! (1968). Together with The Struggle (1969), The Sparks of Youth (1971), and The Growth (1975), these early plays by Kuo probed into issues of class conflicts amidst the rapid social and economic transformation in Singapore. Such pieces were part of a larger intellectual movement beginning in the mid-1960s, where, as Yu Yun asserted, "[m]any arts enthusiasts were deeply affected by the trend of thought of the [Chinese] Cultural Revolution, viewing art, literature and drama as weapons of struggle and tools of social change" (p. 21). In 1976 Kuo was imprisoned without a trial by the Singapore Government under the Internal Security Act for allegedly propagating leftlist ideology through the arts.

After his release in 1980, he gradually became one of Singapore's most prolific and influential dramatist, cultural critic, and public intellectual for the next two decades. While continuing his career in playwriting and directing, Kuo was appointed executive playwright/director of The Little White Sailing Boat (1982), the first comprehensive collaborative production by Singapore's fourteen major Chinese-language theatre groups. This signified his leadership in the theatre community. In 1986, he led another collaborative production, Kopitiam (The Coffee Shop) — this time involving twenty-three groups. He played a key role in organizing the Drama Camps in 1983 and 1986, inviting dramatists from China, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Malaysia, and England. Significantly, the 1983 event was the first time since 1949 that dramatists from both sides of the Taiwan Strait met in an official activity.

After being active all along in the Chinese-language theatre circle, Kuo wrote and directed his first English-language play, The Coffin Is Too Big for the Hole, in 1985 to critical acclaim. Since then, most of Kuo's works have been written and staged in both Mandarin and English, including No Parking on Odd Days (1986), The Silly Little Girl and the Funny Old Tree (1987), Day I Met the Prince (1988), Lao Jiu — The Ninth Born (1990), The Eagle and the Cat (1990), Descendants of the Eunuch Admiral (1995), and The Spirits Play (1998). As a rare example of a bilingually and biculturally equipped dramatist, Kuo "took advantage of his position 'at the margins' to play a role in bridging the gulf between the Chinese-educated and the English-educated and in developing multilingual and experimental theatre in Singapore" (Kwok, p. 195).

Kuo's groundbreaking work, Mama Looking for Her Cat (1988), featuring on stage most languages spoken by Singaporeans — was the first multilingual theatre performance in Singapore — that questioned the linguistically segregated social reality and transcended the existing linguistic boundaries of theatre genres. Many of Kuo's later plays, such as 0Zero01 (1991), Evening Climb (1992), Geylang People in the Net (1997), Sunset Rise (1999), One Hundred Years in Waiting (2001, co-written), continued to explore the social and cultural dynamics of multilingualism.

As an arts educator and cultural entrepreneur, Kuo left an illustrious legacy on Singapore's cultural scene. From the early 1960s, and especially in the 1980s, he conducted various directing and playwriting workshops, of which many eminent theatre practitioners of a later generation were participants. Kuo also founded several cultural establishments, including the first professional theatre company, Practice Theatre Ensemble (1986, later renamed The Theatre Practice), the first independent multidiscipline arts centre, The Substation — A Home for the Arts (1990), and the Theatre Training and Research Programme (2000), a multicultural actor training programme. As the founding artistic director of The Substation (1990–95), Kuo also curated festivals and conferences on themes such as Memories and Raw Theatre, providing platforms for intellectual exchanges among artists, critics, academics, civil society activists, and the public. Kuo's vision, idealism, and practice are not confined within the theatre scene, but have, to a great extent, moulded the cultural landscape in Singapore.

Kuok Hock Nien, Robert

(郭鶴年, Guo Henian, 1923–)
Tycoon, Malaysia

Robert Kuok is an influential Malaysian Chinese businessman who made his millions before the New Economic Policy was implemented in 1970. Taking over his father's commodities trading business after the Japanese Occupation, he expanded the Kuok Brothers into a diversified conglomerate with considerable interests in trading, plantations and refining, hotel and property development, and bulk shipping. Kuok's business empire stretched from Southeast Asia to East Asia and he has been generally regarded as the richest man in Southeast Asia for many years.

Kuok was born on 6 October 1923 in Johor Bharu in Johor to a businessman father and a rather well, Chinese-educated mother, an unusual trait for a woman during that era. At the age of fifteen, his father, Kuok Keng Kang, had left Foochow, Fujian, to join his elder brother in Singapore in 1908. After working for several years, the two brothers started their own business, initially in Singapore, and later moving to Johor Bahru where they established Chop Tong Seng in 1915. By the time Kuok was born, his father was already a modestly prosperous merchant-trader. The youngest of three sons, his two brothers were Philip Kuok Hock Khee (born 1921) and William Kuok Hock Ling (born 1922), Kuok and his brothers received their mother-tongue education at the kindergarten in Foon Yew Primary School before attending English schools, Convent School for his primary, and English College (now renamed Maktab Sultan Abu Bakar) for his secondary education. Kuok enrolled at Raffles College in Singapore in 1940, but was forced to leave this when it was closed down during the Japanese Occupation.

Growing up, Kuok and his brothers were influenced most by their mother, Tang Mong Lan, who came from a Mandarin scholar and middle-class background in China. She instilled in them their Chinese heritage as well as discipline and moral guidance. In attending English College, which was the premier English school in Johor, and then Raffles College, Kuok grew up socializing with the elite of the Johor society which includes the Johor aristocracy and upper echelon of Malay, Chinese, Indian, and Eurasian English-educated families. In particular, his relationship with the Malay elite in Johor became an important resource in the development of his business empire.

The forties and fifties were years of dramatic changes in Malaya, first because of the Japanese Occupation (1941–45), and then the communist insurgency (1948–60). Like other Chinese families, the Kuok family lost their means of livelihood during the Japanese Occupation and had to struggle to survive through it. But the most painful tragedy for the family was when William Kuok, who had joined the communists to take up the armed struggle against the British, was killed in Pahang in an ambush by British forces in 1953. He was thirty-one years old at the time.

Kuok first demonstrated his flair for business during the Japanese Occupation when he got a job with the Mitsubishi Shoji Kaisha, which held the franchise to distribute essential food such as rice, sugar, and wheat flour. When his father passed away in 1948, Kuok and his family and cousins reorganized Chop Tong Seng and registered it in 1949 under a new name Kuok Brothers Limited. The company continued with the trading and distribution of commodities, especially rice, sugar, and wheat flour. A few years later, in the early fifties, with the company growing its business in Singapore where opportunities were abundant, Kuok moved and established his main operations base there. In fact, Kuok shifted his headquarters from Johor Bahru to Singapore in the 1970s (Kuok [Singapore] Limited) and eventually, in the 1980s, to Hong Kong (Kerry Holdings Limited) when his business in East Asia started to grow rapidly. Today the Kuok Group is operated through three holding companies located in Malaysia, Singapore, and Hong Kong.

When Malaysia gained its independence in 1957, Kuok's relationship with the Malay elite — especially those from Johor — as well as the new Malaysian Government's economic policies, which encouraged import substitution, provided him with immense opportunities to grow his business. Kuok capitalized strongly on the British withdrawal from Malaya in 1957 to establish a business network throughout the country, based on an "end-to-end" or vertical diversification model that included the production of raw materials, processing, and distribution of the commodity in Malaysia.

His first major coup was to break Guthrie's monopolistic hold of the sugar industry in Malaysia by importing cheaper sugar from India. By the late 1950s, after Malaya gained independence, Kuok's company had displaced Guthrie to become the largest sugar trader in the country. The Kuok Brothers formed a joint company, Malayan Sugar Manufacturing Company Limited, with two Japanese companies, to build the country's first and largest sugar refinery plant in Prai, Penang in 1964, which obtained government privileges and monopoly status. Kuok also managed to cooperate with the Federal Land Development Authority (FELDA), then headed by an old Johorean friend, Andak Taib, to establish the country's first sugar cane plantation, Perlis Plantation. He established the Perlis Plantation Berhad (later renamed PBB) in 1968 to manage the sugar business. In the 1970s, he started more sugar cane plantations in Indonesia, making him one of the world's largest sugar traders. Indeed Kuok, the company's driving force, was gradually recognized internationally, and, by the 1970s, the company was controlling 10 per cent of the global sugar trade and Kuok was dubbed the "Sugar King" of Asia.

From 1970s onwards, realizing the inherent risk in relying on one crop, Kuok diversified PPB by going into other commodities, plantations, manufacturing, leisure and hotels, retail, and bulking operations. PBB expanded into property development, mining, and rubber plantations when it acquired Mineral Securities Malaysia Berhad (now known as Minsec Properties Berhad) in 1979; Tai Yan Realty Sendirian Bhd. (now known as PPB Hartabina Sdn. Bhd.) and Shaw Brothers (M) in 1982–83. In 1989, PPB made takeover offers for Rasa Sayang Beach Hotels Berhad and Federal Flour Mills Berhad (now known as FFM Berhad), which resulted in the two companies becoming subsidiaries of PPB. The takeover of FFM enabled PPB to diversify into flour and animal feed milling, edible oil processing and commodity trading. In 1995, the Kuok Group co-founded with Martua Sitorus from Indonesia, Wilmar International in Singapore and developed it into one of the largest global players in the edible oil sector. Importantly, in 2009 Kuok ceased to be involved in the sugar business when PPB sold its entire sugar business to Felda Global Ventures Holdings Sdn. Bhd.

Rasa Sayang Beach Hotel was absorbed into Kuok's growing hotel and resort business under the Shangri-la Hotels and Resorts chain. Initially the Shangri-la chain was located in Singapore where Kuok bought a plot of land to build his first Shangri-la Hotel in 1971. In 1978 Kuok established Shangri-la Hotels and Resorts company in Hong Kong, which has become the headquarters of his hotel chain. By 2004, the Shangri-la chain had seventy hotels and resorts throughout the Asia Pacific, North America, and the Middle East, representing a room inventory of more than 30,000. In 1989, Kuok introduced the Traders Hotel Company, which is a mid-market brand of mid-priced city-centre hotels and had a total of thirteen hotels in 2004.

Kuok established Kerry Properties Limited in Hong Kong in 1978 and developed it into one of the largest property investment and development companies in Hong Kong, with a significant portfolio of luxury residential developments, mixed-use commercial developments, and a significant warehousing portfolio incorporating a fast-growing logistics business.

Since 2000, Kuok has started to increasingly relinquish his control over the managing of his business increasingly especially to his own children and relatives. Of his eight children from two marriages, only his two sons are active in the Kuok Group's business: Beau Kuok Khoon Chen, chairman of the Kerry Group Ltd., and his brother, Kuok Khoon Ean, director of Kuok (Singapore) Ltd., Singapore. Kuok's nephew, Kuok Khoon Hong, is chairman and chief executive officer of Wilmar International. Though based in Hong Kong, Kuok continues to make frequent travels to oversee his far-flung business empire.

Kurniawan, Rudy Hartono

(Nio Hap Liang, 梁海量, Liang Hailiang, 1949–)

Leading badminton player, Indonesia

Rudy Hartono is a legendary badminton player from Indonesia who has won the All England Championship title eight times, one time more than another legendary badminton player, Erland Kops of Denmark. Rudy's record has not been broken up to today.

Rudy Nio, who was later known as Rudy Hartono Kurniawan, was born on 19 August 1949 in Surabaya into a businessman's family dealing in clothing and dairy products. His father and his seven brothers and sisters were also badminton players but they only reached the national level, except for his younger sister, Utami Dewi (Chinese name: Nio Pik Wan), who also made it to the Indonesian Uber Cup team in 1968/69, 1971/72 and 1974/75. Since his childhood days Rudy Hartono has enjoyed various kinds of sports including swimming, volley ball and badminton, but he loves badminton most and it was this sport which took him to the national and world sports arena.

Rudy's father owned a badminton club called Suryanaga in Surabaya. Rudy was first trained by his father in the club and only later did he join the Rajawali Club where many good Indonesian badminton players were trained. When he was only 15 years of age, Rudy won the junior national championship and in 1968 at the age of 18 he took part in the All England competition, defeating Tan Aik Huang of Malaysia and winning the title. He also joined the Indonesian Thomas Cup Team in 1968. From then until 1974, he won every year and collected seven All England titles. It was only in 1975 that he was defeated by Svend Pri of Denmark. He won the All England title again in 1976.

Rudy was regarded as a "wonder boy" and a giant in the history of world badminton. However, like many champions, Rudy has also suffered defeats. In fact, having defeated Svend Pri in the finals of the All England Championship in 1970 and 1972, he lost to Svend Pri in 1975. In 1976 at the All England Championship finals, Rudy defeated his compatriot, Liem Swie King, but two years later, i.e. in 1978, Rudy lost to Liem, also in the All England finals. Despite his losses, no one has any doubt that Rudy is one of the best badminton players that the world has ever known.

Rudy is considered an all-round player. Stuart Wyatt, one time President of the England Badminton Association, noted that Rudy Hartono was the greatest badminton singles player of his time. He also said that Rudy was an excellent player in all aspects of the game, viz. his capability, tactic and spirit. Sports commentators have also described Rudy was "a complete player", "fit, fast, and mentally strong", "elegant and accurate",, "cap[ping] it all with the most powerful smash the world had seen at the time" and "virtually invincible during his heyday".

At the end of the 1960s and the first half of the 1970s Rudy reached the peak of his badminton career. In 1969 and 1971 he was awarded the Best Sportsman (Olahragawan Terbaik) by the Indonesian Journalist Association. At his peak, Rudy was extremely popular and was offered many opportunities by various institutions. Indonesian Airways Garuda would accept him as a candidate pilot, and Airlangga University would take him on as a medical student. However, he took up an offer to study Economics at the University of Trisakti in Jakarta and was only able to obtain a Sarjana Muda degree (equivalent to B.A. Pass) due to his busy training schedule. In view of his popularity, Wahyu Sihombing, a well known Indonesian movie director, offered him a leading role in a movie called Matinya Seorang Bidadari (Death of an Angle, 1971). His leading co-star was Poppy Dharsono who was also very popular at the time. Apparently, Rudy did not have much success as an actor; that was his first and also his last movie.

Age is the fatal enemy of every sportsman and sportswoman. In 1978 when he was defeated by his compatriot, Liem Swie King, Rudy realized that he was getting old but he continued to participate in the international championship contests as he was expected to lead the Indonesian badminton team to further success. In 1982 he joined the Indonesian Thomas Cup Team to play against the Chinese players. It was the first time that he played against the Chinese players; he was also no longer in top form and lost. Although Indonesia was able to regain the Thomas Cup in 1984, the dominant position of Indonesia as the land of badminton champions has since been challenged by the PRC.

Rudy eventually retreated from the front line. Nevertheless, he did not really retire as he still wanted to contribute to the game and be part of the badminton world. He continued to serve in the Indonesian Badminton Association for many years. He was also invited to serve in the International Badminton Federation (IBF) and obtained the IBF Distinguished Award in 1985. In 1988, he suffered a stroke and went to Australia for a heart by-pass operation. He has since recovered but is no longer able to play badminton, the sport he loved most. He is now a businessman dealing in sports equipments and accessories. He was at one time the agent of sports products for Ascot and Yonex.

Rudy is a Protestant and has been active in church. It is reported that during competitions, he always prayed to God. His religious belief seems to have given him extraordinary strength and skill. He married Jane Anwar in 1976 and has three children.

Kwa Tjoan Sioe

(柯全寿, Ke Quanshou, 1893–1948)
Medical doctor, founder of Jang Seng Ie Hospital, social activist, Indonesia

Kwa Tjoan Sioe was a well known physician of his time. His greatest achievement was the founding of the Jang Seng Ie Hospital (Yang Sheng Yuan 养生院), presently known as Rumah Sakit Husada. He had also developed a cure for opium addicts.

Born in 1893 in Salatiga, Kwa Tjoan Sioe was the fourth child of Kwa Sam Kang and Liem Tjio Nio. He went to a private school to learn Malay and Dutch and, at the age of eleven, joined a Dutch elementary school. He later continued his studies at the HBS in Semarang. After graduating in 1913, he went to the University of Amsterdam in the Netherlands to study medicine.

While in the Netherlands as a student, he was not active in Chinese organizations, but was a regular visitor of The Kring, a club for artists. He was probably introduced to this club by Liem Bwan Tjie, who studied architecture in Amsterdam, and was two years his senior at the HBS (Dutch High School) in Semarang. Only then did he meet artists such as John Raedecker (sculptor) and J.M.H. Schoenmaekers (painter). They often got together to discuss politics and to attend lectures by left-wing politicians such as Sneevliet (a Dutch communist) and Wiessing. They were all in favour of a free Indonesia. It was probably because of Kwa's friendship with the Leftist Movement in the Netherlands that he had been suspected of being a member of the Comintern. However, there was no evidence of his membership, only allegations that he might have been a secret member. It is interesting to note that in 1917 he became a member of the Chung Hwa Hui, a Chinese students' organization in the Netherlands, and remained a regular member until 1918, and was then an overseas member until 1938.

After finishing his medical studies, Kwa went on to the Colonial Institute (Koloniaal Instituut voor de Tropen) in Amsterdam to specialize in tropical diseases. He only returned to Dutch East Indies in 1921 and was stationed at the General Hospital (Centrale Burgelijke Ziekenhuis) and the Instituut Pasteur in Batavia. In 1922, he went into private practice and noticed the poverty of the majority of his patients. He then decided to raise fund to build a clinic, where poor people could get free treatment. This clinic later grew to become the Jang Seng Ie Hospital.

The clinic for the poor started in December 1924 in Jalan Mangga Besar 40, where he had rented a house. He insisted that the clinic should only be for the poor; patients who could afford to pay were refused and sent to private practitioners. In 1928, he went to Europe where he visited his former colleagues in Vienna, Amsterdam, and Paris, and studied the running of some good hospitals. On his return, he was disappointed that the money raised so far was only 50,000 guilders, while 400,000 was needed to set up a hospital building. However, when a plot of land measuring 51,000 sq. metres was offered in Mangga Besar 124, he decided to buy it to build the future hospital.

His luck came in 1931 when Aw Boon Haw of the Tiger Balm enterprise was visiting Batavia and paid him a visit regarding a minor complaint. When Aw heard of Kwa's plan, he promised to donate a building for the hospital on the condition that it should be used for paying patients, who in the future, could help to increase funds of the hospital. This building was eventually completed in 1933 and the first patient to be admitted was none other than Aw Boon Par, brother of Aw Boon Haw.

In the meantime, Kwa was busy doing research for a cure for opium addicts. His findings were described and presented at the Eighth Congress of the Far Eastern Association of Tropical Medicine in Bangkok. At the time, the public was alarmed by the number of babies suffering from convulsions. The Jang Seng Ie Hospital then offered a 1000-guilder prize for the best solution to this problem. Winners of this prize were Drs W.J.C. Verhaart, De Lange, and Kwa himself. They jointly discovered that the reason was the lead content in the powder used for these babies. The prize money was donated to the children's fund of the hospital.

In September 1934, Kwa visited China as part of the Dutch East Indies delegation to the Ninth Congress of the Far Eastern Association of Tropical Medicine in Nanjing, held in the October the same year. Afterwards, he toured China to visit the cultural and historical, as well as the medical, health care, and agricultural sites. Every week, a column appeared in the Dutch edition of the Sin Po Weekly (Jakarta), in which he wrote about his impressions during the visits. Kwa was particularly interested in the health care projects, as health care in China was much more advanced than health care in the Indies, where not even a school of health care was available. He was also full of praise for the Chinese farmers, who were hard-working and resourceful; however, he commented that hygiene conditions were very much overlooked. He often had to stay in hotels without private bathrooms, and the communal toilets were not properly cleaned.

Kwa was also appalled by the many banners seen in small towns, with the announcement that 666? was offered, meaning that a medical doctor, together with traders in morphine, were offering morphine injections. The reason was that most of the patients wanted immediate relief of pain and did not believe in less effective medicine. He was most surprised when during a dinner invitation at the house of a colleague, the hostess offered opium to the guests. Kwa had already noticed the twitching around her mouth and the trembling of her hands during the dinner. When none of the guests accepted her offer, she just lay down on a sofa and started smoking herself, oblivious of her guests! He discussed the situation with her husband and that led to a cooperation on further opium research.

Back in Jakarta, he took up his practice again and continued with the expansion of the hospital. A children's pavilion and also a funeral parlour adjacent to the hospital was built by his friend, Liem Bwan Tjie, in 1938. Liem also built his residence, but the year of building is not available.

In addition to medical practice, Kwa was also concerned with socio-political problem in the Dutch East Indies. He and Kwee Kek Beng were invited by Soekarno to be special contributors to an Indonesian nationalist magazine in 1927. He was closely associated with the Sin Po Group and became China-oriented. Nevertheless, the Sin Po Group was also in favour of independence for Indonesia.

In April 1942, not quite two months after the Japanese invasion, Kwa was taken prisoner, together with most of the prominent members of the Chinese community and was only released on 22 August 1945. In the Bukit Duri prison, he was a member of the medical team and often had to go to the Central Hospital where he provided consultation. One day he was taken away by the Japanese in handcuffs, but was returned a few days later to continue his imprisonment. Nio Joe Lan who wrote about this incident in his memoirs about his own imprisonment, gave no further explanation.

After the Japanese surrender, he returned to his hospital again, but was not confined to it. Because of the revolution, refugees kept coming in, and, in the rural areas, health care was needed for the wounded guerilla fighters, as well as the common people. He started a Red Cross Fund to which people could donate money. It was a big success and every week, donations totalled 50,000 to 70,000 guilders. Medications and daily necessities were bought for, and brought to, the villages. Kwa often insisted on going to those places himself. In, 1948, the last villages they visited were in the province of Banten, west of Jakarta. During the trip, Kwa complained of tiredness. A few days later, while examining a patient, he collapsed and died a few hours later.

Kwa is survived by seven children including two sons from his first marriage, one of whom became a professor in medicine at the University of Texas in Houston, Texas, the United States. From his second marriage, he had one son, who became a prominent researcher at the Cancer Institute in Amsterdam. After his second wife passed away in 1930, he married Li Mey, who was Chinese-educated and was one of the earlier girls who had graduated from Gao Zhong (Higher Middle School) of the Pa Hua School in Jakarta. He had four children with her who are now living in China, to where she had moved in the 1960s.

Kwan Wai Meng, Robert

(关伟明, Guan Weiming, 1950–)
Entrepreneur, Singapore

Robert Kwan Wai Meng introduced McDonald's to Singapore. He was born in 1950, the only son of Kwan Sai Kheong and his wife Polly. He has a younger sister, Margaret. The Kwan family was poor and when Robert was born, they were living in a wooden shack with a zinc roof in Changi and his father made ends meet by playing the violin and saxophone at night clubs in the evening. However, the elder Kwan — a remarkable polymath of a man — rose quickly from being a teacher to becoming the Director of Education, and the family saw materially better days.

Robert Kwan was educated at Anglo-Chinese School. A keen sportsman, Kwan was a school water polo player and was good enough to represent Singapore in the sport, winning three gold medals. He left school at the age of 18, after completing his GCE 'A' level examinations to go into business. As a schoolboy, Kwan was already interested in doing business, rearing tropical fish for sale. He asked his father, University Vice-Chancellor, Kwan Sai Kheong to give him the money he had saved for his university education so that he could into business.

His first business venture was unsuccessful. He established Mei's Bookshop at Collyer Quay in 1968 and later became a wholesaler of plush toys, including Snoopy dolls. In 1975, while on a visit to see friends in the United States, he witnessed the pull of McDonald's and immediately approached the company's headquarters in Chicago for a franchise. After almost a year of correspondence, McDonald's told Kwan that he was not the right kind of person they were looking for. However, in 1977, they wrote him to say that were coming to Singapore and even though he had been rejected earlier, there was no harm in meeting up. This time, they were impressed with what Kwan was prepared to do to make McDonald's a success and in early 1978, a joint venture agreement was signed between Kwan and McDonald's Corporation and McDonald's Hongkong to form a company to operate the McDonald's franchise in Singapore. Robert Kwan was just only 27 years old.

For three months, Kwan and three others (selected to be store managers) went to Hongkong for a 9-month training stint, working their way up from the bottom. They mopped floors, cleaned toilets and learned every aspect of the business during 16-hour days, 7 days a week. This was followed by 3 months' training at McDonald's Hamburger University in the United States. The first McDonald's outlet opened in October 1979 at Liat Towers and it was an instant success. They did three times more business than what the optimistic Kwan had projected. They needed to expand quickly and three restaurants were opened within the 6 months. On 1 June 1981, McDonald's became the first restaurant to be operational at the new Changi International Airport. That year, Kwan's Liat Towers outlet registered the highest volume of sales of all McDonald's 6,500 outlets worldwide. By 1991, Kwan had established 37 McDonald's outlets in Singapore with over 3,000 employees. He was the winner in the Outstanding Manager Award category of the Singapore Business Awards that year. In 1993, McDonald's Singapore won the Max Lewis advertising award for innovative advertising.

Kwan ran McDonald's as managing director for more than 20 years. Throughout his time there, Kwan never stopped expanding, upgrading and innovating. In 2004, for example, hoping to cash in on the coffee craze in Singapore, Kwan introduced gourmet coffee to McDonald's by having upmarket McCafes located within McDonald's outlets.

In October 2002, he stepped down as managing director to assume the newly-created post of Chairman. Bernard Lee, general manager of McDonald's succeeded him as managing director. Over the years, Kwan had divested his 50% stake in McDonald's Singapore operations and speculation was rife that he would sell off the remaining 10% he held. At the time of his becoming Chairman of the company, McDonald's had 129 outlets in Singapore, generating a net profit of $28.5 million. In 1990, Kwan won the Business Times

Chief Executive Officer of the Year Award. In 2003, after cashing out of McDonald's, Kwan sunk $7.7 million for 18 million shares (or 9.2% of the share capital) of Full Apex, in its initial public offering.

Kwan was appointed the first chairman of the newly-created National Environment Council in 1990. Not one to shy away from controversy, Kwan ruffled feathers when he stated that Singapore was a major transhipment hub for smuggled birds protected under the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora (CITES). This accusation sent the authorities in the Primary Production Department (PPD) into an uproar and they countered that under CITES, only endangered species are protected, and not 'protected species'. Kwan also championed the saving of the last man-made duck pond in Marina South.

In 2004, Kwan was appointed executive chairman of Wildlife Reserves Singapore (WRS), the company responsible for operating Singapore Zoo, Night Safari and Jurong Bird Park. This post had been created specifically for Kwan to enable him to do whatever was necessary to arrest declining visitorship at the three attractions and to make them profitable. To do this, Kwan needed to quickly rationalise the business of the three attractions. By the time he retired in December 2007, he had succeeded in bringing the attractions under one umbrella and turning a profit. He also introduced several new initiatives and personally designed the free-ranging Orang Utan exhibit at the Zoo. In 2006, WRS also saw a record 3.3 million visitors. For his work at WRS, the Singapore Tourism Board gave him the Outstanding Contribution to Tourism Award. He was succeeded by Claire Chiang as non-executive chairman of WRS.

Kwan married his wife Pauline in 1981. They have three sons: Kevin, Colin and Alex.

Kwee Hing Tjiat

(郭恒节, Guo Hengjie, 1891–1939)

Journalist, polemicist, Indonesia

Kwee Hing Tjiat was a prominent Malay language journalist who delighted in political controversy and whose biting criticisms were no respecter of persons. Over his lifetime his political orientation moved from an identification with China and Chinese nationalism to an identification with Indonesia and Indonesians. His assimilationist ideas received little support in his lifetime, but found more fertile soil long after his death.

Kwee was born in 1891 in Surabaya, East Java, the fourth son of Kwee Swie Hian. He received a Dutch schooling, initially at the Buys Instituut and then at the Burgeravondschool (BAS — trade school). He worked for a while in an administrative job for businessman Oei Tiong Ham's company, Firma Kian Gwan, but soon turned to journalism, initially in Surabaya. His first venture in September 1911 was working for/starting the weekly publication, Asia. This was superseded in October 1913 by working for/establishing a new weekly, Bok Tok, which became Tjhoen Tjhioe the following year. In 1915 he moved to Yogyakarta where he published another weekly, Palita. These ventures, short-lived though they were, served to make his name as a committed journalist. In October 1915 he was invited by Hauw Tek Kong, the publisher of Sin Po in Jakarta, to become its deputy editor-in-chief and later its editor-in-chief.

His career at Sin Po also lasted only a few years during this period of political turmoil. Kwee led the attack by the China-oriented Sin Po against the Dutch policy that imposed the status of Netherlands subjects (onderdanen) on Peranakan Chinese, and urged them to reject it. When the colonial government made provision for Chinese representation in the proposed advisory Volksraad (People's Council), Kwee was prominent among those who persuaded a majority of the participants in a large conference in Semarang in 1917 to reject Chinese involvement in politics. Similarly, when in 1918 the colonial government proposed that its subjects should participate in Indië Weerbaar (defence of the Indies), Sin Po, under Kwee's leadership, argued that peranakan Chinese should resist such enlistment because they were aliens and had no interest in the defence of the Indies. Before the year was out, Kwee had resigned his position as editor-in-chief of Sin Po and became the head of a Chinese firm in Bali. However, the Chinese nationalist line that he had established at Sin Po was followed by his successors, Tjoe Bou San and Kwee Kek Beng.

Why did he abandon the position at the time? According to Suryadinata, citing an article in Sin Po on 2 September 1918, it was because "he could not stand the air in Jakarta". This may have been a euphemism. Kwee had a facility for making enemies. This had already been evident when he was working for Tjhoen Tjhioe in Surabaya when his articles criticizing the editor-in-chief Henri Borel proved so hurtful that Borel resigned. During his time with Sin Po, Kwee antagonized another Dutchman called Mouw, who was the head of the Office for Chinese Affairs (Kantoor voor Chineesche Zaken). This started with Kwee's criticism of Mouw for humiliating a Chinese workman. Mouw took offence at the criticism, which Kwee repeated even more virulently after Mouw tried to have it retracted by Sin Po. More seriously, Kwee later embarrassed Hauw Tek Kong, the director of the paper, in a matter that also involved Mouw. Hauw held the view, which Kwee contested, that Sin Po should have good relations with the Office for Chinese Affairs so that the newspaper could be well informed about the government's intentions towards the Chinese. Mouw informed Hauw, in strict confidence, that the government stood behind the Indië Weerbaar movement as it feared that Japan would take advantage of the turmoil of war in Europe to seize control of the Indies. Hauw passed this information on to Kwee — again in confidence — but Kwee proceeded to publish it in full without any prior discussion with Hauw. This naturally made Mouw angry with Hauw who, through Kwee's actions, was shown to be untrustworthy and unable to keep his word. Whether Hauw asked Kwee to resign or Kwee felt he should do so, it seems likely that this affair was the reason for his departure. Kwee's alienation of Mouw was to have even more serious consequences for him a few years later.

Kwee's new business job meant that he travelled frequently to China and Japan, and in 1920, he moved to Europe to look after the firm's business and stayed there for three years. Nonetheless he continued to work as a journalist, contributing articles to Sin Po, which attacked the Dutch Government and European colonialism in general. According to Kwee Tek Hoay, Mouw paid close attention to his writings, including one with the title "The White Peril" (Bahaja Poetih) attacking Governor-General Dirk Fock. In 1921, Kwee published his book, Doea Kapala Batoe (Two Stubborn Men) in Berlin. Presumably the first book in Malay to be printed and published in Germany, it is a lively, polemical work, conveying his thoughts on the situation of the Indies Chinese and the political currents amongst them. His own position remained firmly with the Chinese nationalist school of thought rather than with the pro-Dutch or socialist school. He believed it would prevail because it was correct. The Chinese in the Indies should retain their Chinese citizenship and be recognized, like the Japanese, as equal to the Europeans. Conflict between the advocates of the different nationalisms in the Indies (Dutch, Chinese and Native) would only be resolved on the basis of mutual acceptance and respect. In an early hint of a later change in his thinking, he wrote in this book that he could "not yet believe in the assimilation sought by Dr (W.E. Burghardt) du Bois", the famous African-American activist and scholar.

While he was in Europe, Kwee was true to his own earlier beliefs, however. He used a Chinese rather than a Dutch passport because he thought of himself as a Chinese citizen. When he returned to the Indies in 1923, Kwee was denied a visa and refused admission to the country. There were widespread protests that he should be allowed to return, but the colonial government, relying on the advice of Mouw, held firm and deported him. The British authorities would not allow him to enter Hong Kong either, so he then settled in Shanghai for the next decade. Although hitherto Kwee had identified strongly with China, living there proved to be a form of exile for him. Born and raised in Java with a Dutch education, and unable to understand Chinese, he was in reality an alien in China. He continued to write from Shanghai for the Malay press in Java, especially for the Surabaya magazine, Hoakiao, of which he was a member of the editorial board. His journalism remained controversial and polemical. He continued the critique of the Tiong Hoa Hwe Koan (THHK) Chinese school system that he had started in Doea Kapala Batoe, and in 1925 called for the THHK to be "dumped". In articles in Hoakiao in 1926, he attacked the Confucian Religion Association (Khong Kauw Hwee) and the teachings of Confucius. According to Kwee, the teachings of Confucius were incompatible with the spirit of Chinese nationalism and had made China weak. Moreover, he asserted that the leaders of the Confucian Religion Association didn't understand the teachings of the sage. His attack was similar to the one launched some years earlier in a special issue of the weekly edition of Sin Po (21 April 1923), which was prompted by the decision taken at a conference in Yogyakarta to form a General Association of Confucian Religion (Khong Kauw Tjong Hwee).

After this controversy, Kwee devoted himself to a business he set up in Shanghai, importing timber and rattan from Samarinda. He seldom wrote and declined the offer of a teaching position at Jinan University. He was eventually permitted to return to Java in 1934, with a guarantee from Oei Tjong Hauw, son and business successor of Oei Tiong Ham. The Oei Tiong Ham Concern (OTHC) promised him the position of editor-in-chief of a new daily newspaper, Mata Hari, which first appeared in Semarang in August 1934. Once again Kwee created a storm by writing an editorial titled, Baba Dewasa (A Mature Baba [peranakan]). He now proposed that the peranakan Chinese in Indonesia should take their place as "Sons of Indonesia" (Poetra Indonesia) and went on to argue that they should assimilate totally into indigenous communities. This agenda went well beyond even Liem Koen Hian's Partai Tionghoa Indonesia (PTI – Indonesian Chinese Party) and was criticized by many Chinese and indigenous Indonesians. It was too radical to gain support in the 1930s, but in the 1960s, an emergent assimilationist movement claimed him as a pioneer.

Kwee enjoyed considerable editorial independence — to the extent that he labelled the Chung Hwa Hui, which was fully supported by the OTHC, an opportunistic organization. The company may have allowed him this latitude so that his controversial stands would boost the paper's circulation and profitability. But when Mata Hari refused to join an anti-Japanese boycott and continued to accept Japanese advertisements after the outbreak of full hostilities between China and Japan in 1937, both Kwee and the company were attacked by the peranakan press and the Chinese community and the paper's circulation declined drastically.

Kwee was in poor health in his later years and died on 27 June 1939 aged forty-seven. His fearless and critical journalism was widely appreciated, even by those he had criticized severely. One exception to this was Kwee Kek Beng, his successor at Sin Po, who was apparently unable to forgive his apostasy from the Chinese nationalist cause. Kwee Hing Tjiat married only three years before his death, and had no children.

Kwee Tek Hoay

(郭德怀, Guo Dehuai, 1896–1951)
Writer, religious leader, Indonesia

Kwee Tek Hoay was a very able writer. He was a novelist, playwright, philosopher and a scholar in religion. He is less well-known as a commentator on the Chinese community and politics, or as a steadfast proponent of the Sam Kauw religion (Tridharma).

Kwee's father was a small textile trader in West Java. Some say Kwee attended a Dutch private school, but others believe that he went to a traditional Chinese (Hokkien) school and studied English with a tutor. He received little formal education, but could read Dutch and English and was fluent in Malay. His talent in writing was apparent from youth. He published his first play, Allah yang Palsu (A False God), in 1919 in which he criticized the Chinese community for worshipping money. He also wrote for the Chinese Peranakan daily in Jakarta, Sin Po, which supported Chinese nationalism. Later, he became editor-in-chief of Sin Bin in Bandung. Sin Bin belonged to Sin Po.

Kwee was also active in Tiong Hoa Hwe Koan (THHK), a Chinese organization that ran Chinese schools. THHK was related to the Confucian religion. Kwee's knowledge of Confucianism is reflected in Kwee's conservative opinions that stressed order in his writings on society and politics before the early 1930s but this did not mean that Kwee was unaware of the shortcomings in Confucian teachings.

When Indonesian Nationalist Party (PNI) leaders were rounded up by the Dutch in 1929, Kwee wrote that the PNI was headed by intellectuals who "wouldn't arbitrarily take shortsighted actions". Kwee stated that the PNI was different from the PKI and thus criticized the Dutch government for suppressing the PNI. Kwee thought that the Chinese inhabitants of Indonesia must sympathize with the Indonesian nationalist movement.

Kwee had made an in-depth study of the THHK movement and Chinese education. His work Asal Moelahnja Timboel Pergerakan Tionghoa jang Modern di Indonesia [The Origin of the Modern Chinese Movement in Indonesia] discussed the background of the Chinese movement, which centred on the founding of THHK in 1900 in Java. Kwee explained that the organization aimed to modernize Chinese customs and Confucian teachings were used to address this problem. To study Confucius, the command of the Chinese language was necessary. Therefore, THHK established schools and later specialized in managing educational issues. Kwee understood the situation then and had access to important materials. This merited an English translation of Kwee's study by Professor Lea E. Williams which was published by Cornell University.

With the influence of Chinese nationalism and the influx of immigrants to Indonesia, the Peranakan-controlled THHK schools were gradually managed by the Totok (newcomers). After the founding of THHK, the Dutch colonial government, which had previously neglected education for the Chinese, set up HCS, a Dutch school for Chinese children with similar curricula to those in European schools.

Kwee lived in West Java and was active in THHK and Djawa Hak Boe Tjong Hwee (All-Java Organization for Educational Affairs), a Chinese educational organization. The organization, in 1919, suggested that the THHK school curriculum be adapted to conditions in Indonesia but his proposal was not implemented. Kwee felt that the THHK schools were "stuffed with ideas about how to use one's energy to bring progress, to support China, to raise the status of one's race, and so on, all in the nationalist character. At HCS, one is immersed in everything western". He further complained that an HCS education pushed Peranakan Chinese to become clerks or low-level officials.

Kwee connected education with the economic status of the Peranakan Chinese. He pointed out that the Peranakan were losing out in competition to the Totok who would take over the fields controlled by Peranakan: automobiles, buses, printing, produce and drinks companies, batik factories, and rice mills. In addition, he thought that to get a job in European stores, the Peranakan Chinese had to compete with Eurasians and native Indonesians. Kwee felt that Chung Hwa Hui Dutch East Indies Organization was not able to do much for the Peranakan. To prove that Chinese did not dominate the economy and that wealthy Chinese were few, Kwee quoted the Batavia Nieuwsblad which had published some figures showing that there were 21 millionaires in Java. Kwee said that the ratio of European to Chinese inhabitants was 2:10, but the economic strength of the Europeans to Chinese was 10:1.

Kwee disagreed with the leaders of Sin Po, especially Kwee Kek Beng. They differed on the question of education for Peranakan Chinese children, on the issue of citizenship or sovereignty which was closely tied to Chinese participation in the government of the Dutch East Indies, and on the matter of sending young Peranakan to China as soldiers. The Sin Po Group wanted the Peranakan to speak Chinese like the Totok, supported the THHK schools and opposed the segregation of Peranakan and Totok. Kwee, however, believed that wealthy Peranakans should attend Dutch schools that also taught Chinese language and culture while poor Peranakan could attend Malay schools.

On citizenship, the Sin Po Group felt that the Chinese in the Netherlands Indies were still Chinese, not Dutch subjects. In 1919, Sin Po sponsored a campaign among the Chinese to bring down the Dutch Sovereignty Law and found support in the Netherlands Indies. But the campaign did not convince the Peranakan to consider themselves as Chinese citizens because China acknowledged the jurisdiction of the Dutch colonial government over the Peranakan who were born and lived in the Netherlands Indies.

As the number of Dutch-educated Peranakan increased and the Dutch colonial policies towards the Chinese changed, the ideas espoused by Sin Po faltered. In 1927, this issue came up again, and Kwee supported the Peranakan who wanted participation in the government. The Peranakan were Dutch subjects to Kwee, and therefore, had to guard their own interests.

Kwee's concept of "Chinese" meant Peranakan who spoke Malay or western languages as their native tongue but held fast to Chinese tradition. He believed that the Peranakan could not become Totok again. In his view, Peranakan Chinese should be given the same rights and responsibilities as native Indonesians, including the right to own farm land, but Sin Po called for the Chinese in the Netherlands Indies to be made equal to the Europeans and Japanese (who had the same status as the Dutch). Perhaps Kwee realized that, in practice, the Chinese would not be given equal status as the Dutch because the government did not want to encourage feelings of nationalism among native Indonesians.

Kwee supported the idea of Liem Koen Hian (Soeara Publiek) and Chung Hwa Hui (CHH) members who believed that the Peranakan were Dutch subjects who must participate in government, but Kwee was antagonistic towards the Sin Po Group. He felt that Sin Po had misled the Chinese, particularly in the Yi Yung Thoan or "the Brave and Just Brigade" incident. Peranakan youths were sent to China to help the government of the south fight north mercenaries but many, who could not stand the hardships, fled and foundered. Kwee criticized Sin Po in Panorama, a magazine he headed, and even wrote a play "Yi Yung Thoan Victims" in 1928.

As the Chinese movement gained momentum in the Netherlands Indies, Kwee was more affected by Confucianism. He believed that the Khong Kauw Hwee (Khonghucu Religious Organization) leaders did not know much about Confucianism, and the way Khong Kauw Hwee spread the religion was outdated. Over time, spiritualism and reincarnation became dominant themes in his literary works, including his famous novel Kembang Roos dari Tjikembang (The Rose of Tjikembang) (1927) and his best novel Drama dari Boven Digul (Drama from Boven Digul) in the 1930s.

Kwee spread Sam Kauw, or (the three religions together), Confucianism, Buddhism, and Taoism. When Kwee founded Sam Kauw Hwee (Three Religions Organization), he wrote in the magazine Sam Kauw Gwat Po that "they do not mean to forge the three religions into one but rather to maintain the identity of each".

To attract followers, Kwee incorporated the Chinese culture in Indonesia into Sam Kauw. Actually Kwee wished to give meaning and rationale to Chinese customs and wanted the Peranakan to maintain their Chinese identity. Sam Kauw (later called Tridharma) followers were generally Peranakan.

Kwee Tek Hoay, the pioneer of Sam Kauw, continued to be active in the organisation up to the end of his life. Even during dangerous times when the elderly Kwee lived in Cicurug, he continued to be present at the organization's meetings in Jakarta. Finally Kwee was found dead in his yard on 15 July 1951. His body was cremated according to his wish. It is said that this proponent of Tridharma pioneered the practice of cremation in Jakarta.

Kwek Leng Beng

(郭令明, Guo Lingming, 1941–)
Property developer, hotelier, Singapore

Kwek Leng Beng has distinguished himself as a bargain hunter in property and hotel deals. He made headlines in 1995 when he teamed up with Saudi Prince Alwaleed Talal Alsaud to buy Plaza Hotel in New York from Donald Trump. The hotel was sold in 2004 for a record price of US$675 million. In 1999, he bagged the trophy Seoul Hotel at a global auction. Through Hong Kong-listed CDL Hotels and its London-listed subsidiary, Millenium & Copthorne Hotels, Kwek has made his presence felt on the global business. He was named "Tourism Entrepreneur of the Year" by the Singapore Tourism Board. At home, his property arm, City Developments, was the top seller of private condominiums in 2007 in terms of the number of units sold. U.S. magazine, Forbes, in 2006 ranked him the second richest man in Singapore and put his wealth at US$3.6 billion.

Kwek is a second-generation businessman who built on the success of his predecessor and expanded the business footprint beyond Singapore and the region. His father, Fujian-born Kwek Hong Png, came to Singapore and worked as an apprentice in a hardware store for twelve years before striking out on his own. The elder Kwek set up Hong Leong Company in 1941 to deal in ropes, paint, ship supplies, and rubber estate supplies. After the Second World War, the elder Kwek seized the opportunities and made a fortune from rubber plantations and properties.

Kwek was born in Singapore in 1941, the eldest of five children. As with many Chinese families, Kwek as the eldest son was the natural choice to succeed his father in the business. On graduating from the University of London with a law degree in 1963, he wanted to play a backroom role in his father's business and help in making the organization more efficient. But the elder Kwek had a bigger plan for him, redirecting him to sales and deal making instead. The training stint was rigorous. Kwek recalled how one day in 1968, "I felt so pressured by my old man and sought refuge in Penang for a few weeks to escape his shellings."

Kwek was inducted into Hong Leong Finance Limited in 1966 as director. King's Hotel (now known as Copthorne King's Hotel) at Havelock Road, which opened in 1970, was his first hotel. In 1972, he acquired a controlling interest of the public listed property developer, City Developments Limited (CDL), which is now one of Singapore's largest listed property companies by market capitalization.

Between October 1984 and August 1990, Kwek took over the chairmanship from his father of an array of companies, including the family holding company, Hong Leong Holdings. He stepped out of his father's shadow from 1989 when he set up the Hong Kong listed CDL Hotels International to drive his global hotel buying spree. With more than US$20 billion in diversified assets spread worldwide, an annual turnover of US$4.55 billion, six listed companies trading on stock markets in Singapore, Hong Kong, and London, and a global staff strength of over 40,000, the Hong Leong Group is now a global player engaged in a wide range of businesses in the Asia Pacific, Europe, North America, and the Middle East.

Kwek prides himself in being a bargain hunter. He has described himself as "the first Singaporean to grab opportunities to buy hotel cheap" in Europe and the United States. His interviews with the media have often been peppered with remarks such as: "We've always stressed that we're not going to be emotional and pay high prices for the sake of adding numbers. I will go ahead with an acquisition if I think the price is right."; "Your timing has to be right to make the best profit."; "You have to be very bottom-line and cash flow-minded. I'm a financier. I look at the bottom-line, cash flow." With this business philosophy, the Hong Leong Group survived the Asian Financial Crisis in 1997 and still recorded profits during those turbulent times.

Kwek's acumen as a businessman and entrepreneur has won him many accolades such as: the "Businessman of the Year" title from the Singapore Business Times; "Outstanding Contributor to Tourism" honour from the Singapore Tourism Board; "Tourism Entrepreneur of the Year" award from the Singapore Tourism Board; "Business Achiever Award" from Yazhou Zhoukan (a Chinese weekly), and "Asian Hotelier of the Decade" title from the Asia Pacific Hotel Industry Investment Conference (organized by Jones Lang Lasalle Hotels and Arthur Anderson).

He was also conferred an honorary doctorate in Business Administration in Hospitality from the Johnson & Wales University (Rhode Island, the United States) and an honorary doctorate (DUniv) from Oxford Brookes University (the United Kingdom).

Kwek has been roped in by Singapore government agencies to serve in different capacities on various committees, such as being chairman of Hub Services Subcommittee (June 1997), a member of the Board of Trustees of the Singapore Management University (March 2000 to 2003), and a member of the steering committee of Tourism 21. But his views, though taken seriously, have not always been shared by the government. And his Hong Leong Finance, the largest finance company in Singapore, has stopped short of having a full-banking licence.

However Kwek's ambition is to be a global enterpreneur through acquisitions. As early as 1971, when he was given the tourism award, Kwek proclaimed that Singaporeans could be world-class hoteliers. At the award citation, the then Singapore Tourism Promotion Board said that Kwek was one of a breed of Singapore businessmen who dared to dream big and had made a mark internationally. Kwek also talked about grouping together Singapore hoteliers under the Singapore flag and having a Singapore Inc. chain to become a world-class name just like the Hyatt, Hilton, and Sheraton all are. He said: "I want to do some more to carry the Singapore flag, set an example for other Singapore companies. I'm not selfish in that respect."

Kwek has one brother and three sisters. His half-brother, Leng Joo, is executive director of the Hong Leong Group and managing director of City Developments. Kwek also has a billionaire cousin by the name of Quek Leng Chan, head of the Hong Leong Group in Malaysia. (Quek and Kwek are written the same way in Chinese) Quek Leng Chan is the son of Kwek Hong Lye, the brother of Kwek's father. Kwek Hong Lye was sent by Kwek's father in 1963 to then what was Malaya to extend the family's operations there. Over time, the Malaysian branch has grown substantially into one of the biggest conglomerates in Malaysia. When Kwek Hong Lye died in 1996, Quek Leng Chan took over the Malaysian business.

Though both sides continued to hold shares in each other's companies, Kwek Leng Beng from Singapore, and Quek Leng Chan from Malaysia, have kept to their respective turfs and coexisted. Talks have surfaced now and then about possible joint ventures between the two, but they have yet to materialize into significant businesses. Kwek has denied that there is any family feud between them. He said: "Leng Chan had a disagreement with my old man. But I was a neutral party. It was not personal."

Kwek is married to lawyer Cecilia Kok Phooi Lin. They have two children. Those close to him say the disciplined tycoon rises for a game of tennis each morning and keeps a twelve-hour days. In one of the media interviews, he said: "My motto has always been to work hard, talk less and do more."

Meanwhile, Kwek Leng Beng has been on the prowl again since the U.S. subprime crisis happened with asset prices worldwide taking a hit. As Kwek says he's always waiting for the right moment to buy.

Kwik Djoen Eng

(郭春秧, Guo Chunyang, 1895–1935)

Owner of a large trading company dealing in sugar, rice and tea before WWII, Indonesia

Kwik Djoen Eng was the owner of one of the biggest Chinese trading companies in Semarang, Trading Society Kwik Hoo Tong Ltd. (KHT, 郭河东), a strong competitor of Kian Gwan in the 1920s. The company was multinational and had an extensive network of branches and agencies all over East and Southeast Asia. Kwik Djoen Eng was a Taiwan sekimin (台湾籍民), that is, a Japanese subject who enjoyed European status in the Dutch colonies. As such he had close relations with the Netherlands, Taiwan, Japan, and China. He was one of the foremost clients of de Javasche Bank (JB) owing to his stake in the sugar trade, and also as chairman of the tea association in Taipei, and an adviser of the Japan China South Bank.

Kwik Djoen Eng (in Dutch Indies' Hokkien) or Guo Chunyang (in Mandarin), was born in Tongan district in Fujian, China, the third son of Kwik Hoo Pek. In 1876 when he was seventeen years old, he moved to Java with his uncle, Kwik Hoo Tong, who was engaged in the trading business in Java under a kongsi (company) named Gin Mo Ho. Kwik learned the trade through travelling in the interior of Central Java. After the Kwik family registered their kongsi as an unlimited company, NV Handelsmaatschappij Kwik Hoo Tong (Trading Society Kwik Hoo Tong, KHT) in 1894, the company developed rapidly. The main business was trading in sugar, rice, tea, and agricultural products. Under Kwik Djoen Eng, who was appointed managing director in 1911, KHT's business expanded, almost ranking with Kian Gwan, which was under Oei Tiong Ham. By the 1920s KHT had set up agencies in Surabaya, Yogyakarta, Solo, Cilacap, Singapore, Xiamen, Shanghai, Hankow (Hankou), Tientsin (Tianjin), Chinkiang (Jinjiang), Hong Kong and Taipei, and established representative offices in Kobe and Osaka in Japan.

KHT's success was largely attributable to Kwik's multinational approach. He established close relations not only with the colonial institutions, but also with the Taiwanese, Japanese, and Chinese authorities. Even in the early days of KHT, Kwik Djoen Eng was JB's foremost client in the principalities of Solo and Yogyakarta.

At the beginning of the twentieth century, when KHT started exporting sugar, Kwik enjoyed credit facilities from JB. That business was highly profitable and developed rapidly. By 1910 KHT had become a client of major commercial banks in the Dutch East Indies. At the beginning of the 1910s Kwik tried to set up his own sugar factory in Fujian, China, but failed.

During World War I, KHT enjoyed considerable success in the sugar export trade and the company quickly became one of the leading sugar exporters in Java. KHT was given advances by four Dutch financial institutions amounting to 30.3 million guilders. While many Chinese sugar traders went bankrupt because of the lack of shipping and financial facilities in 1917, KHT and Kian Gwan were the only two Chinese firms to continue with their businesses.

At the height of the Javanese sugar industry in the 1920s, KHT was always listed among the five biggest exporters in the world, the others being Kian Gwan, Fraser Eaton, Erdman Sielken, and Suzuki Co. Japan. KHT exported Javanese sugar to China, Hong Kong, Singapore, British India, and Europe. Kwik was also successful in the tea business. He made use of his connections with Taiwan and Japan as a Taiwan sekimin, a status which enabled him to have access to Japanese shipping and banking credits.

Taiwan sekimin means " persons who are registered in Taiwan", and those who became Japanese subjects after the Sino-Japanese War (1894–95). In 1899, Japanese "citizens" in the Dutch East Indies were given European status; this ruling applied not only to migrants from Japan proper, but also to inhabitants of Japanese colonies. Some Chinese in the Indies who were given discriminatory status such as "foreign orientals" in colonial Indonesia were quick to see the advantages of registering themselves as "Japanese", and Kwik was one of them. He obtained this status around 1903 on the basis of his being a Taiwan sekimin.

Kwik's interest in the tea business had started since the 1880s. In 1903 he sent some Taiwanese Baozhong tea (包种茶) to the Osaka Exhibition and won the first prize. Baozhong tea is a kind of Chinese tea with a jasmine flavour. After the Taiwanese Government began promoting of the tea, business took off. Kwik believed that Java would be a huge market for this product as nearly half a million Chinese were living there. He opened an agency in Taipei, branded the product Ching Siong, and started exporting to Java. He was appointed chairman of the Tea Association in Taipei. When the Dutch colonial exhibition was held in Semarang in 1914, the Japanese Government built a Taiwanese-style tea house promoting Baozhong tea. Two years later, the quantity of tea imported from Taiwan to Java increased to 2,855 tons, a tenfold increase in five years. One third of it was handled by Kwik's relations with Taiwan and Japan were not confined to the tea business. He actively supported Japanese economic expansion in Southeast Asia. For instance, he supported Kazue Tsutsumibayashi, his legal adviser, in opening a Japanese shop (Toko Jepang). In 1912 he proposed a joint venture bank between Japan and the Chinese in Southeast Asia. This idea was accepted by the Japanese Government, but was postponed because of World War I. The plan was later realized through the setting up of the Japan China South Bank in 1919, with its head office in Taipei, and branches in some important cities in China and Southeast Asia. Kwik was appointed an adviser to the bank.

Kwik also invested in a warehouse company, Nanyo Veem, which was founded by Taiwan Bank in 1920. Such facilities provided by the Taiwanese Government complemented his sugar business. In the 1920s, KHT obtained credits from Taiwan Bank. In turn, businessmen such as Kwik, who knew the Javanese market well, were very valuable for the Taiwanese and Japanese Governments. As Kwik held dual nationality (Japanese and Chinese), he was able to make use of this to offset the risks. In the 1920s, he left Java to do business in Hong Kong where he imported a huge amount of Javanese sugar for the Chinese market. Using the name Ching Siong Land Investment for this business, he started a project in the reclaimed area of North Point to build a modern sugar factory. The construction continued until 1927, but hardly any progress was made thereafter. Now his legacy remains through Chun Yeung (春秧) Street (in North Point), which is the Cantonese pronunciation of Djoen Eng.

KHT's business in Java was passed on to his first son, Kwik Siang Kaw. But KHT's financial situation gradually deteriorated in the 1920s. In 1927 the company suffered heavy losses through its sugar business, which led to its voluntary liquidation in 1934. In the following year, seventy-seven-year-old Kwik Djoen Eng passed away in Taipei.

Kwik Djoen Eng was also known as a charitable person. He was a devout Confucian, and used to order textbooks on Confucian teaching from Shanghai for Chinese elementary schools in Java. In Japan he donated 300,000 yen to co-establish a Confucian association with a famous Japanese entrepreneur, Shibusawa Eiichi. But the plan was not realized. Kwik was also one of the founders of a Chinese English School in Semarang.

In China Kwik donated a large amount of money to his lineage temple in Tongan and established a primary school. As chairman of a fund-raising committee at the time of the 1911 Chinese Revolution, he raised $200,000 abroad.

Kwik Kian Gie

(郭建义, Guo Jianyi, 1935–)
Economist, political leader, Indonesia

Kwik Kian Gie is a respectable economist and leading political activist who is admired for his courage in criticizing various corrupt practices. He has served as cabinet minister twice since the fall of Soeharto. In the 1999 Kompas opinion poll of eighty-five top Indonesian economists, he was voted the most admired economist by Kompas readers (42 per cent), followed by Sri Mulyani, then minister of the economy and finance (23.2 per cent), and Emil Salim (16.5 per cent).

Born in Juwana (Central Java) on 11 January 1935 into a Peranakan family, Kwik is number five of seven siblings. Although he does not speak Chinese, his religion is registered as Confucianism.

He graduated from a local secondary school (commerce stream) in 1955 and continued his studies at the Faculty of Economics at the University of Indonesia, Jakarta, for one year before going to Holland. During his student years, he was president of the Indonesian Students' Association (Perhimpunan Pelajar Indonesia) and active in student politics. In 1963 he obtained a Drs degree from the Nederlandsche Economische Hoogeschool, Rotterdam (presently the Erasmus Universiteit Rotterdam). After graduation he worked in the Indonesian embassy in the Hague. In 1965 he established an import-export company there, but the company did not do well and was eventually closed down. He continued to work in the Netherlands for a few years before returning to Indonesia in 1970.

Kwik was active in business for twenty-five (1964-89) years, but in 1989 gave it up to concentrate on educational matters and politics. In the field of education, he established the Institut Bisnis dan Informatika Indonesia (IBII) in 1987 and became its director. Kwik was also an executive committee member of the Trisakti University Foundation (Jakarta) between 1970 and 1992. In 1983 he was one of the founders of the Management Institute of Prasetya Mulya and served as its director until 1988. From 1988 to 1992 he was a member of the supervisory council of the Management Institute of Prasetya Mulya, and secretary of the daily committee of the Prasetya Mulya Foundation. He gave up all these positions in October 1992.

Kwik has also been active in politics. Known as an effective speaker, he joined the PDI (Indonesian Demokrasi Party) and participated in the 1987 parliamentary elections but was defeated. Between 1987 and 1992 he was a member of the MPR (People's Consultative Assembly) working committee, representing the PDI. He was barred from participating in the 1992 parliamentary elections due to late registration. He was chairman of the Research and Development Body of the PDI and was sympathetic to small and medium enterprises (SMEs) while criticizing big businesses for being unfair. The PDI split into two factions and Kwik sided with the Megawati faction, but this faction was derecognized by the Soeharto regime. When Soeharto stepped down and his deputy, J.B. Habibie, became the president, Kwik was offered a cabinet position which he declined. He was reluctant to serve in a cabinet with what he believed to be "doubtful legitimacy".

After the fall of Soeharto, the Megawati faction of the PDI was recognized as a political party and its name was changed to PDI-P (Partai Domokrasi Indonesia-Perjuangan) and Kwik then participated in the parliamentary elections representing it. When Abdurrachman Wahid became the president of Indonesia, Kwik was appointed the coordinating minister for Economics and Finance (1999–2000). Many big businesses were critical of him and eventually he was forced to resign. During the Megawati presidency, he was made minister of National Development Planning cum head of the Bappenas (National Planning Institute) for 2001-04. Again he continued to be outspoken during his term as cabinet minister and was a severe critic of corruption and nepotism. In November 2001 Kwik made a well known speech on the "Effective use of foreign aid", which shocked the Consultative Group on Indonesia (CGI), an international body which gave aid to Indonesia:

> I feel totally embarrassed to be confronted with the task to justify an activity, which essentially amounts to begging for debt [loan] on behalf of our nation.…I cannot promise you that some of this new debt [sic] will not be corrupted again as it has been in the past…Aid funding is considered effective if it reaches [the targeted people] without waste or corruption.…In addition, since the crisis of 1997, the government has not only been burdened by the debt repayments, but also by the massive theft and corruption performed by a handful of conglomerates.

However his crusade to eradicate corruption and nepotism was not successful.

Kwik saw himself as a member of the Indonesian nation, and declared himself an Indonesian nationalist without changing his name. He was of the view that Chinese Indonesians were "assimilated" (berbaur) culturally, but continued to be separated by both the indigenous and the Chinese populations. He commented that this was a state of mind which should be changed. He believed that the Indonesian nation building process had to continue. As to how one could contribute to nation building in Indonesia, Kwik said (in 1998) that it was through actively joining an Indonesian socio-political party, in his case, the PDI. Nevertheless he also said:

> I have integrated into [Indonesian] society and have taken an active role in the social and political organization in Indonesia. For me, the racial problem which occurs from time to time is a disease embedded in this nation. Therefore as a member of this nation, I have chosen to stay home [that is, not leave the country], and tried my best to help cure this disease. I would like to stress that this attitude is subjective as my environment is a subjective one; this is not a criticism of others who do not do it my way.

Kwik has been a frequent contributor to Kompas and has published several books, including Konglomerat Indonesia: Permasalahan dan Sepakterjangnya (Indonesian conglomerates: its problems and behaviour) (Jakarta, 1991), as co-editor; Saya Bermimpi Jadi Konglomerat (I dream of becoming a tycoon) (Jakarta, 1993); Analisis Ekonomi Politik Indonesia (Indonesia's political economy: An analysis) (Jakarta, 1994); Pikiran yang Terkorupsi (Corrupted mind, 2006, 2008), which consists of his essays published in Kompas between 1999 and 2006, and a companion volume entitled Kebijakan Ekonomi Politik dan Hilangnya Nalar (Political economic policies and the loss of logical reasoning, published by Kompas) in 2006.

While studying in the Netherlands Kwik married a Dutch woman, Edith Johanna de Wit, with whom he has one son and two daughters. The son graduated from Stanford University and received a master's degree from Syracuse University (USA). The second child, a daughter, graduated from her father's alma mater in the Netherlands and lives with her mother, while the third child, another daughter, graduated from IBII in Jakarta and works as an entrepreneur.

Kyaw Khine

(林成隆, Lin Chenglong, 1917–95)
Businessman, community leader, Myanmar

Kyaw Khine was a resourceful and resilient businessman. His career suffered a series of setbacks, and he even had to start from scratch, but he was never disheartened and eventually succeeded. He gave back to the society by taking up leadership positions in both Chinese community organizations and educational institutes.

Kyaw Khine was born in 1917. His father, Lin Yinshui (林银水), came to Burma to earn a living in Wakema, a small town in the Irrawaddy Delta in Lower Burma, during the turbulent years following the downfall of the Qing Dynasty, when China was ruled by warlords.

In 1920, when he was three years old, and the situation in China stablilized, his parents took him back to their native village, Donglian Village in Luoyang (洛阳), Hui-an County (惠安), Fujian, China. However, within a year, after the outbreak of an epidemic disease in the native village, eight persons in his family, including his parents, caught that deadly disease and died the same day.

The young Kyaw Khine survived, but became an orphan under the care of his grandmother who raised him. At the age of eight, he began basic Chinese education under private tuition in the village. He terminated the tuition after one year when his grandmother became blind. U Kyaw Khine then had to start earning a living for himself as a child-labourer, doing whatever was available for him to bring food home.

In 1928, his uncle, Lin Zi Qiong, a migrant to Burma, returned to China for a visit and saw their poor situation. He took pity on them and thus brought Kyaw Khine, who had then turned twelve, to Burma and enrolled him in a mission school. After that, Lin sent him to the north-west of Burma to attend Guang Hua School and, at the same time, learn to work for one year. At the age of fourteen, the youth left school and entered the world of business. It was then that U Kyaw Khine started to display his intelligence and picked up trading, which became his livelihood and marked the start of his success in later years.

When he was eighteen, Kyaw Khine set up a transport company in Mandalay to transport dried fish and shrimp from the Irrawaddy Delta in Lower Burma to Mandalay. From Mandalay, he transported bean produce and other local products to Lower Burma. Through his transportation business, he gradually became a domestic trader in commodities. In 1927, when he was twenty, his two granduncles returned to China for their retirement. He took over as general manager, managing the five branch offices left behind by his granduncles.

In 1942, when the Japanese invaded Burma, U Kyaw Khine left Burma with his wife and two children to seek refuge in his ancestral village in China until the end of the Japanese Occupation. The family returned to Burma from China via Thailand empty-handed in 1946. He had to start all over again and got himself a job as a shopkeeper. It was in 1952 that he was appointed by Haji Salmon Co. Ltd., an international company run by Indians, to manage their business. He made a profit for the company and was recognized as an outstanding staff member.

Then in 1955, Kyaw Khine struck out on his own and set up a company called Dong Ya Trading Agent Co. The company operated as an agent of China goods and products of Mitsubishi Co. Ltd. of Japan. He imported a complete machinery plant from Shanghai and set up factories for the production of pins and control buttons. He also sent technicians to China to learn new technologies for the factories. However, disaster struck again in 1963 when the Myanmar Government nationalized all businesses.

In 1967, the government discriminated overseas Chinese in Myanmar. The "6.26" incident broke out on 26 June 1967 in Rangoon. U Kyaw Khine, together with several locally born Chinese, including Yang Lao Qing and Wang Si Hua, were arrested by the Myanmar Government as patriotic Chinese. Fortunately, they were all discharged after the intervention of the Chinese Embassy. In the China Daily 《人民日报》on 28 February 1968, the Chinese Government praised them as "Good children of Zhonghua, China; and also good models of all Overseas Chinese!"

When the Myanmar Government amended the nationalization policy in 1973, private enterprise sectors were again reopened, and the government compensated those who had suffered losses in the nationalization process. U Kyaw Khine, undeterred by his failures and difficulties in life, restarted his business with the approval of the government. His main focus was then the local products of Myanmar.

Then in 1988, when Myanmar began her open-door policy and market-oriented economy, U Kyaw Khine seized the new opportunity to expand his businesses. He set up a company called Shwe Myanmar Co. Ltd., which involved exporting Myanmar products worldwide. This was when his career finally took off.

As a leader in the Chinese community, U Kyaw Khine took up several responsibilities, including being chairman of the Myanmar Overseas Chinese Charity Association; chairman of the Yangon Jiu Long Tang, Lin Clan House; acting president of Jian De Zhong Tang ; vice chairman, Fu Jian Tong Xiang Hui (Hokkien Kongsi). He was also chairman of the biggest Chinese secondary schools in Myanmar, namely Hua Qiao Zhong Xue (华侨中学) and Nanyang Zhong Xue (南洋中学). U Kyaw Khine's leadership role and contributions were also recognized by the Chinese Government. In 1981, he was invited as a distinguished guest to attend the 70th Anniversary Ceremony of the Xin-hai Revolution (辛亥革命), organized by the Foreign Affairs Ministry of the Chinese Government.

U Kyaw Khine died in 1995 as a result of old aged sickness.

Kyee Paw

(柯聚宝, Ke Jubao, 1917–2008)

President of Burma Medical Association, the first cardiothoracic surgeon, Myanmar

Dr U Kyee Paw was former president of the Burma Medical Association, British Medical Association, American College of Surgeons, International College of Surgeons, College of Cardiothoracic Physicians, and International Academy of Proctology, and a member of the Burma Medical Council. He was also a member of the Burma Medical Registration Board and was reported by medical journalists to be the first surgeon to succeed in thoracic and cardiac surgery in Burma under the British colonial administration. He pioneered several surgical procedures, some of which are still practised by medical surgeons today.

U Kyee Paw was the son of U Shan and Daw Ngwe Ain, both Chinese of Hokkien descent. He was born in Htonbo Village in Myaungmya District, in the Irrawaddy Delta in Lower Burma, on 10 January 1917.

As a boy, he began his primary education in U Po Htwe Private Burmese School, north of Myaungmya. Upon graduating from this schoo, he continued his secondary and high school education from 1926 to 1935 at the English-Burmese State High School, which is now the top school in Myanmar and is known as the Myaungmya State High School. His early school records show that he was an outstanding student who took only six months instead of the usual one year to complete each level of study. U Kyee Paw was reportedly awarded scholarships at the fourth and seventh grades in middle school. In 1935, he graduated from the Government AV High School, Myaungmya, with a distinction in mathematics. In 1942, he launched his medical career after having obtained his M.B.B.S. degree from the Medical College, Rangoon University.

Sayagyi ("senior teacher") as Dr U Kyee Paw was known to his students, was a dedicated doctor, and during the Second World War, he was a medical officer with the Base Military Hospital in Maymyo, Mandalay, and concurrently, with the Emergency Ward and Maternity Ward of Rangoon General Hospital. He was brilliant and excelled in his work, and so in no time, was made civil assistant surgeon of the state Hospital, Rangoon, and Maternity Hospital. From 1942 to 1945, he was also appointed a surgeon at the Daw Yin May Private Maternity Hospital in Rangoon.

U Kyee Paw was supposed to receive training for obstetricians and gynecologists (OG), but due to the lack of a special course for OG at the Royal College of Surgeons (RCS), London, he took up the fellowship in OG offered by RCS Edinburgh instead, following in the footsteps of his mentor, Professor Daw Yin May, another equally renowned medical practitioner of the early days in Burma. After the OG training, U Kyee Paw specialized in cardiothoracic surgery.

After the Japanese War, U Kyee Paw won a scholarship from the Burmese Government to study in the United Kingdom. In 1947, he was awarded the F.R.F.P.S. (now F.R.C.S., Glasgow) degree from the Royal College of Surgeons, Glasgow. In 1948, he completed a general surgery course in gynecology with the Royal College of Surgeons in Edinburgh, Scotland. His major interests lay in studies of peripheral vascular diseases and tobacco carcinoma of the oesophagus, which are studies of throat and lung cancer resulting from smoking of cigarettes. He attended several conferences in the course of his distinguished medical career, including the training conference in general surgery at the Glasgow Royal Infirmary (1946–47); the training conference in general surgery and gynaecology in Edinburgh; the training conference on pulmonary tuberculosis at the Christian Medical College and Hospital, Vellore, and the Madnapoli TB sanatorium in India (1950–51); the All India Surgeons' Conference, Vellore (1952); the training conference in thoracic and cardiac surgery in Groningen, The Netherlands (1953); the training in thoracic and general surgery in Washington D.C., Baltimore, Chicago, Minneapolis, and Mayo Clinic (1956), on a Fulbright scholarship. He was also sponsored by the World Health Organization (WHO) on a tour to Moscow, Leningrad, Tbilisi, and Kiev to study undergraduate medical education in 1962. WHO also sponsored his postgraduate medical education in London, Cambridge, Liverpool, Manchester, Glasgow, Belgrade, New Delhi, Chandigarh, and Calcutta in 1969. There are several publications to his credit, including "Surgical Treatment of Pulmonary Tuberculosis" in the Burma Medical Journal 3(4), 1955, and "Survey of Gastro Duodenal Hemorrhage" in the Union of Burma Journal, Life Science 2.

U Kyee Paw was commended by his peers for his philanthropic spirit, as he never took money from patients who came from Myaungmya or the Myaungmya District, Ayeryarwaddy Delta region in Lower Myanmar, where he was born. One of his students, Dr U Myo Myint, the present rector of Institute of Medicine in Yangon, recalled the time when he was trained as a house surgeon under U Kyee Paw. To the sayagyi, the youngest member of the surgical team must be the first to arrive at the operation theatre. Another strict demand of the sayagyi was that every house surgeon must personally push the patient into the operation theatre because if the ward boy did it, the patient might fall off the side of the trolley and get hurt. Another former student, Dr Johnny, commended U Kyee Paw's excellent control of bleeding during operations, so much so that even the drapes next to the incision would be unstained with blood. U Kyee Paw was known to be a very strict senior surgeon, who taught his students to respect and consult senior medical practitioners as if they were parents, to follow medical ethics, and be interdependent, as well as to keep the confidentiality of the records of in-house patients. He further made it a requirement for medical practitioners to attend medical conferences and clinical meetings to exchange and improve their knowledge.

From 1959 to 1978, U Kyee Paw was professor and head of the Department of Surgery, Rangoon General Hospital, and Institute of Medicine, Rangoon. On 3 June 1978, he retired from nearly thirty-six years of service with the government medical service. In 1980, he joined the Jivitadana Free Hospital in Rangoon as an honorary surgeon and assisted in the establishment of its surgical unit. Fifteen years later, he contributed most of his past medical research and records to the medical library of the hospital.

U Kyee Paw was married, and his family still lives in Yangon today. One of his children is a neurologist at the state hospital. U Kyee Paw passed away on 12 October 2008 in Yangon, Myanmar, at the age of ninety-two. Prior to his departure, he specifically requested his children not to publicize too much of the family.

Kyin Bin

(吕振膑, Lü Zhenbin, 1935–)

Community leader, philanthropist, Myanmar

U Kyin Bin is a charitable leader of three major Chinese organizations in Myanmar: Myanmar Fujian Native Association, Overseas Chinese Charity Association, and Overseas Chinese Chamber of Commerce. His administrative skills are evident from the remarkable contributions he has made in education philanthropy, as well as in mustering aid and relief for disaster-hit areas in China and Myanmar on several occasions. He has also played diplomatic roles, such as representing the ethnic Chinese of Myanmar in historic events of China, and has had meetings with Chinese state leaders such as Premier Zhu Rongji , Premier Li Peng, and President Hu Jintao.

U Kyin Bin was born in April 1935 in Nan Qiao Tian Ban Village, Nan'an district (南安县) in Fujian Province, China. His father, Lü Yu Fan, and mother, Lim Cui, were members of the Hokkien clan in China. The young Kyin Bin used to help his parents in the farm when he was a child. He was, however, determined to strive and excel beyond his role as a poor peasant. Thus, in 1950, he left for Myanmar to meet with his elder sister, Lü Xi, and her husband, Huang Yingwei, who had migrated there earlier. On arrival in Myanmar, he started to work as a shopkeeper and began to learn how to manage a business. He was diligent and was promoted to manager at his brother-in-law's rice mill. In 1964, together with his friends, he started a rice flour mill and a noodle factory. Several more ventures in Myanmar followed: the establishment of Rui Li Da Export and Import Co. Ltd., and Golden Lion Co. Ltd. in 1990, which dealt principally with the importing and exporting of agricultural products.

Following his success as an entrepreneur, he began to hold positions in various clan associations: in 1991, he was the deputy-in-charge of the Myanmar Overseas Chinese Charity Committee, which led him into the world of charity. Since 1995, he has been chairman of the Myanmar Fujian Native Association (旅缅福建同乡会), formerly known as the Hokkien Clan Association (福建会馆), which had Hokkien clan associations in Yangon under its wings.

U Kyin Bin has been known to be a man with a kind heart, who is always ready to help victims within Myanmar and his native village in China. After fires and other natural disasters, he would gather his colleagues to deliver aid to the disaster victims. In 1987, when a fire occurred in Lashio City, along the China-Myanmar border, he and the other Chinese community leaders sent a trainload of 2000 bags of rice and 500 bags of table salt to the disaster area. In 1989, when another fire disaster occurred in Myeik City (Lower Myanmar), he was also quick to involve himself in the relief work. More recently, not long after a deadly cyclone struck Myanmar, U Kyin Bin helped the survivors of the cyclone-hard-hit regions in Laputta in Ayeyawaddy Delta, Lower Myanmar. On 11 May 2008, he played an active major role in organizing several Chinese organizations to raise funds for reconstruction works. The associations made donations totalling 50 million kyat through the Ministry of Social Welfare, Relief and Resettlement, the Union of Myanmar. According to a report by Xinhua News Agency (新华社), about 500 households, comprising a population of about 3,000, were hit by the cyclone "Nargis". Besides charitable works in Myanmar, he donated generously to the victims of the Yunnan earthquake disaster in 1996, and to those of the flood disasters in eastern and southern China in 1989 and 1998 respectively.

U Kyin Bin has always been aware of the importance of education. Thus, he mustered the cooperation of some of the local Chinese community leaders to start a Chinese language school for the ethnic Chinese to enable them to continue preserving kinship ties with family members in the hometowns of their forefathers. He has also supported two old schools in his native village in China — Nan Qiao Primary School and Nan Yang Secondary School — where he received his early education.

He has the strong support of the Chinese in Yangon, particularly from the Hokkien community. Good timing has also been a crucial factor in his rise to leadership. To his credit, he stepped in to help the Myanmar Fujian Native Association, which has a history of 140 years, when it was in need of a new premise. Its office, which was a room in the Fujian Guan Yin Temple, became insufficient for the needs of the association. In 1999, after Kyin Bin became its chairman, he started a donation drive and collected over 1.5 billion kyat from individual Myanmese and other overseas Chinese associations — enough to acquire a four-storey building located at No. 110, Sing-Oo Dan Street, Latha township. The building became the head office of the association and its grand opening on 1 January 2001 coincided with the commemoration ceremony of the 140th anniversary of the Myanmar Fujian Native Association. U Kyun Bin invited local government officials and then Ambassador of China to Myanmar, His Excellency, Liang Dong, to grace the auspicious occasion.

Leading the way in promoting Myanmese cooperation and friendship with ethnic Chinese organizations in the world, he led a delegation of Hokkiens from Myanmar to the 2nd World Hokkien Friendship Conference held in Malaysia, and led another delegation to the third conference in this series in September 1999, in Quanzhou City (泉州), Fujian, China. As an eminent "peace-broker", he has represented the ethnic Chinese of Myanmar in a few historic events of China, namely, the Hong Kong handover ceremony at midnight of 30 June/1 July 1997, and the Macau handover ceremony at midnight of 19December/20December1999.InSeptember 2000, at the World Overseas Chinese Sports Meeting in Beijing, he was also a guest at the state banquet hosted by Premier Zhu Rongji. In Myanmar, he has had many opportunities to welcome many Chinese state leaders visiting Myanmar. Some of those he had welcomed include Premier Li Peng, who visited in 1994, and President Hu Jintao in 2000.

L

La Doãn Chánh

(La Hối, 罗允正, Luo Yunzheng, 1920–45)
Musician, martyr, Vietnam

With one of the most evergreen hits of Vietnam, Xuân và Tuổi Trẻ (Spring and Youth 青年与春天), to his credit, La Doãn Chánh, better known by his pseudonym, La Hối, is the pride of Hoi'an town and Quảng Nam province. For the greater part of his ephemeral life, he was a serious passionate music lover and teacher, and founder of a music association in Hoi'an. His brave and selfless struggle for independence and freedom has become an emblem of anti-imperialist resistance manifested by ethnic Chinese revolutionaries against contentious imperialist forces of those days.

"La Hối" is transcribed from the Cantonese articulation of Luo Kai (罗开). Born into landed gentry, La Hối attended the Cantonese vernacular school managed by Hối Quán Quảng Triệu (Guangzhao Native-Place Association) in Hoi'an at a tender age. His grandfather, La Cẩm Hoa (Luo Jinhua 罗锦华, 1820–1906), was a petty official who hailed from Hanxi village (寒溪乡), Chashan (茶山镇) of Dongguan city (东莞市) in Guangdong province, China. La Cẩm Hoa established a commercial enterprise, La Thiên Thái (罗天泰商号), in Hoi'an and Hue and exported such indigenous produce as cassia and pepper corns from the Trà My hills (斜眉山; 邪眉山) of Quảng Nam (广南) province. His business flourished and later served the developmental imperatives of both Hue, the Nguyễn capital, and Hoi'an. It grew into a well known property development company straddling three places, and family members ran the business in Hue, Guangdong province, and Hoi'an. La Bính Tường (Luo Bingxiang 罗炳祥), his eldest son, worked in Hue, and Luo Jixiang (罗吉祥), his third son, in China. His properties could be found on one of the streets which he developed called Canton Street (广东街) in Hoi'an, currently called Nguyễn Thái Học Street (阮泰学街). It is the street where La Hối lived and where some of La's descendants still reside.

Both academic and non-academic publications claim that La Hối's grandfather took Phan Thị (潘氏, 1854–1914), a Vietnamese woman of royal background, as his wife, thus making the elder La Hối seem like a prototypical nineteenth-century long-time Chinese sojourner who expanded business networks by entering into strategic nuptial alliances with local women. Phan Thị, endearingly called Bà Thiên in the community, in fact, did not have royal Vietnamese lineage. She was born in Qiongzhou (Hainan, China) to Chinese parents, but her family had settled down in Hue (imperial capital of Nguyễn dynasty from 1802–1945). Until today, Bà Thiên is remembered for having owned extensive paddy fields that "vanished into the horizon" and bountiful granaries "likely to feed several generations".

La Hối, fourth-generation in the La genealogy of Hoi'an, was the sixteenth child of La Đức Tường (Luo Dexiang 罗德祥). La Đức Tường was the tenth child among La Cẩm Hoa's children from five marriages, but he was the youngest from the marriage of La Cẩm Hoa with Bà Thiên. La Hối was born in 1920 in Hoi'an. He lived with four of his siblings, family, and servants in a huge house at 91 Nguyễn Thái Học. The ground floor of the house, which has been sold in recent years, is now used by incumbent tenants as an apparel shop. The La family was and still is known to be music lovers. Since young, La Hối and his siblings were exposed to western music: La Hối played the piano; his brother, the mandolin, and La Thoại Yến (罗瑞燕) (1917–), currently still living, learnt the violin.

At the age of fourteen, La Hối was determined to carve out a career in music. He developed a fondness for the hand organ and harmonica. From 1936–38, he spent time learning music in Saigon and even won second prize in a music competition there. On returning to Hoi'an, he formed the Société Philarmonique in 1939, an organization for music lovers. Amongst the musicians with whom he had shared his knowledge were Dương Minh Ninh, composer of Gấm Vàng; Lê Trọng Nguyễn, composer of Nắng Chiều; Lan Đài, composer of Chiều Tưởng Nhớ; and La Gia Xuân (罗嘉春, 1919–66), his cousin.

Tales of his love for freedom and solitude abound, but they never reflect recluse tendencies. The slim, immaculately dressed youth who had prominent cheek bones and an elevated forehead is remembered for his merry, carefree spirit: He would whistle cheerful tunes while walking with hands thrust in his pockets. Palpable joy exuded from his rhythmic rendering of the catchy Rose, Rose, I Love You! (玫瑰玫瑰我爱妳), a 1930s hit written by the Shanghai-born pioneer of Chinese popular music, Chen Gexin (陈歌辛). He genuinely sought the things in life such as dousing himself in soft, fading light by the tranquil banks of River Thu Bon (秋盆河) at dusk.

His insouciant demeanour in halcyon times of peace belies a meditative, unfathomable sacrificial courage in troubled times. Folks around him were amazed at the alacrity with which he wrote his music. In 1938, he composed the melody, Spring and Youth, the song of the Hoi'an Chinese Youth Salvation Team (会安华侨青年团), the Chinese lyrics of which were penned by Diệp Truyền Hoa (叶传华), the intellectual of Hoi'an.

Diệp Truyền Hoa first set the Chinese lyrics for Spring and Youth to its tune in 1944 during the Japanese Occupation. In 1946, during a performance tour with the Anh Vũ Musical and Dance Troupe in Hoi'an, Thế Lữ (世吕, 1907–89), a northern Vietnamese poet and writer and posthumous recipient of the Ho Chi Minh Prize (2001) for theatre, was sufficiently stirred by the tune and the martyrdom of its composer to furnish it with the Vietnamese lyrics. The Vietnamese version is called Xuân và Tuổi Trẻ (Spring and Youth).

La Hối's most highly rated musical composition is Xuân và Tuổi Trẻ. Both the Chinese and Vietnamese versions are widely accessible on the Internet today (assessed in 2005 and 2007). The Vietnamese version is heard annually during the Vietnamese (also the lunar) New Year in variety shows, in accompaniment to stage performances, and is also broadcast on radios during the New Year period.

In 1940, La Hối represented the Guomindang Chapter of Hoi'an in joining the Overseas Chinese scouts (华侨童子军战地服务团) in Saigon, which aided the war salvation efforts in Guangxi province, China. A year later, he performed intelligence activities while resuming music teaching at the only Chinese school in Hoi'an, Zhonghua Public School (中华公学), a merger of the vernacular schools of the bang during the war. Bang refers to dialect groups; in Hoi'an then, they were: Fujian, Guangzhao, Chaozhou, Hainan, and Jiaying. La Hối, while walking home at night in March 1945, was arrested by the kempeitai and subsequently executed at the foot of Phước Tượng Mountain (福祥山), in south-western Danang, in April 1945, together with nine other ethnic Chinese from Hoi'an, Hue, and Danang. They were collectively commemorated as "The Thirteen Martyrs of Hoi'an" at the common bang cemetery and memorial guarded by the Qing Ming Ancestral Hall (清明祠), Hoi'an. La Hối, aged 25, was the youngest among them (see Diệp Truyền Hoa).

La Hối was inspired by the anti-fascist and patriotic ideas that reverberated in Hoi'an. Despite the failure of the late Qing revolutionaries in China, books on Liang Qichao (梁启超) and the Chinese revolution were imported by La Thiên Thái enterprise and sold in Đức An, a bookshop owned his aunt. These books helped fan the spirit of earlier Vietnamese revolutionaries such as Trần Quý Cáp (陈贵合) and Huỳnh Thúc Kháng (黄促抗). La Hối's aunt, La Thị Am (name in geneology: La Ngọc Am 罗玉龕), was the daughter of La Cẩm Hoa and mother of Cao Hồng Lãnh (real name: Phan Hải Thâm 潘海深; alias Phan Thêm, 1906–2008), a revolutionary par excellence. Cao had led the Vietnam Communist Party Youth Movement of Hoi'an and worked alongside President Ho Chi Minh.

Unlike Cao Hồng Lãnh, whose legacy is a glorious slice of revolutionary history, La Hối's own legacy is one of musical inspiration in Hoi'an, in Vietnam, and in overseas Vietnamese communities. But like Cao Hồng Lãnh, his bravery in the battle for freedom has endured for generations in his country. A street in An Hội near the Hoi An Riverside Resort, owned by hotelier Triệu Quốc Hưng has recently been named La Hối.

Lai Kui Fang

(赖桂芳, Lai Guifang, 1936–)
Artist, Singapore

Lai Kui Fang is an internationally acclaimed Singaporean artist, well known for his talent as a portrait artist-cum restorer. His parents, who are Hakkas from Guangdong, had migrated to Singapore and Malaya before World War II. Lai was born in Gemas, Malaysia, in 1936, during the early stirrings of World War II. When his family fled into the forest at Labis, Johor, to escape the invading Japanese, the five-year-old Lai drew inspiration from the flora and fauna around him to draw pictures using charcoal. Snakes, butterflies, and tigers found their way into his drawings, which were often rendered on the wooden walls of his home. Hence, though his parents preferred that he treaded a more conventional career path, such as becoming an engineer or doctor, his artistic talent and inclination were already coming to the forefront at an early age.

As a youth, Lai moved to Singapore, where he received his secondary education at Chung Cheng High School, and his formal art education at the Nanyang Academy of Fine Arts in the 1950s. As his passion and talent were recognized, he was shortlisted for a French government scholarship. To prepare him, the principal of the academy gave him $250 — no small sum then — to take up a French language course at the Alliance Française. During this period, Lai worked for Grant Advertising, which was the biggest ad agency in Singapore then, earning $500 month. During his employment with the agency, his artwork went into many recognizable ad campaigns, including those for Esso Gas, Nestle, Fab, Land Rover, and Colgate.

In 1963, Lai went to Paris where he studied on a French Government scholarship at the École Nationale Supérieure des Beaux-Arts. Such was his talent and dedication to his art that he had the distinction of having the scholarship renewed a record four times, and obtained the Diploma Superieure D'Art-Plastique in 1969. He continued to hone his skills in bronze casting, stone sculpture, fresco painting, mosaic, and stained glass for the next three years. By 1972, he had obtained a diploma in painting in sculpture, equivalent to a master's degree.

Lai was the first Asian to receive the prestigious decoration of Knight of the French Order of Arts and Letters in 1968, an honour in recognition of his talent in the French classical painting tradition. This honour was upgraded to the Knight and Officer of the French Order of Arts & letters in 1975, the highest possible accolade for a practitioner of the arts in France. During his studies in France, he received numerous awards, including the Silver Medal, Salon Des Artistes Français in 1965; the Gold Medal, Salon Des Artistes Francais in 1966, and Grand Prizes from the city of Paris and the French president. The Italian Government also gave him a scholarship to study in Rome in 1968, and the same year, he received a four-year Lee Foundation study grant.

On completing his studies at the École Nationale Supérieure des Beaux-Arts, Lai remained in France for the next fifteen years, building a solid reputation as a restorer of damaged works of art masters and creating new works of art. He was also commissioned as a coin designer for the Paris mint. His talent and expertise at precision work earned him the privileged title of official restorer and copyist for masterpieces of the Louvre Museum. Although an internationally acclaimed restoration artist, Lai is best known for his skills in portrait painting. Lai paints mainly with oils, a "heavy" medium that allows him to retouch, shape, and colour to satisfy his desire for a realistic effect.

A Lai Kui Fang painting can be distinguished by its keen attention to detail that results in a high degree of lifelikeness. Lai spent years developing his mastery in painting that follows the French classical style, where a lighter background is chosen to highlight the model's features. In this preference, he is said to be influenced by two French painters, Ingris and David. His portraits are amazingly lifelike. A self-confessed perfectionist, Lai feels that the face is the most important feature of a portrait. He also places much attention on the hands of his subjects when he paints them, to capture subtle nuances that will result in a more realistic painting.

During his attachment to the Louvre and major museums in Europe, Lai restored over 200 masterpieces, including a large private collection — retouching, shaping, and colouring them to lifelike realism. He also applied spontaneous brush strokes of the Romantic style to give his works an impressionist feel. Such are his deeply entrenched links and contributions to France that he has been entitled to French resident privilege since 1970.

From the late 1960s to the early 1980s, Lai staged a number of one-man exhibitions at international as well as local venues, such as the Galerie de la Ville de Paris (France), the Triton Museum of Arts (California, the United States), the Victoria Memorial Hall, the Alliance Française, and the National Museum. He has also participated in group exhibitions in China, France, Germany, Australia, Italy, and the United States. His works feature in national collections, including those at the Triton Museum of Arts (California, the United States), the city of Paris and Juvisy in France, Singapore's national museums, and Henan city in China. His paintings are also much sought after by private collectors in Singapore and abroad, including Malaysia, Hong Kong, France, Italy, The Vatican, Switzerland, Germany, Spain, Belgium, Australia, Canada, Argentina, the United States, Japan, Taiwan, and China.

To date, Lai has won over forty medals for artistic achievements. He is listed in the French Who's Who. He was accorded an honorable doctor's degree in arts from the Albert Einstein International Academic Foundation in 1991. and a doctor's degree of fine arts by the Pacific Western University, the United States, in 1993. Lai's talent can also be seen in his sculpture works. He has completed several bronze busts of famous local personalities including Yeo Kim Seng, a surgeon and former Speaker of Parliament. His monumental bronze statues stand in Chung Cheng High School and Pei Chun School, and another 2.5-metre high "Joy" green bronze sculpture stands in the garden of Choa Chu Kang constituency.

Trained in Chinese art as well, Lai was able to leave his mark not only in Europe, but also in China. He has been commissioned to do various projects in China, and was asked to consider the restoration of a mural entitled, "Tile God of Mount Taishan On A Tour of Inspection and Homecoming". In 1987, Lai was the first Singaporean to be invited to contribute a poem-cum-calligraphy to be inscribed on the famous Henan Stone in Henan Yellow River. His poems in the form of calligraphy have also been inscribed on the famous stones in Taishan, Kaifeng. In addition, Lai has taken up the post of lecturer in fresco protection of the China National UNESCO Committee, and served in various appointments including foreign adviser of Teenagers in China & abroad Magazine, honorable dean of the Institute of Poetry, Painting and Calligraphy of Tien Shui, consultant of the Academy of the Zhang-Zhi Eastern Han Memorial Hall Dunhuang, and of the Hanyen Famous Stone Inscription Committee, adviser for Luo-Yellow River archaelogical study in Gongyi City, Henan, China, chairman of the World Renowned Artist-Review Committee, and a member of the Academy of Taishan. From 1990 to 1993, he was called upon to attend major art events and symposiums in Taishan and Henan. In June 1993, he was recognized as one of the "World's Great Artists" by the Artist-Review International Committee in China.

Since his return to Singapore in 1988, Lai has been much sought after as a portrait master and mentor for aspiring artists. He has been commissioned by both local and foreign clients, including politicians, doctors, bankers, and professionals, who sought to be preserved on canvas in the combination of European classical, Romantic, and realistic tradition, unique to Lai's style. On home ground, he is known for his series of historical paintings featuring former Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew at the swearing-in ceremony in 1959, and wall-sized works depicting the Japanese Occupation of Singapore.

Lai feels that although such large works require much study and contemplation, they are of great value to him and he enjoys working on such a large scale. He has also been commissioned to do portraits of past presidents, and has worked with other art media such as bronze, pewter, cement fondue, marble, clay, and fibre glass. In addition, he has designed greeting cards for use by the Singapore Cabinet, as well as another series of greeting cards for former Prime Minister Goh Chok Tong.

In August 2002, Lai completed a historic oil painting titled, "September 911 — America Under Attack", which depicts the chaotic moments preceding the collapse of the Twin Towers in New York after they were hit by two commercial airlines. The large-scale painting measuring 2m by 4m long took Lai 473 hours to complete, and was then valued by private collectors at US$1.5 million.

Lao Lianben

(刘安民, Liu Anmin, 1948–)
Artist, Philippines

Lao Lianben is a quiet man who shuns the spotlight. Unlike him, his creations are much sought after and cannot avoid being the centre of attention. In an auction for the benefit of the National Bookstore Foundation (NBSF) in March 2011, Lao generously put up one of his masterpieces — the four-by-three-foot "Elements of Light" — that sold for P1.7 million. Two years earlier, his "Moon Magic" (1982, acrylic and burlap on board, 152.5 × 178 cm.) fetched over P1.6 million in a Christie's art auction in Hong Kong. This prompted art enthusiasts to predict that there would be increasingly more Lao imitators. For more than forty years, Lao's works have been casting an irresistible spell; resisting the attraction of changing artistic idioms and movements, Lao treks an individual path. For him, the process of becoming an artist and the realization of one's identity take a lifetime of work.

Lao was born on 21 April 1948 in Manila to Mariano Lao and Martina Tan. Tan was born on 11 November 1911 in San Carlos, Pangasinan, where her grandfather ran a copra business. Soon she returned to China with her parents and stayed there until the dawn of the Second World War. The war forced the family to return to the Philippines in the hope of evading the Japanese army. In the Philippines, Tan met Mariano Lao, who was years her senior, and born in 1920 in Amoy, China. They got married in 1945. Mariano Lao was a salesman, and later ventured into the jewellery business pioneered by his family. They had seven children, Lianben being their third.

When he was young, Lianben did not work for his father's business. Instead, he constantly competed and won first prize in art competitions sponsored by his grade school, Quiapo Anglo Chinese School. He did not excel in academic subjects, and so was "unknown" among his teachers, until the last year in grade school, when he won first prize yet again in an art competition, earning him recognition from his teacher. Alongside these competitions, Lao constantly helped create visual aids for his teachers and illustrations used in various classes. He spent his secondary school at the University of the East (UE) in Manila and enrolled in art lessons in the local YMCA. One day, Lao saw an exhibition in UE featuring paintings by students from the UE School of Music and Arts (UESMA). He then committed himself to pursuing painting for the rest of his life, and thus enrolled in UESMA to study Fine Arts. Though he grappled with his personal identity throughout secondary school, according to Lao, seeking his identity was not the reason he pursued art. He recalls that his mother, due to war displacement, felt alienated in the Philippines, and because of her brewing alienation, Martina taught her children that they should do what they wanted to do as long as it was not a bad thing. When he asked whether there has been a struggle for identity, his mother's outlook resonates in his assertion that the struggle for identity — whether a person is Chinese or Filipino — is not important. What is important is that he is a good person.

Lao's painting career began as a student at the UE. A year after graduation, he held his first one-man show at the Solidaridad Galleries in 1973. His first foray into art introduced the use of found objects and indigenous materials for his art pieces. Using wood as artistic material, Lao assembled panels glued and hammered with all sorts of found objects — stones, shells, twigs, wood planks from old houses. This first show opened the Philippine art scene's eyes to the possibility of Philippine abstract art that was completely non-objective (when, in light of the new martial law regime, safety in subject matter counted a lot). Lao's use of "surface dynamics" bagged him the Cultural Center of the Philippines (CCP) Thirteen Artists Award in 1976. Recipients of the award are artists touted as innovators who have made a break with tradition and perhaps started new styles and traditions. They are men and women of the fine arts who do not pander to the gallery.

Through the changes in the Philippine art scene, Lao has "remained true to his identity as an artist, choosing only to branch into the discipline of painting and drawing to highlight his devotion to bringing out the balance between spare color and forms, the nervous tension of gouges, overlays and roughened textures that characterize his work". Some critics pigeonhole Lao's works as Zen, but the artist refuses to be stereotyped. In one interview, Lao said: "They say my pieces are Zen paintings but then when I started reading about it, the more it confounded me. For me, it's a matter of personal taste. … I just like works that are quiet, works that don't bother you. I like blacks, whites, and grays — colors that don't conform and are just there."

Lao says, "How can one explain intuition? My painting is intuition." He does not blame his parents — or anyone — for not understanding his paintings because he himself does not. In his artistic journey, he has always maintained that he did not choose art, but that art chose him. Coming from a middle-class family whose awareness constituted surviving everyday life, Lao had received no assistance or encouragement from his parents to nurture his craft. This hindrance was also reinforced by a lack of books on art, art materials, galleries and museums, facilities in schools, and finance, to make these resources available. Writer Reuben Ramos Canete emphasizes that Lao's works are not merely decorative or idle playthings for the rich, but have attracted debate about its relevance to the burning sociological issues of poverty and institutional violence in the country. Just because there are no "real" objects found in his work does not — and should not — equate with irrelevance to society. For each piece, there is an historical process of thinking and art making.

Lao's work is quite Filipino — being a mixture of western and eastern, modernist and traditional, formal in nature and sensual in feeling. Lao asks his audience "to learn how to walk slowly for a moment and learn from something as rare nowadays as studied silence, rather than run towards the colorful, illustrational wall of noisy ignorance". As Dean Leovino Garcia aptly puts it: "Without meaning to [do it], Lao changes your life — with his graphic silence, that is, indeed, eloquent in its discretion."

(刘锦国, Liu Jinguo, 1920–)

Businessman, community leader, Brunei

Lau Ah Kok, who is later known as Pehin Kapitan China Kornia Diraja Dato Paduka Lau Ah Kok, is a legendary figure well known throughout Brunei Darussalam. He epitomizes the perfect rags to riches story of early Chinese immigrants to Southeast Asia. He also serves as the bridge between the Chinese community and the Malay community, especially with the Sultanate.

Lau was born in 1920 in Pengcheng (彭城), Henan (河南) province, China. He came from a traditional Chinese family background, but his great-grandfather first moved to a small village in Jinmen (金门) and later Lau and his siblings re-migrated to the rural Fujian's Tong'an (同安) county. But Lau attended school in Jinmen from the age of seven. When he was 16, the Japanese invaded China, and he was forced to stop schooling.

A major decision that was made in 1938 became the turning point of his life. As a seventeen-year-old boy, Lau left his beloved parents and decided to venture abroad. He got on a ship named Jin Shen, which carried three hundred passengers to Xiamen (厦门). Within a period of two years he travelled to Hong Kong and Singapore, finally settling down in Brunei in 1940. He was nineteen years old at that time with only ten Bruneian dollars in his pocket. He worked at his brother-in-law's grocery store. After years of struggle and hard work, he established a company called Hua Ho 华和 in 1947. The name Hua Ho signifies peace and harmony and he hopes that he could contribute to peace and harmony of the community.

In 1950, he married Lin Gui Ying (林桂英), who gave full support to Lau and his career, and they have three sons and four daughters. Today, Lau has sixteen grand children and one great-grand son. On 3rd January 2010, Lau and his wife celebrated their 60th Diamond Wedding Anniversary with almost a thousand guests in their own Manggis Mall ballroom.

As a Chinese community leader who is now at the age of ninety, he still remains active in liaising with the Government and the Chinese community to enhance good relationships between the two parties and to build up various ethnic links in order to strengthen cooperation and provide a foundation for communications. Lau has been actively involved in the celebration of various national festivities. Through these activities and programmes, he got the Brunei Chinese community to participate in nationwide celebrations by organizing the events and giving donations to show their loyalty to his Majesty.

In recognition of Lau's efforts and commitments in Chinese society and government activities, on 21st April 2004, he was bestowed the title of Pehin Kapitan China Kornia Diraja by His Majesty the Sultan of Brunei Darussalam. Again on 15th July 2006, during the occasion of the Sultan's 60th birthday celebration, Lau was bestowed the title of Dato Paduka, which is a meritorious medal. On 29th August 2008, in recognition of his business achievement in Brunei, the Kuala Lumpur-based regional non-governmental organization called the Enterprise Asia awarded him the Asia Pacific Entrepreneurship-Lifetime Achievement Award.

Lau's philosophy has always been to extend his gratitude to the community in terms of sponsorship to schools, charities and caring for the elderly and needy. He said that "if the people need food, we should always provide; only then can our economy be balanced." Instead of reinvesting his money overseas which would have reaped much more profit for his business, Lau's policy has always been to redirect the profits from his businesses into the development of Hua Ho within the Sultanate, believing in returning to the community and country what he obtained from them.

"Human elements are important for a harmonious life, and should respect and cherish our family and Chinese culture. Without our ancestors, we will not be where we are today." Lau said. He added that "being honest in business is a form of goodwill, and lend confidence to consumers towards the company and ensures that they return for repeated purchased". And this is exactly Hua Ho's current formula to success.

Lau has come a long way to gain such a profound success and built his business empire. He endured hardship and experienced many failures while engaging with previous businesses. It is his strong determination and perseverance that made him a successful person. In 2005, he opened the Hua Ho Manggis Mega Mall, and in 2006, the Bunut Mega Mall followed. And in 2007, for the third consecutive year, Hua Ho opened its third mega Mall in Tutong in the form of Hua Ho Petani Mall. At present, Lau's very own well established Hua Ho Department Store has become one of the biggest chained department stores in Negara Brunei Darussalam. Nine outlets are located at strategic locations from Sengkurong to the newly opened Hua Ho Petani Mall in Tutong.

In addition to that, Lau has set up several Hua Ho Agricultural Farms to supply vegetables, fruits, chicken and eggs all over the country. In 2000, he also set up a Hua Ho Cultural Foundation to help preserve and promote Chinese culture. The activities of the foundation include Chinese Calligraphy classes, and also financial support to students from less well-to-do families.

Lau is a man almost single-handedly built a great and successful business venture in Negara Brunei Darussalam.

Lau Hong Siong

(刘鸿祥, Liu Hongxiang, 1921–85)
Entrepreneur, Brunei

The inhabitants of Putien (Putian), commonly known as Hing Hua (Heng Hua), in the Province of Fujian, China, are prominent in the transport sector or businesses related to it such as spare parts shops in Southeast Asia. Lau Hong Siong, who was born in Putien in 1921, was a good example of such overseas natives of Hing Hua. He started life in the world of business when he was sixteen years old as a bicycle shop dealer in Kuala Belait. He later expanded and diversified his business. In due course, his bicycle shop became a motor spare parts shop selling batteries and tyres as well. From then onwards he established himself as a reliable contractor supplying sand, a bus operator, a haulage contractor for Shell, and finally a successful developer.

In 1934 Lau Hong Siong and his father fled their village in Putien County where a plague had broken out. They sailed to Singapore from Hong Kong by junk. In Singapore, the young Hong Siong was put in the care of a relative who ran a bicycle shop. For nine months he lived on his own without a friend or playmate and was often sick. After nine months he joined his father in Miri, Sarawak, where his father and his uncle ran a bicycle shop under the name, Hock Joo Hin (福聚兴). In 1937 Lau Hong Siong was instructed to start a branch in a neighbouring town, Kuala Belait, with B$360 as initial capital from Hock Joo Hin in Miri (A plate of kwei tiao [rice-noodle] cost three Brunei cents then). It was the first bicycle shop there and its appearance stirred the town. Malay folks liked to call him taukeh kechil or simply kacik because he was then only a teenager. Lau recalled that for every bicycle he sold at B$12, he made a B$4 profit. The rental was B$24 per month, of which he paid only half, the other half being borne by his subtenant. Business was brisk until it was interrupted by the Japanese invasion in 1941.

Life was tough during the Japanese Occupation and his family retreated to the interior (Labi) to escape Japanese atrocities. Everyone survived on the bare necessities. There were times when he sneaked back into the town to try and earn a living there. By chance, he got to know a Japanese mechanic of mixed blood from whom he acquired the basic skill of repairing vehicles, which helped him enormously to cope with the harsh conditions of living in war-torn Kuala Belait. After the Japanese surrender the British returned and immediately embarked on a series of reconstruction projects. Shell too lost no time in rebuilding its production capacity. With the war compensation he received from the British, Lau restarted his bicycle shop in one of the makeshift atap buildings. In 1953 two rows of concrete shop-houses were completed. He spent the next ten years expanding Hock Joo Hin to Seria and, in the 1970s, to the capital. The firm became the sole agent for prestigious bicycle makers such as Rudge and Raleigh which were distributed by Robinson in Singapore. It was also the sole distributor of the much sought-after Goodyear tyres. It was well stocked in spare parts imported from Hing Hua suppliers in Singapore.

Lau claimed that he owned the first ever truck in town that he reassembled it himself. He bought the ex-army vehicles at B$30 per unit at a public auction and, before long, was the owner of a fleet of reconditioned trucks, some of which were later converted into dipper trucks. He became a popular contractor transporting sand on his trucks from the beach to various building sites and by 1955, his fleet had increased to sixteen trucks. His biggest job came when he won a government contract to supply sand for the trunk road to be built from Seria to Danau in the 1950s.

As more immigrants and foreign workers arrived, the demand for a public bus service charging fixed fares and running on schedule became acute. Soon the early "taxis" with wood chassis gave way to new buses imported from Singapore. By 1954 Lau Hong Siong had become one of a handful of bus operators instrumental in the formation of a bus company called B.U.T.C. (Belait United Traction Co).

Lau's dealings in bicycles, cars, trucks, and buses led him to motor trading during the period 1960–70. He had established his first motor complex (comprising a showroom, an office, and a workshop) in the Seria Industrial Zone in 1957. The following year, he acquired his first motor franchise, namely Holden (an Australian product) from Wearne Brothers Ltd. (an Australian company) in Singapore, and from 1962 onwards, was appointed sole distributor of some popular British cars such as Hillman Minx, Humber, Singer Gazelle, etc. In 1964 he took over the agency of Morris from Sime Darby and three years later, Austin from Borneo Motors Limited. Lau thus became Brunei's Wearne Brothers.

When Lau succeeded in his motor trading business, he was barely forty, and had had no formal education. He knew very little English — just enough to follow conversations in the language. In those days he could not even find an experienced manager who could competently do what he could not, especially in handling the correspondence. Two good friends from Shell, one Chinese and the other, Indian, both senior staff, helped him unstintingly after office hours over a long period of time. Very often the common language among them was Malay; Lau Hong Siong was a Brunei citizen and quite proficient in Malay. His agony was over only after his younger brother returned from the United Kingdom as a qualified lawyer who was ever willing and ready to share his burden in running the family business.

Lau's leading position in the motor trading business remained unrivalled until Japanese cars appeared on the scene in the early 1970s. Japanese car producers posed a challenge on two fronts: lower prices and, at a later stage, better quality. Their offer of longer warrantee periods and excellent after-sales service broke any lingering resistance to Japanese products. The British had no answer to the Japanese challenge, and the British manufacturers let Lau down. Beginning in the early 1970s, he was beset by falling sales, increasing defaults of hire purchase payments for vehicles sold with personal guarantees provided by him, mounting pressure from his bankers to keep within the limits of credit facilities granted to him, and above all, having to meet minimum sales requirement. Seeing no prospects in the business, he boldly wound it down and switched to new ventures.

He then focused on two new areas namely, business with Shell and property development. On the advice of his brother, he successfully secured through open tender a contract with Shell for the haulage of oilfield cargoes. This contract called for a long-term investment on a fleet of heavy duty trucks, complete with trailers to be imported from Singapore, and workshop facilities considered adequate to ensure the smooth operation of the fleet. This new venture turned the tide for him. The steady contract payments from Shell improved his cash flow and his overall financial position. The contract came to an end about the time Brunei attained independence in 1984.

Lau's business as a property developer started initially on a small scale. He bought vacant pieces of land before their market values appreciated and engaged reputable contractors to build bungalows on them, which he then put on the market for sale or rent. His next big step was to develop an estate for rent to Shell's international contractors for housing their staff. The completion in 1984 of Komplek Harapan, a three-storey complex consisting of twenty-three units of showrooms or shops on the ground floor, and offices on the first and second floors, was his greatest triumph. The building site was the depot of BUTC which had ceased to operate just after independence.

Lau was a simple and humble person who was thrifty, dressed simply, and never bothered with what was in fashion. He never took a holiday in Taiwan, Bangkok, Genting Highland, or other popular resorts as the peers in his days did. He made several trips to Hong Kong to help his youngest brother settle there after leaving the mainland. He was, however, helpful to the needy and generous in giving to education and welfare bodies. In 1978 he donated a school building consisting of eight classrooms at a cost of B$150,000 to Chung Hua Middle School in Kuala Belait. This was an unprecedented donation sum in Brunei at the time and it took place at a time when he had just barely overcome his setbacks in business and was not really "cash rich".

Lau married Chee Sung Kiaw in 1934 and the couple had seven children — four sons and three daughters. All except one son are married and take part in the family business. Lau died in Mexico in the presence of two of his children while undergoing medical treatment for liver cancer.

Law Fah Ngin

(刘华源, Liu Huayuan, 1936–)

Lawyer, community leader, Brunei

Law Fah Ngin is a prominent personage in Brunei Darussalam, marked for his versatility and popularity. He is a lawyer and a businessman, and is active in community affairs. In recent years, he devotes his attention to literary writing, mainly on matters and issues of local and national interest.

Born in Miri, Sarawak, in 1936, Law followed his father in emigrating to Kuala Belait in Brunei a few years before the Japanese invasion, with the intention of settling down there permanently. The little fishing village was then fast developing into an oil town, serving the needs of oilfield workers and staff recruited by the British Malayan Petroleum Company, owned by Royal Dutch Shell, which was the forerunner of the present Brunei Shell Petroleum Company Sdn Bhd (BSP). His late father used to remind his family to think of Brunei as their home country, saying, "The prospect of earning a decent living in Brunei is promising, the future is good!"

Law is one of the very few bilingual barristers-at-law practising law in Brunei. He received his primary education in a Chinese school immediately after the war and afterwards pursued further education in Penang's Chung Ling High School, a famous Chinese secondary school noted for its bilingual policy. It was there that the foundation for his mastery of the English language was firmly laid. After four years in Chung Ling, he was accepted into the Nanyang University in Singapore for a four-year Bachelor course in industrial and commercial management. By the time he completed his tertiary education at the only Chinese university outside mainland China at the time, President Soekarno of Indonesia had launched a "Crush Malaysia" campaign, throwing Southeast Asia into turmoil. Law then decided to study law in London. He believed that legal practice would yield a respectable income and enable him to assert formidable social influence. It was also his belief that should the political circumstances in his part of the world change, and peaceful and constitutional struggle become a feasible alternative for effecting political change, his professional qualification would be useful in the event that should he decide to venture into politics. In the summer of 1963, he was admitted as a member of the Honourable Society of Lincoln's Inn. After satisfying all the requirements set by the society, he was finally called to the Bar in 1968. He did not start his practice until a few years later, being deeply involved in the family business run mainly by his elder brother, Lau Hong Siong (刘鸿祥), on behalf of the estate of his late father, who died in 1952 intestate.

In the first few years after his return from England, Law devoted his attention mainly to his family business, which comprise running public bus services, extracting timber for sawmilling, and motor trading. It was rather messy and disorganized due to rapid expansion or poor planning. Law changed his brother's traditional way of doing business, and introduced modern management techniques and methods. His brother learned to get used to accounting and budgetary controls, read management reports and statement of cash-flow projection, and make major decisions based on, whenever possible or practical, feasibility studies and in management meetings. Gradually, the family's fleet of buses was able to run on schedule, the company's workshop was properly manned to ensure fewer breakdowns, and public confidence in the reliability of the service was restored.

However, Law's brother's decision to venture into the timber business in late 1960 was a mistake. He soon realized that it demanded the full attention which his other diversified interests would not allow him to devote to it. Besides, he lacked the knowledge and experience of operating in a concession area, and the sawmill was not very far from it but very distant from the motor showroom and office situated in the Light Industrial Zone in Seria. He thus had no option but to jettison it in order to concentrate on his family's core business, namely, motor-trading, which was then in bad shape due to the changing market condition. Japanese cars made serious inroads into the market where British products formerly held sway. Being the sole distributor of almost all the British vehicles distributed by Wearne Brothers of Singapore, the Law family in Brunei suffered too. On Law's advice, his family decided to phase out motor-trading and ventured into property development and contracting business with BSP. This move turned the tide. Law and his elder brother in partnership secured a haulage contract from Shell, and employed a fleet of heavy duty trucks equipped with 40 feet long trailers to transport oilfield cargoes and equipment. This contract provided a steady income and regular payments and improved the cash flow position of their family business. Their joint effort in property development also bore fruit, and made money from building bungalows, estates, including a multi-million showroom cum office complex named Komplek Harapan (consisting twenty-three units of three-storey structures), completed in 1984. The complex was at the time a landmark in Kuala Belait. It stabilized the financial position of the Law family headed then by his elder brother, the late Lau Hong Siong.

Law's legal practice, which he started in early 1970 and kept till he retired towards the end of the 1990s, exposed him to various business opportunities. He was invited by a few Shell's retirees to incorporate a company for the production of industrial oxygen and other gases for the local market. It was a successful attempt with all the shareholders playing their respective roles, each complementary to the others, until it dawned on the company that necessary expansion would require greater capital injection and the acceptance of Singapore Oxygen Ltd., a giant subsidiary of British Oxygen Ltd., headquartered in the United Kingdom, as a shareholder. This change resulted in minority shareholders like himself being bought out, albeit with an offer too good to turn down. That was his first experience in witnessing how the giants in the business world behaved in wrestling control from local shareholders. He was also invited by a well established British firm based in Singapore to enter into joint venture agreement to take over a local engineering and machining workshop operated by an outgoing Hong Kong Chinese under the trade name of Alex Wong Engineering and Construction Company. This venture turned out to be a success. The company was the predecessor of AWE Sdn. Bhd., a wholly owned bumiputra company and one of the few well established contractors registered with Shell. He remains its consultant under a contract of employment.

Law is a typical Chinese educated intellectual who is always conscious of his duties and responsibilities to society. He is a strong supporter of Chinese schools, having served on the management committee of his alma mater, Chung Hua Middle School of Kuala Belait, first as a member in 1970, later as school superintendent, and for ten years as chairman. After retiring from the committee in 1989, he was appointed its permanent honorary chairman. In 1970, the Brunei Government ceased to grant financial aid to all Chinese schools, causing chaos in Chinese community. The school was unable to pay salaries to teachers and staff who then threatened to go on strike. Students' parents started mulling over the question of whether to send their children to mission schools. It was a crisis. Law was then elected to chair the management committee. He took charge hands on, devoting a lot of time to raising funds through activities such as holding a lion dance during Chinese New Year, and a school fund-raising grand dinner party, and concerts. The first resolution passed at his management meeting was to appoint educator Chiew Chee Phoong as the new principal, with the special task of introducing necessary systems and procedures, and reorganizing the administration of the school. Both Law and Chiew worked in tandem. It took Law and his committee eight years to restore the vitality of the school to a condition that satisfied the expectations of the Chinese community. The duo, being professional and articulate, played a crucial role in persuading the Brunei Government to accept the gradual approach of converting Chinese schools into schools that comply with the government's national education policy. In the early 1970s, this was the critical problem faced by the Brunei Chinese community.

Law Fah Ngin married Wang Keok Yin (王昭英) in 1963 in Singapore just before they sailed to London for further studies. His wife, who received a bachelor's degree, majoring in Chinese Language and Literature from Singapore's Nanyang University in 1962, is a Chinese language writer. They have one son and two daughters.

Law Sit Han

(Lo Hsing-han, 罗星汉, Luo Xinghan, 1935–)

Drug lord turns tycoon, Myanmar

Law Sit Han, also known as Lo Hsing-han or Luo Xinghan, was identified as the drug trafficker who has become a leading tycoon in Myanmar. Law was born on 16 September 1935 in a village in the Kokang Special Region in Northern Shan State of Myanmar. His ancestors were from Jiangxi province of China. His father was Luo Chao Xing (罗朝兴, born in 1916), known locally as Luo Law-pan (Boss Luo), and his mother was from the Duan (段) family. He is the fourth son of five siblings.

Law was brought up in a traditional Chinese family, so not surprisingly he speaks Chinese and is immersed in Chinese culture. As he received his early education up to primary two in a village school and later moved to a state-run primary school in a small town, he was therefore influenced by ethnic Shan and Myanmar culture. He later got married and had five sons and four daughters. Among his able sons is U Tun Myint Naing, a successful businessman who has led Asia World Company, a large and diversified conglomerate in Yangon since 1992.

Law earned his infamy from the Western press as the person who controlled the opium business in Shan State during 1970s. He was reported to have started his opium-trafficking career as commander of a local militia called Ka Kwe Ye (KKY), which was set up with the support of General Ne Win to fight the remaining members of the Kuomingtang who were driven from Yunnan Province into Eastern Shan State by both the People's Liberation Army of Mao Zedong and the Communist Party of Burma.

Law was one of KKY commanders based in Lashio, a town near the Sino-Myanmar border in Northern Shan State. The Government of Myanmar was at the time fighting the insurgents in Kokang and the Wa State. He reportedly used his government-approved smuggler status to grow his fortune and power, accumulating among other things, the ability to finance and acquire weapons and arms, and in the process creating an army feared even by the state government.

Law was later arrested and charged with "insurrection against the state" for meeting with the Shan rebels and received a death sentence. However, he was released in the 1980 General Amnesty after being jailed in the Yangon Insein Prison for seven years. With the blessing of the State Law and Order Restoration Council (SLORC), he returned to the drug business, this time with former commanders of the Communist Party of Burma in the Sino-Myanmar borderlands. In 1989, through his brokerage, Law succeeded in helping the Myanmar Military Government reach a ceasefire with the Communist Party of Burma (CPB), which was led by Peng Jia Sheng (彭家声). Not long afterwards, seventeen military components of the CPB concluded similar deals and restored an uneasy peace. Kokang, which was transferred to Myanmar's Special Region No. (1), became a narcotics-free area, especially after 2002. Under the leadership of Peng Jia Sheng, resettlement efforts have been made in the area, such as cash-crop cultivation (tea, sugar cane, rubber) and livestock breeding to replace the growing of poppy; improving transportation, education, and health care services etc.

In June 1992 Law founded the Asia World Company, reportedly the largest privately controlled commercial firm in contemporary Myanmar, after the government declared its market-oriented, open door policy in 1989. His son U Tun Myint Naing, alias Steven Law (罗炳宗), is the managing director. He manages various arms of the company such as its Asia Light Supermarket, and then the Yangon-Mandalay highway passenger transport and other major infrastructural construction projects. Among its flagship projects are the Yangon Traders Hotel (in which its has a 10 per cent shareholding), Ahlone Container Wharf (Yangon), Yangon International Airport Extension project, toll highway construction in Shan State (for easy access to the Sino-Myanmar borderlands), and a deepwater port in Kyauk Phyu in Arakan State.

Asia Light Co. Ltd., Asia World Port Management, and Asia World Industries Ltd are subsidiaries of Asia World Company in Myanmar. Asia World has created business networks with its Singapore associate, Golden Aaron Pte. Ltd., and nine other Singapore-based companies. Golden Aaron Pte. Ltd. is associated with a contract between Myanmar Oil and Gas Enterprise and a business group including China National Offshore Oil Company Myanmar Ltd., to carry out oil and gas exploration in Kyauk Phyu, in the Arakan State of Myanmar. It built a deepwater port for cargo ships on the island of Ramree to service China's shipping needs. The port at Kyauk Phyu to be connected to a new 1,950 km highway to be built through Myanmar directly to Kunming, the capital of Yunnan Province in China. Asia World is now involved in constructing the Myint Sone hydropower project, located 42 km north of Myintkyina, the capital Kachin State and another Sino-Myanmar border town. It also participated in reconstruction projects of 2008 Nargis cyclone-affected areas in the Irrawaddy delta in Lower Myanmar.

Law is interested in fostering the development of Chinese traditions and culture; he was responsible for promoting Chinese language learning in over twenty schools in 1956. The first Kokang minority-language school was established in northern Shan State in 1966. He negotiated with the authorities and succeeded in making Chinese language an official teaching medium in Kokang. Law also organized the Kokang School Alumni in 1989 to support school funding and administration. He was chairman of the school until 2004.

In 2003, when Myanmar Government declared Kokang region a narcotics-drug-free area, Law assisted ethnic Chinese, creating new survival opportunities, and spread his influence from the east bank of Thanlwin River (former Salween River) to the west bank of the river and beyond, such as Lashio, Muse, Kukai, Thibaw, Mandalay, and Yangon.

Although he is unmistakably a person steeped in Chinese culture, he has assimilated other religious cultures. As a Chinese Buddhist he is not only a believer of Goddess Guan Yin, but also a supporter of Maitreya Gospel that is spread among ethnic Kokang and those of Yunnanese descent. He is reported to be one of the devotees of the Chantethan Buddhist Temple (阐德五戒佛院 or 天恩弥勒佛院, opened in 2003) in Yangon.

He was reported to be responsible for forging the unity between pro-Taiwan Yunnanese descendants and pro-Beijing Yunnanese descendants for reforming the Yangon Yunnan Clan Association in 1998. For his dedicated service to the ethnic Yunnan society in Myanmar, Luo has been appointed permanent executive adviser to the Yangon Yunnan Hui Guan, also known as the Yangon Yunnan Association.

To overcome the economic isolation of the country in a globalizing era, Law took it upon himself as a senior statesman to try and make a difference by organizing an inaugural two-day Yangon Yunnan Clan Chinese Lunar New Year Trade Fair (see Xinhuanet, 21 February 2010) as part of the 2010 Chinese New Year celebration programme in the precinct of the Yangon Yunnan Clan House. The Chinese Ambassador to Myanmar, H.E. Ye Da Bo (叶大波), was invited to the opening ceremony as guest of honour. Twenty local-born Yunnanese enterprises participated in the fair to showcase locally manufactured household electrical goods, household products, furniture, foodstuff, agricultural produce and pesticides, etc.

Lee Chee Shan

(李志城, Li Zhicheng, 1909–86)
Businessman, banker, Myanmar

Datuk Lee Chee Shan was synonymous with Singapore's Chung Khiaw Bank (崇侨银行) in the 1950s and 1960s. It was the era when the one-man show was very much alive. He was a product of the times, relying on his own initiative and business acumen to make the bank a household name then. He was very active in charity, but his wealth diminished at the peak of his bank's growth.

Lee was a Teochew gabiah (hybrid Hakka and Burmese), born on 11 April 1909 at 38 Min Lan Road, Daik-U, a small Burmese market town 135 km north of Rangoon. His father was Lee Kyin Tayone, and mother, Daw Pone. His grandfather was Lee Yeong Yang, a Teochew immigrant from China, and his grandmother, a Burmese lady called Daw Mon. Lee's father was the younger cousin of "Tiger Balm King", Aw Boon Haw (胡文虎), and his aunt, Lee Kim Peck, was Aw's mother.

Lee had thirteen siblings, but ten died in infancy. His father ran a grocery at the front of his home. Like all Buddhists in Burma, Lee's parents made him a novice monk at the Khin Mai Thi Monastery when he was ten.

Lee studied at the King Edward Memorial Buddhist School in Rangoon, where the teachings were in English and Burmese, until the seventh standard. After passing the state examination at his seventh standard, he was sent to Ahlone Cushine School, also in Rangoon, as a boarder, before being transferred to a government high school in Pagoda Road (Rangoon). His elder sister, Aye Tin, sold longyi, the sarong-like Burmese garment, and textiles at the Daik-U market to support Lee through school. The government high school was a day-school without boarding facilities, and he had to reside with Aw Boon Par's first devout Buddhist wife, Tay Piah Lan, a principal then.

Upon his graduation, the Aw brothers (Boon Haw and Boon Par, 胡文豹) sent him to Singapore, where Aw Boon Haw had moved in 1926. At the age of twenty, Lee started his career as a junior cashier at Eng Aun Tong (永安堂) in Neil Road, where the Singapore headquarters of the Aw brothers' enterprise was located, while residing at the Aw brothers' old house at No. 2, Tanglin Road. He then married Aw Cheng Hu ("Emma"), the 17-year-old daughter of Aw Boon Par and his second wife, Daw Saw.

During World War II, Lee escaped on the last ship out of Singapore to Sydney, where he landed a job as a counter clerk at the Bank of China, Sydney Branch, which opened for business on 1 July 1942. Its premises were in the Prudential Building, at 38 Martin Place, opposite Hotel Australia. Lee learned banking while building good relations with the Commonwealth Trading Bank and the Bank of New South Wales. He returned to Singapore after the war ended.

Lee's father-in-law, Aw Boon Par, died on 7 September 1944 in Rangoon at the age of fifty-nine, when Lee announced the birth of his second son, Teng Lay. They moved into a house owned by Eng Aun Tong in Craig Road, near Eng Aun Tong, which Lee and Aw Boon Haw had revived.

On 4 February 1950, Aw Boon Haw and his fellow Hakka merchants founded Chung Khiaw Bank with a capital of $2,564,250. Local banks at the time were formed according to dialect groups and Chung Khiew Bank was no exception. Aw became its first chairman, and since he had been eager to reward his nephew for reviving Eng Aun Tong after the war, made Lee the managing director. Lee's banking experience in Sydney definitely came in handy. He pioneered many aspects of banking that were unheard of under the traditional system by using the media to the fullest. When television was introduced in 1963 in Singapore, Chung Khiaw Bank was the first to utilize it to reach out to households.

Lee's philosophy was "little drops make a mighty ocean". In 1956 he promoted awareness in banking by distributing booklets and pamphlets widely published in Chinese, English, Malay, and Tamil, to urge the public to make banking a part of their lives. Among his initiatives was the introduction of the Chung Khiaw Bank Gift Cheques, coin-banks for children, and the creation of current accounts for women called the "Pink Ladies' Accounts". In 1958 Lee launched the Mobile Branch, a bus that drove to six rural areas in Singapore regularly to bring banking to the doorstep of villages. Lee also never forgot team spirit and warmth in business. The Chung Khiaw Bank anniversary dinner for his customers and staff had been the talk of the town until it was abandoned due to the difficulties in organizing for such huge crowds.

On 14 October 1960, an employee of Sin Chew Jit Poh (《星洲日报》) failed to withdraw cash immediately with his salary cheque, and news of the incident was blown out of proportion. This led to a bank run, but Lee managed to secure an interbank overnight loan on time from the Chartered Bank, Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, and the Overseas-Chinese Bank Corporation, and saved the bank from the withdrawal disaster. The frenzy of demands for payment on the bank lasted six days, but Lee managed to honour all of them, and his display of courage and leadership helped to restore public confidence in the bank.

In 1966 Lee was bestowed the honour of D.M.P.K., with the title of "Datuk", by the sultan of Pahang, Malaysia, and his wife thus known as Datin Lee. It was the second award Lee had received, the first being Justice of Peace, awarded by the colonial government.

In 1971, Chung Khiaw turned twenty-one and was Singapore's second largest local bank, in terms of assets, with thirty branches: thirteen in Singapore, five in Malaysia, and two in Hong Kong. In May 1971, Lee agreed to sell his shares to Haw Par Brothers International and accepted a nominal position as president for life at Chung Khiaw Bank, which was renewable after five years. Meanwhile, Slater Walker Securities (SWS) of Britain, in its expansion into the Far East, quickly acquired Haw Par Brothers International, which owned both Chung Khiaw Bank and the Sin Chew Jit Poh press, and became its new major shareholder. When SWS stripped its assets on 18 June 1971, United Overseas Bank (UOB) purchased them for $22 million, which strengthened its domestic and international networks and further boosted its assets by including the Haw Par Brothers' famed Tiger Balm business.

Apart from being a successful businessman, Lee was a philanthropist as well. In 1977 he donated a piece of land for the construction of a rehabilitation centre in 1977 at the Tan Tock Seng Hospital. The Little Sisters of the Poor in Penang was one of his favourite charities. Mount Alvernia Hospital, as well as the Children's Charities Association of Singapore (CCAS), also received his support. Lee went beyond donations, organizing activities for the needy as well. Some examples include activities for the CCAS at Wonderland, a recreation centre in Kallang, and at the Golden Lotus Hotel in Malaysia. The Spastic Children's Association of Singapore was treated to magic shows at the Island Ballroom in Shangri-La Singapore.

To his native town, Daik-U, Lee sent anti-cancer drugs, machinery, housing materials, and other products unattainable in Burma. In one of his trips to Daik-U, he donated a large statue of Buddha to a monastery. The Tiger Vocational School for Orphans founded by Aw Boon Haw had also been Lee's favourite charity in Rangoon. He was honoured as "U Chee Shan" by the Chinese Merchants Club, Rangoon.

Lee's medical history included two serious strokes and diabetes, which left him incapacitated in 1983. On 22 June 1986, he died of kidney failure in his home in Singapore at the age of seventy-seven. Lee had two sons and two daughters.

Lee Chong Wei

(李宗伟, Li Zongwei, 1982–)
Badminton champion, Malaysia

Lee Chong Wei is one of the greatest Malaysian badminton players of the modern era. He has broken many boundaries by setting new records and milestones over a decade and has also been a constant thorn in the flesh of Olympic and four-time world champion Lin Dan of China. Except for the Olympic and Asian Games gold medals and the world title, Chong Wei has won almost all other major Open titles since first breaking into the senior league in 2001. He has forty-one international titles under his belt. For fourteen months — between September 2010 and October 2011 — he reigned supreme, reaching fifteen back-to-back finals and clinching ten titles to underline his consistency at the highest degree. He has also held the world No. 1 ranking since August 2008.

Lee's road to stardom began when he made the brave and bold decision — at the tender age of seventeen — to uproot himself from Penang to Kuala Lumpur. He was an unknown at the Badminton Association of Malaysia (BAM) academy in Taman Maluri, but he persevered. Finally his diligence paid off big time. Now, not only is he the country's megastar, but is a global sports figure as well. As incisive as he is on the court, he is just as astute off it, co-owning a badminton hall and helming several businesses. He is also one of the biggest money-making sports icons in the country, acting as an ambassador for many well known products. He has won many accolades and awards for his contribution to the sport and society. And, fittingly, he was conferred a datukship after winning the silver medal at the 2008 Beijing Olympic Games. In 2011, he was named the most popular male badminton player in a fan poll taken by the Badminton World Federation (BWF).

Lee was born to Lee Ah Chai and Khor Kim Chooi in Georgetown, Penang, on 21 October 1982 and is the youngest of four siblings. His two brothers are Lee Chong Hoon and Lee Chong Eng and his sister is Lee Mei Ching. His family's support has been pivotal in his rise as a world-class shuttler. It was his father, a small businessman, who introduced him to badminton when he was just nine years old and he took to the sport like fish to water. He received his early education at the Jit Sin Primary School and his secondary education at the Berapit Secondary School in Bukit Mertajam. Instead of devoting his time to his studies like most of his peers, his mind and soul were always on badminton. He first trained under Teh Peng Huat and he still makes it a point to visit his mentor whenever he visits his family in Penang.

Lee joined the BAM Academy (then at Taman Maluri) at the age of seventeen. He nailed his first national junior title at that age and defended it a year later — ending his junior career on a high. He was promoted to the senior backup team in 2001, where he struggled for two years — held back by a lack of significant results and indiscipline. But his fortune changed after he won the 2002 National Grand Prix Finals. His first real breakthrough at the premier local tournament, marked by a crucial win over senior Wong Choong Hann, catapulted his prolific rise. Since then, he has never allowed any player to beat him on the local scene.

Over the years, as he transformed himself from a wide-eyed junior shuttler to a world-class senior superstar, Lee has had the privilege of learning from several top-notch coaches — Morten Frost of Denmark (briefly), the late Indra Gunawan of Indonesia, Li Mao of China, and Misbun Sidek and Tey Seu Bock of Malaysia. Each of them contributed significantly to his meteoric rise from a potential talent to a world-beater, but it is Misbun who probably holds a special spot in Lee's heart. After all, it was Misbun who spotted and earmarked him as a future star for the country and treated him like his own son. In fact, Lee's highest achievement — winning the Olympic Games silver medal in Beijing — came when he was under Misbun's guidance.

Thanks to the wide range of coaching influences he enjoyed, his style of play became more solid and steadier and his game became more difficult to predict. He is super fast on court and his fitness is always at the highest level. He boasts a variety of attacking options to his game and often catches his opponents off guard with his deceptive moves. Barring injuries, he is one of the most difficult players to overcome.

Lee has over the years crossed swords with many opponents, but three men — China's Lin Dan, Indonesia's Taufik Hidayat, and Denmark's Peter-Gade Christensen — continue to stand ominously in his path. Of the three, Lin Dan has grown to be his arch-enemy, especially since his first defeat to China's most gifted player in the quarter-finals of the Asian Junior Championships in 2000. Lee Chong Wei and Lin Dan have met twenty-eight times in senior tournaments, with the Malaysian winning just nine of them. Four-time world champion Lin Dan has denied the Malaysian of all the major titles — the Olympic Games, world championships and the Asian Games — so far.

Lee experienced his biggest disappointments at the hand of Lin Dan — at the 2008 Olympic Games and the 2011 world meet in Wembley. In Beijing, Lin Dan inflicted a crushing win over Lee in one of the most one-sided men's singles finals in the Olympic Games series. In Wembley, Lee was just a point away from becoming the first Malaysian world champion when Lin Dan staged a superb comeback at 18-20 in the decider to win the title. Lee, however, has turned the tables on Lin Dan as well. Two incidents come to mind. In 2006, he produced a remarkable fightback from 14-20 down in the decider to beat Lin Dan in the Malaysia Open final. Then, in 2010, he defeated Lin Dan to win the 100th edition of the All-England at Birmingham — finally overcoming the choker's tag following his failure in major events.

Lee will seek to end the country's chase for the elusive gold medal at the 2012 London Olympic Games in August and the 2013 World Championships in China before finally calling it quits. He plans to be involved in business although he has admitted that he may turn to coaching after his retirement. He has won many accolades, thanks to his string of successes over the decade. He was named the National Sportsman of the Year in 2005 and 2008, and the Penang Sportsman for four years (2005, 2007, 2008, 2009, and 2011). In 2008, he was named the male Olympian of the Year. He was also voted the Badminton World Federation's (BWF) Player of the Year in 2008 and 2011.

Lee Chong Wei has been hailed a national hero for winning the silver medal at the Beijing Olympic Games. To many juniors in this multifaceted country — whatever their race, culture, ethnicity, or religion, Lee has become their idol and role model. In major tournaments such as Olympic Games and world championships, the whole nation comes together to throw its support behind him. He unites the nation through his excellence in sports. For a country that is so diverse and divided by its political and socio-economic differences, Lee has been a uniting force. His dedication and commitment on court have been exemplary and he has been selected as an ambassador by many sponsors for their products because of the fine example he sets as a successful badminton player. His rags to riches story, as scripted in his autobiography, Dare to be a Champion, is an inspiration to many. The book was officially launched on 18 January 2012.

Sport has never been highly regarded as a viable source of income, but Lee changed that perception with his exploits, proving to one and all that playing badminton can be financially rewarding too. Besides devoting his time to badminton, the ever innovative and shrewd Lee has also ventured successfully into the world of business. He has several landed properties and owns quite a collection of expensive cars. He also has a team of consultants to take care of his finances and business plans. He even teamed up with several partners to build the 10-million-ringgit Lee Chong Wei Sports Arena at Taman Sentosa that is run by the Looi Badminton Academy. This academy, established in 2006, runs regimented training programmes for inspiring players. Despite his hectic schedule, Lee always takes time to motivate the juniors by conducting coaching clinics. He also has a heart of gold, and is always eager to help those in need and are less privileged. He was the prime mover in rallying support to raise donations for the tsunami victims in Japan.

Lee-Chua, Queena N.

(李婷雅, Li Tingya, 1966–)
Scholar, educator, Philippines

Queena Lee-Chua's passion is to share and spread the value of understanding science both inside and outside the lecture hall. Numerous books, articles, lectures, columns, and other communication tools in her name mirror a vastly creative and disciplined persona. "In this millennium, science literacy is paramount to remain competitive in the global arena. All channels of creative and interesting science communication need to be harnessed for Filipinos to achieve technological understanding and appreciation," according to the citation of the Outstanding Science Communicator awardee in 2008 from the Department of Science and Technology (DOST).

Born on 13 April 1966, Lee-Chua never dreamed of becoming a teacher. In primary school at the Immaculate Concepcion Academy, she thought she would become a doctor like her parents, Anita and William, and maternal grandfather, Benjamin Ngo Lio, a prominent physician who died of hepatitis B because he treated patients with this disease at a time when there were no precautions against it. In secondary school, she was so shocked with her first dissection of a frog that she changed her mind and vowed, instead, to one day become the boss of her own business and make loads of money. However, she always had an equal love for both the humanities and the sciences and thus had quite a decision to make before going to the Ateneo de Manila University in 1987. She chose to take up mathematics eventually, figuring that the course would open doors to multinational corporations, financial institutions, and, ultimately, her own business. As Lee-Chua recounted in her acceptance speech for her 2003 Metrobank Outstanding Teachers Awards, fate intervened in her senior year at university. Two professors invited her to teach at Ateneo after her graduation with a degree in BS Mathematics, summa cum laude, citing the clarity of her presentations and oral examinations. Her promise to teach for only a year before embarking on her "money-earning business" has turned into more than two decades of mentoring students, primary and secondary school teachers, colleagues, parents, civic groups, businesses, etc. Lee-Chua also received a master's degree in counseling psychology and a doctorate in clinical psychology from Ateneo, where she is now full professor at the Department of Mathematics.

Lee-Chua has a list of accomplishments and activities that stretches out to a prolific frontier. She has written science and maths books, a newspaper column, and teaches both subjects to students, parents, the media, etc. She acknowledges that Filipinos are generally not known for their maths or science ability, and thus in various fora, she has spoken about the disparity in the country's educational system — an Asian country using an American system. Her work brings to the fore this disparity and ways to improve maths and science learning, making them "fun" through "simpler, more understandable language" for students, which means strengthening the rigorous foundations of the two, as well as infusing creativity in the teaching process. She remains consistent in her goal and is never tired of sharing her passion, bringing the "fun" in science to print, radio, television, online, and interpersonal audiences. Lee-Chua is a much sought-after speaker in various fora, from the classroom to media to local and international conferences. She is also a consultant to family businesses, finance corporations, schools, and non-profit organizations, the Department of Education, and the DOST. A governing member of the National Book Development Board, she specializes in mathematics and science education and learning psychology, especially in maths, science, and child cognitive and behavioural development.

One example of Lee-Chua's outreach to the public is the column "Eureka!", begun in 1991, which appears every week in the Learning Section of the Philippine Daily Inquirer, the leading English daily newspaper in the country. She also writes a monthly column, "Homework", for Working Mom Magazine. She has written more than twenty books on mathematics, science and IT, parenting, family businesses, and inspirational stories. She used to host the TV show, Fun with Math on PTV 4. The volume of email and snail mail she receives from the general public across the nation is testament to how well received her writings are.

In research, Lee-Chua headed a team from Ateneo de Manila University that studied how public and private school students excel in school. The main finding of the studies was that family was a significant factor in school achievement. From the studies, the team came up with best practices that were published in Helping Our Children Do Well in School: 10 Best Practices from the Ateneo de Manila High School Parents Study (2004), which won the National Book Award in 2004, and Magaling ang Pinoy: How and Why Filipino Public School Students Achieve (2007), which won the Ateneo Loyola Schools' Most Outstanding Scholarly Work with Social Impact. Lee-Chua and a partner in the study have given more than 100 talks to date on their findings in schools, parent groups, and also in training for public school parents in Marikina City, and Quezon City (at the invitation of city mayors), and are now branching out to other areas. In these training sessions, the team discusses how parents can help their children achieve in school.

Lee-Chua has garnered many awards, among them the TOYM (The Outstanding Young Men), the TOWNS (The Outstanding Women in the Nation's Service), the Metrobank Outstanding Teachers Award, the OYS (Outstanding Young Scientists), the Jose Rizal Awards for Excellence, the National Book Award, the National Science and Technology Journalism Awards, Outstanding S & T Columnist, and the Carlos Palanca Memorial Awards for Literature. She was also named among Asia Inc. Magazine's "Who's Hot in Asia" in 2004, and the Philippines' 25 Incredible Women in Marie Claire Magazine in October 2005, and was an Outstanding Teacher Honoree of the Bato-Balani Foundation in September 2006. Most recently, she won the first Regional Prize for Public Understanding of Science in the East and Southeast Asia and the Pacific from the Third World Academy of Sciences for her Philippine Daily Inquirer column on maths and science. Her publications also won critical acclaim. One of her books, Ten Outstanding Filipino Scientists, won the Ateneo Loyola Schools Publications Awards. The book is intended primarily for secondary school and university students, but is appreciated by the public in general. Why Be Afraid of Math and Other Mysteries was her first popular science book. The second was In The Beginning and Other Scientific Journeys. Her Student Workbook for Casio FX-991MS Calculator was intended for science secondary-school students, and university and graduate students and the exercises in the book were the most advanced, but still catered to a wide range of levels from trigonometric functions to calculus. The workbook has been exhibited, translated, and sold abroad in other languages.

Lee Dai Soh

(李大傻, Li Dasha, 1913–89)
Cantonese story-teller, broadcaster, Singapore

Lee Dai Soh was probably Singapore's best known Cantonese storyteller who lived in the twentieth century. A household name since the early fifties, Lee spent fifty of his seventy-seven years spinning his yarns on radio and Rediffusion. For decades, this professional storyteller entertained generations of Singaporeans with his stories culled from folklore, popular swordfighting novels, and even the Chinese classics. Many of his stories were broadcast in Malaysia, Hong Kong, and Australia as well. They were also made into tapes and CDs later.

Lee Dai Soh or Li Dasha, whose name means the Big Fool, was born Lee Fook Hong in 1913 in Telok Blangah. He was the third of five sons of a steel burner repairman, Li Geng, who came from Guangdong province in China. Lee's father made his fortune from contracts awarded to him by the Port of Singapore Authority. In his early years, the family was so well-to-do that Lee and his brothers could be ferried to and from school in a rickshaw.

But the good days were over soon after his mother's death while giving birth and his father became insane and died in China. Supported by his two elder brothers, Lee studied in Yeung Ching (Yangzheng) School in Singapore up to Secondary 2, after which the school discontinued its secondary school section. He then continued his education in the English-medium Anglo-Chinese Continuation School. But he dropped out after only a short stint in the school and started working.

A man of many trades and talents, Lee worked in several jobs, including a short stint as a Chinese newspaper reporter. He went into storytelling on radio quite by accident in 1938. That year the Chinese department of Radio Malaya, the predecessor of Radio Singapore, was recruiting a Chinese storyteller for the first time. An old schoolmate of his from Yeung Ching School recommended him to the radio station because he was already an outstanding storyteller and stage performer during his school days. He went for the audition and was readily offered the post.

He became the first ever storyteller on the airwaves in the whole of Malaya and Singapore. He started with a fifteen-minute weekly programme called "Tan Tian Shuo Di", or talking about heaven and earth. The programme, aired every Sunday morning from 9.30, had him talking about everything under the sun — from folklores and traditional Chinese beliefs to legendary heroes and villains in Chinese history, to current affairs topics. The popular programme which shot him to instant fame was one of the longest-running in the broadcasting history here, lasting more than thirty years.

Lee changed his original name, Lee Fook Hong, to Lee Dai Soh when he started the weekly programme because the radio station wanted him to be known by an easy to remember name. Since the signature song of the programme, which was sung to the tune of the popular Cantonese folk number, Hon Tin Looi, by musician Ho Dai Soh, he called himself Lee Dai Soh for convenience and stuck to it from then on. And because his original name, Lee Fook Hong, was also the name of an accountant in town, he received a letter from the tax department one day by mistake, accusing him of not declaring his accounting firm's income. Though he wrote in to the department to say he was not the accountant they were looking for, he still changed his name on his identity card to Lee Dai Soh to avoid a similar mix-up in future.

A born performer, Lee showed his potential when he was barely eight years old and a primary school pupil at Yueng Ching. Every Wednesday, his schoolmates would gather in the school hall where they took turns to make speeches, tell stories, or to perform a play or Chinese opera. The young Lee cherished all these opportunities to perform and did very well on stage, impressing all his teachers and fellow pupils. Years later, when he looked back to those early school days, he realized he owed his success to the training and exposure he had in school.

Except for the Japanese Occupation years between 1942 and 1945, when he worked in cinemas giving Cantonese summaries and explanations to Japanese movies to the audience, his storytelling career on Singapore Radio and Rediffusion was smooth and uninterrupted until the "Speak Mandarin" campaign started in 1979. All Chinese dialect programmes, including his stories in Cantonese and those of his colleagues, Ong Toh and Ng Chia Keng, in Hokkien and Teochew respectively, were then banned from broadcast on radio and Rediffusion by 1982 as the campaign sought to promote Mandarin as the common language among all Chinese Singaporeans.

Overnight Lee lost his job as a storyteller on radio and Rediffusion. Although he was already nearly seventy years old and long past retirement age, he was still disappointed. He felt he was still able and healthy and his stories on the airwaves were still enjoying a large following. So Lee moved from the radio studio to tell his stories in other media, writing columns in the Chinese newspapers, publishing books of his stories, and making recordings of his tales to market them as cassette tapes and later CDs.

He published his autobiography in Chinese in 1984 and was invited to give public performances at shopping malls and during Chinese festivals, when he would relate stories connected to the festive celebrations, such as the Chinese New Year and the Mooncake Festival. He even tried telling his stories in Mandarin in public.

Lee became active in Chinese clan associations, including Tung On Wui Kun and Kwong Wai Shiu Peck San Teng, in his last years. He was still telling his stories to members of the Tung On Wui Kun weekly and recording his stories in Cantonese for broadcast in Australia when he died of a sudden heart attack on 23 March 1989, aged seventy-seven.

Since his passing, Lee has been remembered fondly as the greatest Cantonese storyteller in Singapore. Barely three months after his death, the Singapore theatre group, Practice Theatre Ensemble, staged "Dramatic Encounters", which included a narrative tribute to the legendary storyteller that came with a slide show and a playing of his recordings by the group's artistic director, Kuo Pao Kun, who said the value of Lee's art could not be refuted.

In 2007 local Mandarin drama group, Toy Factory, produced a musical play, Lee Dai Soh, in his memory and to document his achievements and legacy.

Lee left behind two wives, Wong Chow Foon and Meng Yeow Hon, son Chee Leong, and daughters Yun Han and Oi Lin.

Lee, Dick

(Richard 'Dick' Lee Peng Boon, 李炳文, Li Bingwen, 1956–)

Composer, lyricist, performer, music producer, Singapore

Dick Lee is a Singapore-born composer and performer whose central achievement was to attempt to be 'the spokesman for the New Asian generation', as his own website phrases it. His popular music and musicals experimented with a mix of Anglo-American and various Asian musical forms, and he also mixed languages such as English, Mandarin-Chinese and Malay together — both steps were innovative for the 1980s and 1990s. The result, in many regards, reflected the diversity of Singapore's cultural heritage and citizenry. Identity issues thus were essential to Lee's (often witty, and sometimes over-the-top and campy) musical representation of a cosmopolitan and multicultural pan-Asia. In 1990, a Japanese academic commentator contended that Lee's new sound 'attain[ed] a consistent multiplex structure, so much so that his music suggests the possibility of the mingled existence of multiple rhythms in one song.... Dick Lee as a Singaporean is free from a strong drawing force to the [once-]motherland [of China] and therefore has attained the freedom as well as the sorrow of a nomadic subjectivity' (cited by Iwabuchi, p. 165).

Lee started off in the mid-1970s writing English-language pop music, and by the early part of the 1980s, started incorporating specific local touches into his music. His regional success really took off with his 1989 album, The Mad Chinaman. Three more key albums soon followed: Asia Major (1990), Orientalism (1991) and The Year of the Monkey (1992). In 1990, he went to Japan, where he continued his career announcing the arrival of a confident New Asian sensibility. In 1998, he was headhunted to be the regional vice-president for Artists and Repertoire for Sony Music's Asian division. This saw him relocating to Hong Kong and being responsible for the pop-music scenes in ten Asian countries. In 2000, Lee returned to Singapore, where he worked in television and also as an associate director of the Singapore Repertory Theatre. His music was initially not well-received by the Singapore state's humourless cultural authorities — the 1980's song 'Fried Rice Paradise', for example, was banned from the airwaves for its populist sending-up of local life. By the mid-1990s, though, with regional success established, Lee came to be celebrated by the same authorities, and in both 2002 and 2010 was appointed the creative director of Singapore's National Day Parade. The state awarded him the Cultural Medallion in 2005 and, prior to that and importantly, he was the recipient of the prestigious 2003 Fukuoka Asian Culture Prize for the arts and culture.

Lee grew up in Singapore in an upper-middle-class Peranakan (or Straits-Chinese) family in which English was spoken. He was educated at the St Joseph's Institution and later attended the Harrow School of Art in England, where he studied fashion design. He participated in the local music scene in talent contests and made a number of appearances in variety shows on the then-Radio and Television Singapore. In 1992, Lee married jazz singer and stage actor Jacintha Abisheganaden; they were subsequently divorced in 1997.

As mentioned, identity is a major thematic in Lee's work. The Mad Chinaman blends traditional Chinese and Southeast Asian music and older Chinese popular music either to create his own compositions, or to be played on top of more contemporary rhythms. What is apparent is that Lee sees the Anglo-American West as part of his (and Singapore's) cultural mix. The music becomes an investigation of the links between the West and Singapore-Asian plural identities, and indicates that there is no need for cultural 'purity': we are what we are, and this is positive. In the liner notes of Asia Major, Lee writes: 'I've always felt this need to find a musical answer to my identity problem. You see, coming from Singapore, where east truly meets west on an island largely of immigrants, there's always this thing about how we should dress, speak and sound.... Why not throw in the traditional aspects in with the contemporary, add a few of my own touches, and mix them … to create a new kind of Asian pop.'

However, this 'new kind of Asian pop' should not be rehashed traditional exotica that is stuck is the past. In the suitably electro-pop title track of Orientalism, Lee sings: 'all of us are no / Caricatures or stereotypes, / No token yellows! … This is the new Asian / Ready for the twenty-first century!' The significant economic context that frames his work — a context that is hard to separate from the cultural achievement — is what in the 1980s and 1990s was called the 'East Asian Miracle', a period during which the 'Tiger' economies of Singapore, Taiwan, Hong Kong and South Korea followed the post-war Japanese success story, and inevitably became keen to take a more equal place in the world, now that they were more on par with the former colonial West. Lee's music contains a combative narrative of progress that anticipates Western scepticism over a now-achieved 'Asian' modernity.

Japan was Dick Lee's most successful Asian market. The Mad Chinaman and Asia Major were his best-received albums there because of the hybrid musical style in which the Asian exotic was combined with sophisticated Western music styles. However, the popularity was not sustained beyond a point. Orientalism had less of the juxtaposition of the Asian traditional and the modern, which seemed to be what the Japanese market found attractive.

Lee also contributed in a signal way to the rise of the Singapore-made and Singapore-themed musical, written either completely by him (Fried Rice Paradise [1991; also 2010], which was set in the 1970s; Mortal Sins [1994]; Forbidden City: Portrait of an Empress [2002; also 2003, 2006]), or in partnership with others. Singapore playwright Michael Chiang merits a particular note, as together they created the popular paean to the 1960's Cantonese-Chinese melodrama, the often-staged Beauty World (1988; also 1993, 1998 and 2008). Such musical work contributed towards a wave of nostalgia for the 1960s and 1970s that since has influenced other theatre and televisual productions in the city-state. Lee also contributed to Snow.Wolf.Lake (1997), which featured the Hong Kong singer and actor Jackie Cheung as both the lead character and the artistic director of the musical. The most important musical of Lee's career is probably Nagraland (1992), which dealt with the struggle between the contemporary and the traditional, and the need to be both at the same time. It was a 'first' in being a Singapore musical staged outside the city-state — in Japan and Hong Kong. Described in the publicity (perhaps a little grandiosely) as an Oriental pop operetta, Nagraland had an artistic team that drew upon the talents of notable regional figures, including the late doyen of Malaysian theatre, director Krishen Jit, Malaysian choreographer Marion D'Cruz, Japanese rock star Miyazawa Kazufumi and Singapore designer Yang Derong — all this is in keeping with Lee's pan-Asian cultural rhetoric. The musical cost an unprecedented Singapore $6.4 million, with significant funding from Japanese corporate giant Mitsubishi.

While Lee's work is not always regarded as 'serious' — critics at the peak of his popularity in Singapore in the late 1980s and the early 1990s felt that the music was commercial and gimmicky pastiche — the music and the theatre productions crucially worked to give legitimacy to the staging of the multiplicity of Singaporean identities in the serious and popular arts at a point when a self-defeating postcolonial cultural cringe was prevalent in Singapore life. In broader symbolic terms, the Los Angeles Times, in their 19 May 1992 edition, may have been right to suggest that 'in appealing for Pan-Asian pop culture unity, Lee stands as the clearest symbol yet of an intriguing shift afoot … in the Pacific Rim'.

Lee Hau Shik

(李孝式, Li Xiaoshi, 1901–88)
Tin-miner, banker, cabinet minister, Malaysia

Popularly known as Henry H.S. Lee, Lee Hau Shik played a key role in Malaysia's economic and political development from 1930s until his death in 1988. Lee was Malaya's first finance minister in 1957. However, he is better remembered as a founder leader of the Malayan Chinese Association (MCA) and for forging an MCA-UMNO alliance in 1952. Following Lee's death, the Malaysian Government renamed High Street in Kuala Lumpur to honour him.

Lee who was born in Hong Kong, studied at the Christian College in Guangzhou and Queen's College in Hong Kong, and completed his law and economics degree at Cambridge University.

After graduation, he served in the Customs Department on Hainan island, but left shortly to join P and O Bank in Hong Kong.

In 1924, while on a business visit to Malaya for his family firm, Kam Lun Tai, Lee bought a tin mine near Kuala Lumpur. He then set up the Tai Yau company as a subsidiary of Kam Lun Tai. More importantly, Lee made a momentous decision to stay on in Malaya.

Facing a labour shortage, Lee recruited men from Gaozhou, his home area in China. With the arrival of Gaozhou migrants, Lee helped set up a Gaozhou association to provide welfare support. Through this association, he became actively involved in the local Chinese guilds and clan scene, helping to form the Guangdong Association, the All-Malaya Chinese Mining Association, and the Selangor Chinese Chamber of Commerce.

Lee was also concerned with events in China. With reports of Japan invading China and in the aftermath of the Marco Polo Bridge incident in July 1937, Lee helped set up the Selangor China Relief Fund. Elected president of the organization, he led a delegation to the inaugural meeting of the Southeast Asia Federation of China Relief Fund in October 1938 in Singapore. The federation, formed that year, was headed by business tycoon Tan Kah Kee.

At the outbreak of World War Two, Lee was made Civil Defence Force head in Kuala Lumpur. But as Japanese forces advanced rapidly into Malaya, Lee and his family evacuated to India as Lee was certain that he was on the Japanese wanted list because of his anti-Japanese activities. While in India he served as colonel in the British and Chinese nationalist armies.

After the war Lee was appointed to committees entrusted to rebuild the Malayan economy. Most notably, he served in the War Damage Commission that gave out compensation for losses suffered during the war. Lee made a tour of the devastated areas of the country and recommended that $20 million be allocated to the Chinese Tin Mines Rehabilitation Loans Fund. He also revived the Selangor Chinese Chambers of Commerce and, through this, reactivated the national-based Chinese Chamber of Commerce. He was also made a member of the Malayan Union Advisory Council, the Federal Executive Council, and the Federal Legislative Council.

With the declaration of the Emergency in 1948, Lee became an adviser to the director of operations. Earlier in 1946, he had founded the China Press, a Chinese-language newspaper, to counter the pro-left wing newspaper, Min Sheng Pao. Lee was a strong supporter of the Kuomintang even though he was not elected to the movement's Selangor leadership in 1948.

In 1949 he helped found the MCA. Then in the 1952 Kuala Lumpur Municipal Council elections, Lee worked out an UMNO-MCA electoral alliance with Datuk Yahaya bin Datuk Abdul Razak, a Selangor UMNO leader, to contest against the Independence of Malaya Party (IMP) of Dato Onn Jaffar. The IMP, favoured by the British, was expected to win. In the end the UMNO-MCA alliance won and that electoral partnership formed the basis of a national-based Alliance Party that is now the ruling Barisan Nasional. After the Alliance's win in the first federal elections in 1955, Lee was made transport minister.

He was part of the Alliance mission led by UMNO president Tunku Abdul Rahman for constitutional talks in 1956 in London, and was the only Chinese signatory to the Malayan independence agreement. When Malaya became independent in 1957, Lee was appointed the first finance minister.

In 1955, Lee lost his Selangor MCA leadership when he was defeated by Ong Yoke Lin. In 1957, he and his son, Douglas, sought to regain control of the Selangor MCA, but failed. It was said that Lee's aloof style contributed to his defeat in the Selangor MCA elections in 1955 and 1957.

He did not contest in the 1959 general elections on health grounds and left the cabinet that year. He was made chairman of the Board of Commissioner of Currency, Malaya, which he served until 1961. But it was clear that his alignment with MCA president Lim Chong Eu during the latter's dispute with UMNO in 1959 contributed to his retirement from politics.

Lee thereupon returned to active business pursuits. But with the tin mining industry in decline, he turned to banking. He established the Development and Commercial Bank in 1966, which subsequently became Malaysia's fifth largest bank, and he led the bank until his death in 1988. Lee, largely through his son Alex, gained control of Roxy Electric Bhd., a publicly listed company soon after establishing the bank. He was also chairman of D and C Finance, D and C Nomura Merchant Bank, On Tai Development, Roxy Malaysia, and vice chairman of Golden Castell Finance Corporation. In the end the Lee family lost control of the D and C Bank, as well as Roxy, largely because of some allegedly questionable management and investment decisions.

Lee was one of the very few China-born Chinese who rose to play such a major social and political role in Malaya. His politics had shifted over the years from a China-oriented outlook towards a Malaysian commitment. A similar transition also took place in his managing of the family business. Lee showed little interest in the wider Kam Lun Tai interests and concentrated instead in his tin-mining ventures in Malaya.

The significance of Lee in Malaysia's political history lies in the bridging role he played in the years just before the country's independence. Given the different background and expectations of the various communities then, the task was not easy. Within the Chinese community, there were the more localized Chinese and the recent arrivals, the Western educated and the Chinese-educated, the conservative merchants and business groups who belonged to the guilds and associations, and the more radical. Then there was the gap between the Chinese and Malays. For a short period, Lee found himself in a position that enabled him to facilitate dialogue and forge close ties.

His links with British officials and business groups were an asset to him in the pre-independence period. He was a leader whom the British found easy and comfortable to deal with. This could be because of Lee's Cambridge University background and his reported friendship with the future King George the VI while both were students.

During a lifetime of public service, Lee served in many official and unofficial capacities. He was a member of the Kuala Lumpur Sanitary Board (1929–38, 1946–48), the Standing Advisory Committee for Tin Restriction (1946–55), Railway Advisory Board, Agricultural Advisory Board, and the Labour Advisory Board.

He was president of the All-Malaya Chinese Mining Association, Miners' Association of Selangor, and the Selangor Chinese Chamber of Commerce; council member of the Federated Malay States Chamber of Mines, and committee member of the Confucian School and Kuen Cheng Girls' School. He held positions as president of the All Malayan Gaozhou Association (from 1949), Federation of Guangdong Association (from 1962), Selangor Miners' Club (from 1938), and Associated Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry of Malaysia (1948–55).

Being an avid golfer, he was president of the Federation of Malaya Olympic Council from 1957 to 1959, and patron of the Malaysian Golf Association. He was vice-patron of the Royal Commonwealth Society (from 1970), vice-president of the Malaysian Zoological Society (from 1965), Institute of Banks in Malaya (from 1977), and member of the Board of Governors of the Lady Templer's Hospital which he helped in setting up.,

He also became a fellow of the Royal Economics Society, United Kingdom.

Lee received many awards during his lifetime. He was knighted by Queen Elizabeth in June 1957 and received the highest Malaysian title of 'Tun' two years later on 31 August 1959.

Two of his sons were also involved in politics. Douglas Lee, the eldest son, won a seat in the Kuala Lumpur Municipal elections in 1952. Alex Lee, the youngest son, helped initiate the Chinese Unity Movement in the immediate post-1969 politics and was later deputy minister in the Malaysian cabinet, and treasurer in Parti Gerakan Rakyaat Malaysia.

Lee was married first to Dawn Kathleen Glen and they had a son, Douglas Lee Kim Kiu. He later married Kwan Choi Lin and they had three sons, George Lee Yau Lung, Thomas Lee Mun Lung, and Alex Lee Yu Lung, and two daughters, Jasmine Lee and Violet Lee.

Lee Hsien Loong

(李显龙, Li Xianlong, 1952–)
Third prime minister of Singapore

Lee Hsien Loong is the third prime minister of Singapore and the eldest son of Singapore's first prime minister, Lee Kuan Yew. He succeeded Goh Chok Tong as Singapore's prime minister in 2004.

Lee Hsien Loong was born in Singapore on 10 February 1952, to Lee Kuan Yew and Kwa Geok Choo. He was educated at Nanyang Primary School, Catholic High School, the National Junior College, and Cambridge University. A stellar student, who could read Jawi and Russian in addition to English and Mandarin, Lee won the President's Scholarship in 1970 and was awarded the Singapore Armed Forces (SAF) Scholarship the following year. He read mathematics and computer science at Cambridge University where he graduated with first class honours in mathematics in 1974. On graduation, he resumed his national service as an artillery officer and rose very quickly through the ranks. In 1978, Lee attended the United States Army Command and General Staff College course at Fort Leavenworth before proceeding to the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University where he was Mason Fellow. In 1980, he graduated with a Master's degree in public administration from the same school.

In 1980, Lee was appointed commanding officer of the 23rd Artillery Battalion, and thereafter, was promoted with great rapidity through the ranks. In 1981, Lee was appointed assistant chief of General Staff (Operations), and then chief of General Staff in 1982 with the rank of full colonel. The following year, he was appointed director of the Joint Operations Planning Directorate and shot to national prominence in January that year when he directed the rescue of persons trapped in Sentosa's cable car system after it was struck by the pylon of a passing oil rig. Lee resigned from the Singapore Armed Forces on 21 September 1984 to enter politics. Although only thirty-two at that point in time, he was the youngest brigadier general in the Singapore Armed Forces' (SAF) history and has been credited with unifying the SAF's three services and the modernization of its weaponry.

Lee joined the People's Action Party (PAP) and in 1984 contested the general elections, winning the seat in Teck Ghee Constituency. He was political secretary to the minister for defence from September 1984 to December 1984. His appointment as minister of state (defence; trade and industry) took effect from 1 January 1985. The following year, he was promoted to full minister and was made minister for trade and industry as well as second minister for defence. Lee's rise within the PAP, as well as in cabinet was as meteoric as it was in the SAF. In 1986, barely four years after joining the party, Lee was inducted into the PAP's Central Executive Committee (CEC). Three years later, he became second assistant secretary-general, and in 1990, was appointed deputy prime minister. Lee gave up the trade and industry portfolio in 1992 to become the sole minister for defence, a post he held till 1995. That year, he was also elected first assistant secretary-general of the PAP.

Lee was diagnosed with lymphoma in 1992 and his workload was reduced while he underwent chemotherapy treatment. In 1998, he was appointed chairman of the Monetary Authority of Singapore, and in 2001, was made minister for finance. On 12 August 2004, Lee who was now the PAP's secretary-general, succeeded Goh Chok Tong as prime minister of Singapore. He retained his finance portfolio, relinquishing it only in 2007.

At his maiden National Day Rally Speech, Lee announced that the government would initiate a five-day work week with effect from 1 January 2005, and also proposed a two-month maternity leave for mothers of newborn infants, as well as financial incentives for mothers to give birth to a fourth child. In November 2004, he sparked a national debate when he announced the building of two integrated resorts (IRs) which would include casinos. The government decided to proceed with the projects in April 2005 despite a strong body of opposition from members of the public. In February 2006, Lee announced a S$2.6 billion "Progress Package" bonus for all Singaporeans. The scheme was to enable the government to distribute budget surpluses accumulated over the past few years in the form of cash payouts to adult Singaporeans, as well as top-ups to Central Provident Fund accounts, and rental and utility rebates for those residing in public housing. On 6 May 2006, Lee led the PAP to victory in the general elections in which his party won eighty-two of the eighty-four seats. His own six-member team won the Ang Mo Kio Group Representation Constituency (GRC) with a 60.42 per cent majority.

On 7 May 2011, Lee led the PAP to victory in the most hotly contested general elections in post-Independence Singapore. On Nomination Day, all but one constituency was contested and the PAP won 81 of the 87 seats. This majority does not amply reflect the significant change the elections had wrought on Singapore politics. For the first time since its introduction in 1988, the PAP lost one GRC (Aljunied) and three cabinet ministers, including Foreign Minister George Yeo and Lim Hwee Hua (Singapore's first woman full minister), lost their seats. Mid-way through the campaigning, sensing the tide of resentment against the PAP, Lee made a public apology during a lunch-time election rally at UOB Plaza. This unprecedented move helped stem the anti-PAP tide and the ruling party won 60.14 per cent of the votes, the lowest majority it has ever garnered since Singapore's independence in 1965. This represented a 6.46 per cent swing against the Party. Lee himself led his GRC team to victory with 69.4 per cent of the votes cast, a vast improvement on his 2006 performance. When Lee was sworn in as Prime Minister on 21 May 2011, his new cabinet included three newly-appointed ministers. In the meantime, Minister Mentor Lee Kuan Yew and Senior Minister Goh Chok Tong resigned their ministerial positions as did ministers, Wong Kan Seng, Mah Bow Tan and Raymond Lim.

Lee married Malaysian-born doctor Wong Ming Yang in 1978 with whom he had a daughter and a son. Unfortunately Wong died of a heart attack on 28 October 1982, just three weeks after giving birth to their son Yi Peng. Lee married Ho Ching in 1985. They have two sons. Lee lists jogging, swimming, listening to classical music, reading, and tinkering with computers among his hobbies.

Lee Khoon Choy

(李炯才, Li Jiongcai, 1924–)

Diplomat, politician, writer, Singapore

Lee Khoon Choy (better known as K.C. Lee) is a leading diplomat who succeeded in establishing the foundation of cordial Singapore-Indonesian relations. He was also a Chinese-educated parliamentarian who represented the non-communist section in the People's Action Party (PAP) during the party's early parliamentary struggle.

K.C. Lee's father, Lee Kim Fook, was a poor peasant. He migrated to Malaya from China and became the richest man in Butterworth, a small town opposite Penang. Lee was born in Butterworth in 1924. His mother, Yong Nyuk Koon, was a nyonya. After graduating from Yeok Keow Chinese primary school, K.C. Lee went to Penang's Chung Ling High School, a leading Chinese high school with a strong English programme in 1937, and during this period became a Chinese nationalist which differentiated him from his English-educated friends who considered the United Kingdom their homeland. His studies were interrupted by the Japanese Occupation and he only finished his high school in 1946. He immediately worked for the paper, Xingbin Ribao (Penang), and the following year, was transferred to Sin Chew Jit Poh in Singapore. In September 1949 he received a scholarship to study Journalism in London's Regent Polytechnic and graduated with a diploma in 1950. It was in England that he joined the Malayan Forum rather than the China Association and changed his political orientation. He became Malayan-oriented and made friends with English-educated student leaders including Toh Chin Chay, S. Rajaratnam, Goh Keng Swee, and Lee Kuan Yew, who regarded Malaya (including Singapore) as their country and homeland.

After returning to Singapore, he continued to serve in Chinese newspapers. He moved to Nanyang Siang Pau and was later promoted to be the chief of a section. He was tasked to cover political and international events such as the 1955 Afro-Asian conference in Bandung (Indonesia) and the 1957 talk on merdeka for Malaya in London. In 1958 he came into conflict with his boss as a result of defending a friend who was unjustly sacked and forced to leave Nanyang Siang Pau. Nevertheless, he was immediately offered a job in The Straits Times, then a right-wing English newspaper. In 1959 the PAP decided to take part in the general elections and K.C. was approached by Lee Kuan Yew, Toh Chin Chye, and Rajaratnam to join the party and stand for election. The PAP wanted him because he was Chinese educated and was known as a non-communist. He accepted the invitation contesting in Bukit Panjang Constituency and won. He served as an MP from 1959–63, beginning his political life. When there was a split in the PAP between the pro-communist group and non-communist group in 1961, Lee sided with the the non-communist group which won a one-seat majority, causing the pro-communist group to form a new party, the Barisan Sosialis. He was promised a high position if he defected to the Barisan, but he declined.

Lee was also appointed parliamentary secretary to the Ministry of Culture (1959–61) and Ministry of Education (1961–63). In 1963 he lost his seat during the general election, but re-entered parliament in 1965 after winning the Hong Lim constituency by election. The same year he was appointed as minister of state for Culture and between 1968–70, minister of state in the Prime Minister's Office.

In 1968 he was asked by Rajaratnam to be Singapore ambassador to Egypt and be accredited to other Arab countries. The purpose was to convince Egypt that Singapore would recognize Israel, but would not change its stand on the Palestinian issue, that is, Israel needed to return occupied land. His diplomacy appeared to have been successful as there was no attack on the Singapore embassy in Cairo when Singapore declared its wish to establish ties with Israel.

While Lee was still in the Middle East, an event occurred which affected Singapore-Indonesia relations. In 1968, the Singapore court decided to hang two Indonesian marines who had bombed Robinson Department Store and killed a number of innocent people during the years of Konfrontasi (Confrontation). After that there was no Singapore ambassador in Jakarta. In 1970, K.C. Lee was summoned by the government to serve as Singapore ambassador to Indonesia to improve relations.

Perhaps, his ambassadorship in Indonesia was K.C. Lee's highest point in his career. He succeeded in laying down the foundation of cordial relations between Singapore and Indonesia. Lee studied the history, language, and culture of Indonesia, mingled with the Indonesian press, and got into the Indonesian elite circles. He was eventually accepted by the new Indonesian leadership and succeeded in making preparations for the official visit of Premier Lee Kuan Yew to Jakarta in 1973. It was reported that K.C. Lee even suggested to Lee Kuan Yew to sprinkle flowers on the graves of the marines hanged by Singapore during his visit to the Indonesian Heroes Cemetery. This symbolic act of friendship won over the trust of Soeharto and from that time on, Singapore's relations with Indonesia improved greatly. K.C. Lee also received a medal from the Indonesian Government for his contribution to good relations between the two countries.

Lee was not trained as a diplomat, but he had the acumen of a successful diplomat. After Indonesia, he was sent to Japan as ambassador (1984–88), and again he managed to perform his duties well as he also learned the language and culture of Japan. He also received an award during his ambassadorship from the Japanese. In fact, when he was Singapore's ambassador to Japan, he was also accredited to South Korea which he visited once every three months.

In 1984, Lee expressed his desire to retire from politics as he still kept his position as a member of parliament while being ambassador. In 1988, he eventually retired from politics and diplomacy. However, he did not stop learning and writing. When he was still active in local politics, he published a few books in Chinese.

Later he shifted to publishing books in English. When he was still serving as ambassador in Jakarta, he began to publish books on Indonesian history and culture. He was also an accomplished water-colour painter and published some of his works in books. K.C. Lee also published his memoirs when he was still in active duty. After retirement, he began to visit China and eventually published books on the history and culture of China. Lee never stops working and writing. He told this writer that this is his secret for long life. He is currently eighty-eight years of age.

Lee Kim Sai

(李金狮, Li Jinshi, 1937–)
Politician, Malaysia

Dato Lee Kim Sai was minister in the Malaysian cabinet and deputy president of the Malaysian Chinese Association (September 1986–July1996).

Lee (alias Lee Ho) was born on 1 March 1937 in Ulu Klang in Selangor and brought up in Jinjang, a village in the northern outskirts of Kuala Lumpur. The fourth of seven siblings, he grew up in poverty, having to collect scrap rubber to help support the family as his father passed away when he was twelve. According to Lee, his mother did dulang-washing, cultivated vegetables, and sewed buttons for tailoring shops to support the family.

Lee completed his Senior Middle III at Chung Wah High School in Kuala Lumpur and was trained at the Teachers Training College in Kuala Lumpur. He started his teaching career in 1957 and later became principal of the Kepong Chinese School.

Lee Kim Sai joined the Malaysian Chinese Association in 1965 and rose fast within the party. He was a charismatic leader and became MCA Youth's secretary general in 1975, Selangor MCA chairman in 1977, head of the MCA Youth in 1979 and, in the same year, was elected MCA vice-president.

In 1984, following a factional conflict, Lee was expelled from the party together with Tan Koon Swan, Ling Liong Sik, and several others. Fighting over what was known as the Phantom Members issue, faction members essentially engaged in what was a power struggle within the party after the sudden resignation of Lee San Choon as president. Lee and his supporters had accused the MCA leadership of adding non-members' and fictitious names to lists belonging to divisions favouring acting president Datuk Neo Yee Pan so as to enable more delegates to attend the impending Annual General Meeting where party elections were to be held. Following his expulsion Lee was also removed as deputy minister.

The party crisis lasted several months and ended only after intervention by Tun Ghafar Baba, then deputy president of UMNO. As part of a brokered deal, party elections were held in November 1985. The Tan Koon Swan faction won the elections and Lee was elected one of the vice-presidents. When Tan resigned as president following his arrest by the Singapore Government over the Pan El affair, Ling Liong Sik, the deputy-president, became acting president and Lee moved up as deputy president.

Lee first stood for elections in 1969 in the Kepong state seat, but lost to the popular Dr Tan Chee Koon of Parti Gerakan Rakyaat Malaysia. Soon afterwards Lee joined the National Unity Board, a government body set up following the May 13 riots, and served as community relations officer. In 1974 he stood for elections again and won the Rawang state seat. He was appointed a Selangor state executive council member. In the 1978 elections, he retained the Rawang state seat.

Lee was elected a Member of Parliament in 1982 and in June the following year was appointed deputy minister in the Prime Minister's Department. In 1985 he was appointed minister of labour and in 1987 became minister of housing and local government. He was made minister of health from 1988 until he retired in May 1995.

As deputy president of the MCA, Lee was vocal on several controversial issues. In September 1986 Lee spoke of deviations in the implementation of the affirmative action programme introduced under the New Economic Policy. His comments angered sections of the United Malay National Organisation (UMNO), but then Prime Minister Dr Mahathir Mohamed defused the issue when he said that Lee could present his criticisms of the NEP to Cabinet.

A few weeks later, another controversy arose over the use of the term, pendatang, (immigrants) by some Malays when referring to the Chinese. In early November 1986, the MCA Selangor, headed by Lee, passed a resolution in its annual convention calling on the government to make it an offence to call any of the three major races pendatang. UMNO Youth protested against this resolution, which it interpreted as challenging the indigenous status of the Malays. UMNO Youth called on the prime minister to expel Lee from his government post. Others also appealed to the sultan of Selangor to withdraw Lee's award which carried the title "Dato". Meanwhile, MCA Youth rallied behind Lee Kim Sai. For a while, it appeared that this would turn into an UMNO-MCA crisis. At the height of the controversy, Lee Kim Sai offered to resign. In the end, UMNO's Tun Ghafar Baba worked out a compromise under which the term, pendatang, was not be used on any community, and at the same time, the bumiputera status of the Malays was reaffirmed.

In October 1987, Lee who was then deputy MCA president and labour minister, took the lead in objecting to moves by the Education Ministry to appoint non-Mandarin speaking Chinese as principals and senior assistants in Chinese school. He joined a meeting at the Tien Hou temple attended by representatives from Chinese-based parties, such as Parti Gerakan and the DAP, demanding the withdrawal of the Education Ministry's directive. For his public association with the opposition and vigorous defence of Chinese demands, UMNO militants once more demanded his resignation from the government.

Indeed, during Operation Lalang at the end of October 1987, when more than a hundred politicians and activists were detained under the Internal Security Act, Lee Kim Sai quietly slipped off to Australia. It was rumoured that he was on the list of those to be detained. On 23 October 1987 Lee was stripped of his title of Darja Paduka Mahkota Selangor by the sultan of Selangor for raising issues which could cause ill feelings towards the Malays and the ruler.

The more vocal of leaders in his time on Chinese language education issues, Lee had the support of the more conservative and Chinese-educated members of the party.

He was referred to as "Golden Lion", which was what Kim Sai in Chinese meant. In 1993 he made moves to challenge Dato Seri Ling Liong Sik for the party presidency, but backed out after finding that he did not have sufficient support. He retired from politics in 1996.

Lee is married to Wan Yuet Fong and they have four children — Boon Guan, Boon Tim, Boon Siew, and Boon Cheng.

Lee Kok Liang

(李国良, Li Guoliang, 1927–92)

Lawyer, novelist, politician, short story writer, socialist, Malaysia

Lee Kok Liang was an exceptional Malaysian writer whose vision of a truly egalitarian, just, and transcultural society continues to inspire his contemporaries and the present generation of readers and writers alike. His small but significant literary corpus comprises two novels, two volumes of short stories, and an unpublished journal. Lee contributed to his community in many ways: as a solicitor right up to his untimely death, as municipal councillor and member of the Penang State Assembly for one term (1959–64) and as a leading figure in the advocacy and promotion of heritage and the arts. Lee was a member of the Socialist Front/Labour Party (dissolved in 1969) and, in his legal career, fought cases for oppressed workers. He was a founding member of the Penang Art Gallery and was an adviser to the Pulau Pinang Magazine, a periodical devoted to heritage and history. He was editorial consultant for the Journal of Southeast Asian Literature or Tenggara from 1967 to 1969 and was a judge in the New Straits Times Short Story Writing competition from 1987 to 1992.

In 1927 Lee was born into a Straits Chinese family in Alor Star in the state of Kedah in the then British Malaya. Lee's family on both sides has a long history in the land: Lee is a descendant of Lee Yoke Siew who was the private secretary of Sultan Ahmad Tajuddin of Kedah, and, on his mother's side, Lee is related to the Chinese kapitan of Kedah, Tai Choon Thow. Lee's father was a staunchly loyal subject of the British and imparted these values to his progeny. Lee had had to exorcise the ghosts of this Anglophilia as a young writer in London. In appraising Lee's first novel, London Does Not Belong To Me (published posthumously), writer K. S. Maniam notes: "Because Lee Kok Liang is a meticulous and committed writer, he watches himself go through the process of a disillusioning act of creating a novel based on cultural experiences that do not belong to him" (p. 7). Diversity best describes Lee's scholastic background: he studied in Chinese, Japanese, English, and Malay schools in the 1930s and 1940s. His schools include the Penang Free School and Chung Ling High School. Lee left for Australia in 1949 to read Law at the University of Melbourne, after which he duly studied for the Bar at Lincoln's Inn in London. In 1954, he returned home and after being called to the Bar, began to practise law.

Lee began publishing stories while in Australia, but it was perhaps in London, the imperial centre, that Lee grappled with issues of identity as an individual and writer from the colonies coming to terms with his own sense of self in an alienating, yet familiar environment. Together with Lee's unpublished journal, Sketches and Vignettes and Brushstrokes, the semi-autobiographical London Does Not Belong To Me dramatizes the internal conflicts faced by an emerging postcolonial writer caught between his colonial upbringing and the decolonizing process involved in forging his own sense of personhood and nationhood. Bernard Wilson notes: "In terms of Malaysian literature written in English, the novel and journal offer a unique and historical perspective of the fading imperial axis of power, as perceived by a colonial subject whose nation is moving rapidly towards independence" (pp. 314–15). These works, along with Lee's short stories, were milestones in his literary career, affirming his sense of artistic vision, purpose, and technique. These stories compiled in The Mutes in the Sun and Other Stories (1964) and Death is a Ceremony and Other Short Stories (1992) explores a variety of themes: the tyranny of power relations, personal and social fragmentation, isolation, repression, dispossession, religion, materialism, the absurdity of life, cultural conflict, human relationships, mortality, and the possibility of redemption and love. Central to Lee's fictional world is the figure of the mute who appears not only in The Mutes in the Sun but also in his novel, Flowers in the Sky (1981). This silent figure personifies the muteness which, in Syd Harrex's estimation, "symbolises the human species' propensity for deforming itself, biologically, socially, psychologically; the alienation of the displaced person; the communication hiatus in personal, family and social relation; and the cancerous silence produced by political oppression and persecution" (p. 175). Lee's treatment of Buddhist and Hindu themes in Flowers in the Sky is his reflection on how the diverse faiths of multicultural Malaysia collide and interlock with each other. In this novel, spiritual ideals and values also clash head-on with the corrupting, materialistic values of the world to great ironic effect.

Taken as a whole, Lee's fiction offers an intense, penetrating, and compassionate social and political commentary. Much more than that, however, it also addresses the moral and spiritual underpinnings of humanity in all their tragic and comic ramifications.

Lee Kok Liang died in 1992 in Penang. His wife, Irene, lives in Penang. Their children are Eng Yew, Eng Lok, and Cynthia. His law firm, Lee Kok Liang & Sons, is now handled by his sons.

Lee Kong Chian

(李光前, Li Guangqian, 1894–1967)
Rubber magnate, industrialist, banker, philanthropist, Singapore

Lee Kong Chian, alias Lee Geok Kun (李玉昆) was a well known figure in Singapore history, who had contributed immensely to the development of the country's rubber industry, as well as the banking and finance sectors in both Malaysia and Singapore. He was a multi-millionaire businessman for almost four decades after first starting his rubber business in 1927. With his rubber wealth, he then ventured into banking and insurance business by setting up the Oversea-Chinese Banking Corporation (OCBC) and Great Eastern Life. He also diversified his business empire into pineapple and other light manufacturing industries, such as saw-milling and biscuit manufacturing. He was thus considered a rubber magnate, an industrialist, as well as a banker. However, the most important hallmark and legacy he left behind was the Lee Foundation through which he made his philanthropic donations, especially in the education arena. To honour his contributions in higher education, he was conferred the honorary title of Doctor of Law by the University of Malaya in 1958. In addition, he was installed as the first chancellor of the University of Singapore from 3 June 1962 till 1965. For his contributions in Malaysia, Lee was bestowed the title of "Tan Sri" by the Malaysian king in 1966, in addition to the conferments on him of datukship by the sultans of Johor and Kelantan respectively.

Lee was first educated in his hometown of Fu Rong Village, Nan'an County (芙蓉村，南安县) in Fujian Province in China, where he was born in 1894. In 1903, he joined his father to come to Singapore at the age of nine to seek a better living there. His father, Lee Kok Chuan, sent him to the Anglo-Indian School in Serangoon to be educated in English. In the afternoon, he would attend Yeung Chia School (predecessor of Chung Cheng School) at Aliwal Street to continue his Chinese education. In 1908, he was awarded a scholarship by the Manchu Government in China to study in Chi Nan High School (暨南学堂) in Nanjing. Three years later, he was admitted to the prestigious Ching Hwa High School (清华学堂) in Peking. He subsequently switched to the Tang Shang College of Mining and Communication (唐山路矿专门学堂) to pursue an engineering course. When the Chinese Revolution broke out in 1911, he had to terminate his education in China and he went back to Singapore in 1912. On reaching Singapore, he was engaged in four jobs and pursued two courses. In the morning, he worked as an assistant in the Survey Department. In the afternoon, he worked for Lat Pau Chinese press (叻报) where his main job was to translate English news articles into Chinese for publication. At night, he taught at Tao Nan School and Chung Cheng School. In the meantime, he attended a Special Survey Class conducted by the Survey Department, in addition to pursuing a correspondence course in civil engineering with an American university.

His first engagement in business started in 1914 when he was asked to join the China National Product Company (中华国货公司) spearheaded by Cheng Hee Chuan (庄希泉). In 1916, Tan Kah Kee (陈嘉庚), a rubber tycoon, invited Lee, who was fluent in English, to join his rubber business as Tan was expanding his business into the American and European markets. Under Lee's management, Tan's rubber company, Khiam Aik (谦益公司), grew by leaps and bounds. Lee was later married to Tan's eldest daughter, Tan Ai Leh (陈爱礼). Having gained more business experience, he started his own rubber company, Lee Smoke House (南益烟房) in 1927 in Muar, Johor. He then renamed the company as Lee Rubber Company (南益树胶公司) in 1928. Following the stock market crash in Wall Street in 1929, the ensuing Great Depression in the early 1930s forced many companies to wind up their businesses. His company, unlike many other Chinese businesses which became bankrupt, survived the Great Depression in the 1930s through a reorganization of the company in 1931 into a limited company. It then ventured into overseas markets, such as Thailand and Indonesia. In the next four decades, Lee Rubber with twenty branches overseas owned about 18,500 acres of rubber estates and fifteen factories. In a move to ride over the financial difficulties faced by the business community, Lee in 1932, with the help of Yap Geok Tui, helped merge in 1932 the Oversea-Chinese Bank (1919), the Chinese Commercial Bank Ltd. (1912) and the Ho Hong Bank Ltd. (1917) into the Oversea-Chinese Banking Corporation (OCBC). In 1938, he took over the chairmanship of the bank and held this post until his death in 1967. OCBC has become one of the three existing local banks in Singapore.

Apart from the rubber and banking businesses, Lee also ventured into other businesses. He founded Lee Pineapple Company, Lee Sawmills Ltd., Lee Oilmills, Lee Biscuits, Lee Printing Company, and Lee Produce Company. His foreign holdings included Hok Tong Company in Indonesia, Siam Paktai Company in Thailand, and South Asia Corporation in New York. Later, Lee invested in shares of big corporations such as OCBC, Great Eastern Life, Sime Darby (Singapore), Singapore Cold Storage, Fraser and Neave Corporation, and the Straits Trading Company.

One of the hallmarks of Lee's philanthropic activities was the setting up of Lee Foundation. In 1952, he set aside about $200 million of his wealth to establish the foundation which was administered by a board separated from his corporate business. The earnings from investments of the foundation were meant for donations to educational, cultural, charitable, and public institutions. Generous donations for building funds were given to the Singapore Chinese High School, Nanyang University, and Xiamen University (formerly known as Amoy University). With the establishment of the University of Malaya in Singapore, Lee donated $250,000 to the University Endowment Fund in 1949 and another $250,000 for the building of the university library in 1957. Apart from education, he also contributed a sum of $370,000 in 1953 to the National Library of Singapore for a section on Eastern Languages and Literature. He also promoted cultural activities and made donations to charitable organizations. The Singapore Swimming Club, Tong Chee Hospital, and many cultural organizations were some of his big beneficiaries. During the Second World War, he helped set up the China Relief Fund. He also contributed $1 million for the establishment of the Singapore Medical Research Fund and was once the chairman of the Social Welfare Association in Singapore.

Lee was equally active in public services in Singapore and abroad. Before the war, he was the elected president of the Rubber Trade Association in Singapore on its inauguration and represented Malaya in international rubber conferences. Between 1938 and 1940, he was the elected president of the Singapore Chinese Chamber of Commerce and Industry (SCCCI). After the war in 1946, he was elected as the president of the association for a second time. In 1943, he attended an international conference in the United States and was subsequently forced to stay there when Malaya and Singapore came under the Japanese Occupation. While in the United States, he conducted lectures at University of Columbia for U.S. military and civil officers who were about to serve in the war in the Asia-Pacific. Meanwhile, he also served in the U.S. Red Cross Society and organized campaigns to raise fund for war victims in China.

Although he was formerly a member of Tung Meng Hui to rebel against the Manchu rule in China, his political stance towards China changed dramatically after the war. In 1946, he, as the president of SCCCI, spoke against the election of representatives in Malaya, Borneo, and Singapore for the National Assembly in China. In 1947, he led massive demonstrations and strikes in Malaya and Singapore against the British colonial government's proposal of the formation of the Malayan Union, with the aim of separating Singapore from the Union, and the imposition of more severe restrictions on citizenship applications by non-Malay. He advocated the switch of loyalty for local Chinese from China to Malaya and Singapore.

Lee passed away on 2nd June 1967 at the age of seventy-three, leaving behind three sons and three daughters to manage his business empire. However, his legacy that he left still lingers on till today. The Lee Foundation continues its philanthropic traditions of its founding father, especially the donations for education and cultural promotion. Among its many contributions, one notable example was the donation of S$60 million to the Singapore National Library for the new building in Victoria Street. The library named its reference library as the Lee Kong Chian Reference Library in 2005 in honour of Lee's contributions.

Lee Kuan Yew

(李光耀, Li Guangyao, 1923–)

Politician, founder of the People's Action Party, First Prime Minister of Singapore

Famous for being the man who shaped the political landscape of modern Singapore since the country gained independence in 1965, Lee Kuan Yew is a colourful figure who has gathered both criticism and praise for his policies and his development of Singapore. On one end of the spectrum, he is greatly admired by Singaporeans for his inspiring leadership in the independence movement and the separation from Malaysia. On the other hand, foreign observers and some younger Singaporeans claim that his method of achieving economic prosperity resulted in the lack of political and social freedom in the country. To better understand how these opposing views came about, let us delve into Lee's career.

Lee Kuan Yew was born on 16 September 1923 at 92 Kampong Java Road in Singapore to Lee Chin Koon and Chua Jim Neo. He was their eldest child, and was influenced by British culture as a boy. This was due to the influence of his paternal grandfather, Lee Hoon Leong, who gave his sons an English education. His grandfather also gave him the name 'Harry', by which he is still known to close friends and family. However, Lee later dropped the name 'Harry' when he entered politics.

Lee began his education at Telok Kurau Primary School, Raffles Institution and Raffles College. At Raffles Institution, he was a member of the 01 Raffles Scout Group. The onset of World War II delayed his formal tertiary education. During the Japanese occupation in Singapore, he first taught himself Chinese scripts and later learned Japanese at a school and got a certificate. He helped support his family by working as a clerk in a Japanese company and a clerk-typist in a guild. After a year, from late 1943 to mid-1944, he worked as English langugae cable editor for the Hodobu, the Japanese broadcasting and propaganda department. He resigned in mid-1944 as he anticipated an Allied re-invasion. The war had affected him like it had so many of his generation in a twofold manner: (1) by demonstrating that the British colonial masters were not infallible and were hard pressed to defend both Britain and their colonies, as well as (2) instilling in him a nationalistic mindset whereby Singapore's fate ought to be a matter for its people and not external powers be it the British or the Japanese.

When the war ended, he briefly attended the London School of Economics in Britain before going to Fitzwilliam College in Cambridge to read law. Whilst at Cambridge, he excelled in his studies and achieved Double Starred First Class honours. On his return to Singapore in 1949, he worked at Laycock and Ong as a practising lawyer. Not long after completing his studies and gaining employment at Laycock and Ong, he married Kwa Geok Choo (a lawyer who practised conveyancing and draughtsmanship) on 30 September 1950 in Singapore. He and Kwa would later form the Singapore law firm, Lee and Lee. It should be noted that Lee and Kwa married secretly in Stratford-upon-Avon in 1947 when they were both students in Cambridge. From the eulogy Lee delivered at Kwa's funeral on 6 October 2010, it is clear that he loved and respected her. According to Lee's biography, he met Kwa in 1944 at a party, and went on to court her in 1946. Throughout their courtship and marriage, they had an equal partnership. Lee trusted Kwa and her political acumen, and consulted her throughout his political career. In fact, she drafted the clauses in the Separation Agreement when Singapore had to separate from the Malaysian Federation in 1965. The clauses in the Separation Agreement guaranteed the water agreements between the State of Johor and Singapore. In Lee's eulogy to Kwa and in his biographies, he spoke highly of his wife, her incisiveness, and how she was both his confidante and counsellor.

Whilst Lee and Kwa were working at Laycock and Ong, Lee experienced his first brush with politics. His employer, John Laycock, allowed Lee to act as his election agent for the 1951 legislative council election. While working as Laycock's election agent under the banner of the pro-British Progressive Party, Lee realised that the party was unable to garner the support of the sizeable Chinese-speaking working class. Thus, when he was in a position to form his own party, he would strive to win the votes of this considerable Chinese-speaking population. He built up his support amongst the Chinese-speaking Singaporeans when he was engaged as a legal adviser to trade and students' unions, thereby allowing him to use his links in the working class Chinese-educated community when he chose to enter politics.

The opportunity for him to deploy all that he had learnt in his dealings with the trade and students' unions, and as Laycock's election agent presented itself on 21 November 1954 when Lee formed the People's Action Party (PAP) with a group of English-educated middleclass men. However, the PAP was at that time allied out of necessity with the pro-communists for the large support base it drew. The pro-communists on the other hand agreed to join the PAP because they needed a smokescreen after they had been outlawed by the British. Therefore, these two groups came together and were bound by their mutual exploitation of each other for their united common aims for self-government and independence from British colonial rule. After an inaugural conference at Victoria Memorial Hall, these two factions elected Lee as the party's secretary-general. It was a post he would hold until 1992.

In that position and as a member of the PAP, Lee contested and won the seat of Tanjong Pagar in the 1955 elections, and in so doing, became the opposition leader against David Marshall's Labour Front-led coalition. When the Marshall-led Labour Front was plagued by civil unrest stemming from trade and students' unions strikes and Lim Yew Hock took over the government, Lee saw that the party stood in a potentially precarious position. He learnt that in order to survive in the political game, he would have to contend with dissent from the pro-communists within the PAP, and suspicion of those from outside the PAP. Thus, he took his first step to distance himself from his pro-communist colleagues and opted not to take part in their protests which were often geared towards undermining the government's authority. However, his position in the PAP came under threat in 1957 when the pro-communists seized control of all the leadership positions. Fortunately, Lim Yew Hock (who had by then replaced Marshall as Chief Minister) ordered the pro-communists arrested and Lee was once again the party's secretary-general. Once the PAP was free from the rabblerousing pro-communists, Lee strengthened the support he gathered from his Tanjong Pagar constituents in a by-election in 1957. It was then that it could be said that he came into his own politically.

His eloquence and his fiery speeches calling for autonomy won for the PAP forty-three of the fifty-one seats in the legislative assembly in the June 1959 elections. He thus became the first Prime Minister of Singapore and sought to gain self-rule for the country from the British. He jumped at the plan to merge with the Malayan hinterland when the Malayan Prime Minister Tunku Abdul Rahman suggested the formation of a federation to include Malaya, Singapore, Sabah, Sarawak and Brunei. Lee's campaigns for a merger with Malaysia were successful as evinced by the 70% of votes cast in favour of his proposal in the September 1962 referendum. But the merger with Malaysia, which was touted to resolve Singapore's problems of unemployment, a stagnating economy, and then-existent communist threats by instituting a common free market, fell short in the estimation of the PAP leaders. Instead of economic prosperity being allocated or shared equally amongst all the Malaysian states, the Federation launched a series of policies enshrined in the Constitution of Malaysia favouring ethnic Malays, granting them preferential financial and economic benefits. This sort of affirmative action policy did not sit well with the non-Malays, and was responsible for inciting much racial tension between the ethnic Chinese and Malays. Despite PAP calls for a Malaysian Malaysia policy favouring all Malaysians, the dominant party of Malaysia, UMNO, backed the formal institution of the pro-Malay policy in the Constitution. Additionally, Singapore was not granted free trade with the other states in Malaysia, and had to pay the Malaysian Federal government a large percentage of its budget, which would not necessarily be used for the improvement of Singapore. These tensions led to deteriorating relations between the UMNO leaders in Kuala Lumpur and the PAP leaders in Singapore. In the face of these difficulties, Lee Kuan Yew reluctantly agreed to a separation on 7 August 1965 after the Parliament of Malaysia voted 126-0 in favour of expelling Singapore from the Federation. On 9 August 1965 when Lee announced the news on television to his fellow Singaporeans, he was unable to hold back his tears, showing the softer side of the tough leader.

The moment Singapore was fully independent; Lee concentrated his efforts at developing the economy and the infrastructure, as well as improving national security. He did so by arranging for Goh Keng Swee to institute the Singapore Armed Forces. Goh was also instrumental in forming the Economic Development Board to industrialize the country, which was so successful in revitalising the Singapore economy that the unemployment rate fell from 14 per cent in 1965 to 4.5 per cent in 1973.

Lee stepped down as Prime Minister on 28 November 1990 after leading the PAP in seven victorious elections, handing over the reigns of power to Goh Chok Tong. Nevertheless, Lee remained in Cabinet as Senior Minister. As Senior Minister, and subsequently as Minister Mentor in the Cabinet of Prime Minister Lee Hsien Loong (his eldest son), Lee Kuan Yew continues to be much respected in the country and in the government.

Due to his political accomplishments, Lee has received many national and international honours throughout his career. These honours and awards demonstrate that Lee is highly respected by Singaporean and international political leaders alike. For instance, he was presented with the first Lifetime Achievement Award by the U.S.-ASEAN Business Council in October 2009 in Washington D.C. Current U.S. President Barack Obama also dubbed Lee, "…one of the legendary figures of Asia in the 20th and 21st centuries" and lauds him as a person who "helped to trigger the Asian economic miracle". He was also awarded the Order of the Rising Sun in 1967, Order of the Companions of Honour in 1970, Knight Grand Cross of the Order of St Michael and St George in 1972, Bintang Republik Indonesia Adipradana in 1973, Freedom of the City of London in 1982, Seri Paduka Mahkota Johor in 1984, Order of the Great Leader in 1988, and Darja Kerabat Laila Utama, Brunei in 1990. Scholarly bodies and academic institutions have similarly honoured Lee's political achievements. He was made an honorary fellow of Fitzwilliam College, Cambridge in 1969. Lee's contributions to the promotion of international trade and industry as well as the development of science and engineering study initiatives with the United Kingdom were acknowledged by Imperial College London when they admitted him to the Fellowship in 2002. The National University of Singapore honoured Lee's achievements by naming its school of public policy after him in 2004. Lee's other honours include the Woodrow Wilson Award for Public Service, which he received from the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in 2006, as well as an honorary Doctorate in Law from the Australian National University in Canberra.

As the founding father of modern Singapore through his political leadership in guiding the country through independence and shaping the country's socio-economic and political landscape, Lee firmly entrenched in the Singapore mindset the notion that Singapore's only natural resources are its people and their strong work ethic. Despite the respect that most of the citizens bear him for all that he has done, Lee is not free from some Singaporean and foreign criticism for being an elitist autocrat who achieved economic prosperity for the country at the expense of much political and social freedom. However, he is still respected as the architect of the modern Singapore political and economic landscape. It is certain that Lee Kuan Yew will continue to play a part in Singapore politics and in shaping the country in the years to come.

Lee Lam Thye

(李霖泰, Li Lintai, 1946–)

Politician, social activist, Malaysia

Lee Lam Thye was formerly a famous politician and is now an active social worker and social activist who involves himself in non-government organizations and social work. Lee was born in Ipoh, Perak, in 1946. On completion of his secondary education at St Michael's Institution in Ipoh, he was not able to further his studies due to financial constraints. Not long after that, he started to be involved in politics and the love affair lasted more than twenty years. In his political heydays, he was called the "Father of the Hawkers" and the "Welfare MP". All these titles are testimony to his commitment and service to the people.

Lee Lam Thye's father, Lee Kan Thye was a mechanic. Therefore the family was not so well-to-do when Lee was young so he started working when he was still young and taught for a period of one year. He became involved in politics when he was twenty-three years old and got married in 1975. He has two sons. Lee joined the Democratic Action Party (DAP) in 1966 and was one of the founders of DAP in Perak. At the time he admired the Singapore Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew and one of the politicians he respects the most was Tunku Abdul Rahman, the first Malaysian prime minister.

Lee committed himself to the DAP for twenty-five years until he left and retired from active politics in 1990. According to him, "opposition parties play a constructive and positive role in this country. They stir up people's awareness concerning the country issues". He was the elected State Legislative assemblyman for Bukit Nenas, Selangor, from 1969 to 1974. He served as member of parliament for Kuala Lumpur Bandar/Bukit Bintang from 1974 to 1990, was the Bukit Bintang MP for three continuous terms, and was called the "DAP strong man". Even among the government parties and the opposition parties, there was this belief that if Lee Lam Thye was the candidate of the poll, no one from Barisan Nasional (BN), especially the MCA and Gerakan, was able to win the election. His unending service for the people left a strong impression in the hearts of the people in this constituency.

He was the "second man" in DAP and, during "Operasi Lalang" in October 1987, when Lim Kit Siang was detained, Lee was the DAP acting leader. But, his relationship with the grass roots leaders in the DAP was not good. His moderate ways were not accepted and this led to his resignation from the party and retirement from politics.

On 12 September 1990, Lee Lam Thye announced his resignation from the presidency of the DAP Federal Territory. Four days later, on the eve of the general elections, he made a public statement to announce his decision to retire from politics. On 3 October the same year, he resigned from the post of DAP vice-secretary and, with this, retired formally from politics. In September the following year, Lee pulled his membership out from the DAP without stating any reason. Throughout his political life, Lee maintained a very good relationship with the BN leaders. He is respected not only by the Chinese community and the grass root of the society, but is also well received by people from other races and this is one of his great achievements.

Since his retirement from politics, he has been a social activist and continues to serve the country. He was the chairman of the National Service Training Council (PLKN), commissioner to SUHAKAM (2000–02), chairman of the National Institute of Occupational Safety and Health (NIOSH) (since 1994), vice-chairman of the Malaysian Crime Prevention Foundation (MCPF), chairman of the National Organs Transplant Association, director of the National Kidney Foundation, member of the Kuala Lumpur City Hall Advisory Board, chairman of Kuala Lumpur Special Environment Council, member of the Special Royal Commission to enhance the operation and management of the Royal Malaysian Police, and vice-chairman of the National Drugs Misuse Prevention Association (1991–2005). In addition he also serves as adviser for many organizations, such as the Kuala Lumpur Hawkers Association and Kuok Foundation (1991).

Lee is also active in the private sector — he serves as a non-executive director to a number of companies, which include, Arab-Malaysian Corporation Ltd., SIME-UEP Properties Ltd., MBM Resources Ltd., FFM Ltd. and AMDB Ltd. He is also an independent non-executive director of Media Prima Ltd. and is the chairman of the Nomination Committee, plus a member of the Audit Committee and Remuneration Committee of Media Prima Ltd.

He was honoured by the Yang di-Pertuan Agong with the JMN honorific in 1992, and acquired the DPMP honorific from the Sultan of Perak in 1995. In 1991 he was made a Panglima Setia Mahkota (PSM) with the title of "Tan Sri" by the king. His other awards include receiving the First Onn Jaafar Excellent Achievement Prize from the Malaysian Youth Association and "Friends of The Police" award in 2007. During the awards ceremony of the First Onn Jaafar Excellent Achievement, the Malaysia Youth Association said this of him: "with his excellent style of speech, constructive ideas and intelligence, he is a well-respected politician in the country. Friends or foes, all respect his opinions. These twenty over years, he sacrificed his best years for the people".

Lee Lam Thye was the people's man through and through. The high respect which he commands and integrity he possesses make him an icon in Malaysian politics. Citizens from all walks of life in Malaysia revere him and, as such, he is a household name amongst Malaysians.

Lee Loy Seng

(李莱生, Li Laisheng, 1921–93)

Entrepreneur, community leader, politician, philanthropist, Malaysia

Tan Sri Dato' Seri Lee Loy Seng was the last of Malaysia's great rubber barons, a man whose foresight and entrepreneurship created a plantations empire, which included Kuala Lumpur Kepong Bhd., Batu Kawan Berhad, Parit Perak Rubber Holdings Bhd., Glenealys Plantations (Malaya) Bhd., and Batu Lintang Rubber Co.

Born on 22 August 1921, Lee Loy Seng was the fourth son of a well known tin miner in Menglembu, Perak — Lee Meng Hin — who owned the Wan Yuen Mining Company. He was the older of twins, and was thus nicknamed "Tai Kor" (elder brother). Thus originated the name of his private "Taiko" group of companies, based in Ipoh, the capital of Perak state.

He had his early education in Chinese at the Yuk Choy School in Ipoh and, at the age of sixteen, was sent to China for his tertiary education, but had to return to Malaya shortly afterwards when Japan attacked China. After the Second World War, he resumed his education in English at St Michael's Institution in Ipoh. He wanted to study medicine in Australia, but his elder brother, Lee Wan Seng, insisted that he helped out in the family mines instead. Thus he dutifully started his career as a tin miner.

After the death of their father in 1954, Lee Wan Seng was in charge of the family business. Later that year the Lee family bought the Kampar Rubber and Tin Company, expecting to find tin on its rubber land. Unfortunately the prospecting results were disappointing. Lee Loy Seng was then given the responsibility of looking after the rubber estate and made friends with European planters. In learning all about rubber, he realized that tin mining was a depleting industry, whereas rubber was renewable. Good mining land was getting scarce. His future lay in rubber. He began to buy small lots of rubber estate and visited his estates daily from 6 am till noon and then worked in the mines until late evening.

Until the early 1960s, Lee Loy Seng was still managing the family mines together with his elder brother. Taking his first break after twelve years, he went on a holiday to Japan. There he had time to really think about his future. Dividing his time between managing the rubber estates and the mines would not get him anywhere. He decided to make a complete break from tin mining, leaving Lee Wan Seng to look after the mines. It was a hard decision to make, considering that tin mining was a family tradition. His father had a solid reputation as a miner in Menglembu and his father-in-law was the well known miner, Leong Tian.

Fortuitously at the time many British rubber companies were selling their estates cheaply. The Emergency, or Communist insurgency which started in 1948 and was aimed at destroying British-owned tin mines and rubber estates, had spooked British planters who were feeling uneasy about their future after the country's independence in 1957. Lee Loy Seng's first major acquisition was the Parit Perak Rubber Company Ltd. It owned some 500 acres of rubber with a paid-up capital of $300,000 and surplus cash. Its shares were selling at 80 cents each, below their par value. It did not take him long to acquire a controlling stake. As he explained, "It effectively meant that I was paying $300,000 to get $300,000 in the bank. And the land came for free."

Parit Perak went on to acquire controlling interests in other plantation companies successively: Glenealys Plantations (Malaya) Ltd., Batu Lintang Rubber Co., and Batu Kawan Rubber and Coconut Plantations. Batu Kawan's estates were then valued at only $300 per acre. In 1967, the Penang state government acquired 2,256 acres of Batu Kawan's subsidiary, Pyre Estate, at $4,900 per acre for the purpose of developing Prai Industrial Estate. With the compensation money, he acquired Duff Development and Ulu Benut Consolidated. The next target was his jewel in the crown of plantation companies — Kuala Lumpur Kepong Amalgamated Ltd (KLKA).

In the aftermath of 1969's May 13th riots, KLKA was priced at only 60 cents per share and there was a big parcel of shares in the market with no takers. He initially acquired 5 per cent of the company's shares, and then went on buying until he had acquired control of the company.

All these companies were later reorganized and their domicile brought back to Malaysia. KLKA became Kuala Lumpur Kepong Bhd (KLK). During his stewardship at the helm of KLK, the group diversified from rubber into oil palm, expanded its planted coverage systematically through acquisitions until it had plantations totalling more than 150,000 hectares, and developed resource-based manufacturing activities. Today KLK is a diversified multinational company with shareholders' funds exceeding RM5.6 billion.

Such was Tan Sri Dato' Seri Lee Loy Seng's astuteness and good timing that he acquired his rubber empire with very little capital. Said one British planter of him, "[After the May 13 episode], Loy Seng was driving up and down peninsular Malaysia looking for plantation owners wanting to cash out. In some cases, he was able to buy estates at below replacement costs. Most of the estates were already mature so that in many cases the revenue from the estates was sufficient to finance his purchases. Loy Seng was also lucky because during 1970–71 the rubber price surged because of a world rubber shortage and he made a lot of money from his post-May 13 acquisitions."

He was a member of the Malaysian Chinese Association (MCA, the second largest component of the ruling Barisan Nasional government), president of the Ipoh Municipal Council in 1976, and a senator from 1971 to 1980. From 1978 to 1992 he was president of the Perak Chinese Maternity Hospital, a private non-profit hospital that gives free treatment to the poor. He was chairman of Multi-Purpose Holdings, the investment arm of the MCA, from its inception in 1977 to 1983. When Multi-Purpose Holdings ran into financial difficulties in the mid-1980's, he was invited by the MCA to return as a director on a board of prominent Chinese businessmen, headed by "Sugar King" Tan Sri Sir Robert Kuok, to restore it back to health. He was well known for his philanthropy, and established the Lee Loy Seng Foundation to provide scholarships for needy Malaysian students to pursue their tertiary education. Lee was also the benefactor of the Lucky Village Old Folks Home in Ipoh. He was awarded the titles of Dato' Seri in 1974, and Tan Sri in 1978. He died on 22 November 1993.

Lee Man Fong

(李曼峰, Li Manfeng, 1913–88)

Artist, art curator, Singapore and Indonesia

Lee Man Fong was one of Singapore's most important first-generation artists whose career straddled both Indonesia and Singapore. He was equally active in each country for a long period and made significant contributions to the respective art scenes. Though he is better known for his distinctive painting in the style often described as "Eastern-style oil painting", particularly of Asian and Southeast Asian subjects, Lee left behind a substantial body of works in a great variety of media, styles, and subject matter.

His paintings, especially of scenic landscapes and animals, have long been keenly sought by collectors in the region, particularly in Indonesia where no major art collections can do without his works. Most of his paintings reflect the natural landscape, life, and culture of the people in Indonesia. There are also many paintings from his extensive travels in Europe, China, India, and the United States. Lee's paintings were not included in critical discourse in the 1950s because they were not engaged in issues of the time, such as Indonesia's struggle for independence, revolution, and citizenship. Yet his highly accomplished technique in oil painting, characterized by his use of Chinese brush strokes, strengthened his position among modern Indonesian masters.

To some extent Lee's artistic success and renown as an important artist were sometimes overshadowed by his prominent role as curator and adviser to President Soekarno's presidential art collection from 1961 to 1965. As an ethnic Chinese artist, his close association with Indonesia's first president, who was generally regarded as an art connoisseur, reinforced his position among the pantheon of modern masters of Indonesia. But after 1965 his position as a Chinese artist became difficult in Indonesia due to increasing restrictions on cultural and artistic expression by the Chinese. Lee then moved to Singapore where he remained relatively active for the rest of his life. Rare among artists of his generation, the influence of his art extended from the region to China and Europe, where he had exhibited his unique oil and pastel paintings during his illustrious artistic career.

Born in a village in Guangzhou in 1913 when China was going through great social and political upheavals, the young Lee was brought to Singapore by his parents in 1915 because the village was devastated by floods. The elder Lee (Lee Ling Khai) took his family to Singapore to join his brother who had a thriving tailoring and antique furniture business in a shop called Lee Leong Cheong in Coleman Street. The child's gift showed early as he distinguished himself in calligraphy when he was admitted to the Yeung Cheng Primary School at five. A year later he was transferred to St Andrew School where he was educated in English. In 1929, Lee's father died and his family fortunes declined due to the Great Depression. The sixteen-year-old Lee, who was eldest son, had to leave school and work in order to support his family. It was during the same year that he completed his very first painting, "Shuang-lin Chan Monastery", a mature work that showed off the great budding talent in the teenager. Never formally trained in art, the young man gradually evolved into an artist even when he was then bearing the burden of providing for the whole family.

In 1932 he left for Batavia (Jakarta) to work in a local newspaper before becoming an apprentice in Kolff & Co, the biggest Dutch printing company in Indonesia then, in 1935. Though he had a well paid job, he resented working for the Dutch because of their discrimination against local staff. A year later he left the job and, together with a few friends, formed his own advertising and design company called Linto Reclame Bureau. It was a move that was to give the twenty-year-old artist tremendous satisfaction because the business his new company was gaining rivalled that of the Dutch company he had previously worked for. His business even included film production, which was credited with some of Indonesia's earliest films.

In 1941 Lee withdrew from the thriving company he had founded due to a dispute with his business partners, and dedicated himself completely to art. The same year he visited Bali for several months, inspired by European artists such as Bonnet, Strasser, Sonnega, Rizek, and Dooijewaard, who created their art from the island. The trip resulted in an exhibition in May, followed by another in July, which were very well received by Indonesian, Chinese, as well as Dutch collectors. It was at this time that Lee began corresponding with Xu Beihong (1895–1953), the renowned Chinese artist he had greatly admired. This led to a meeting between the two when Xu, who was eighteen years Lee's senior, was in Singapore in November 1941. The elder artist had been a role model from whom Lee received much inspiration and encouragement at the meeting. After that Xu returned to China because of the war while Lee arrived back home just before Indonesia fell to the Japanese in 1942.

He was imprisoned by the Japanese military police for suspected anti-Japanese activities, but thanks to a guard named Takahashi Masao who loved art, Lee not only got better treatment than other prisoners, but was also allowed to paint. Even after Lee's release six months later, both remained friends and were to meet again in 1963 in Tokyo, which Lee visited for the printing of the catalogue for Soekarno's presidential art collection.

After the Japanese surrender in 1945 Lee held an exhibition of his new works, including the drawings he had done showing the Japanese army's atrocities he had seen during his incarceration, and a painting of doves to commemorate the end of World War II.

Among the admirers of his art was the Dutch governor general of Indonesia, Dr Van Mook, who had commissioned Lee to paint a portrait of his wife in 1946. The Dutch officer offered Lee a three-year scholarship to study in Holland. At age thirty-three and with a brilliant career already established, Lee was too advanced for any academic training. Instead he spent the money and time on travels and visits to various museums. Meanwhile, between 1946 and 1952, he also kept himself busy painting and preparing for exhibitions in Amsterdam, Rotterdam, the Hague, and Haarlem. He had seen earlier how the Dutch art critics had found a previous exhibition of Indonesian art disappointing because it was too western and lacking in any eastern elements whatsoever. Drawing a lesson from this, Lee created a distinctive style that was a rich western and eastern blend. His unique approach worked so well that most of his shows in Holland were not only a commercial, but also critical success, which in turn led to invitations from prestigious events in Paris too.

In 1952 Lee returned as a celebrated artist to a homeland now free after 350 years of Dutch colonial rule. A young engineer named Soekarno, whom he had previously met through artist friend Basoeki Abdullah, had now become the first president of the new republic. The president kept up his friendship with the artist and supported the art society, Yin Hua (Chinese Indonesian Artists' Association), headed by Lee during the 1950s. Soekarno valued Lee's contributions as an artist so highly that he personally approved his status as a full-fledged citizen in 1960. In 1956, Lee had led a Yin Hua delegation on a five-month tour of China, visiting many cities and also held exhibitions that left his hosts with a deep impression. In 1961 he was appointed President Soekarno's "palace artist". His close association with the president and his art collection further entrenched his already staunch position as a leading artist of Indonesia, a position he enjoyed until 1965.

In 1967 he came to settle in Singapore where he continued to be active as an artist, travelling, painting, and exhibiting. He died of bronchitis in Jakarta in 1988. Lee's identity as a Singapore artist is sometimes disputed because of his legal status as an Indonesian citizen, but his long-time association with Singapore at the same time. However Lee himself once said, "China is my birthplace; Singapore is my first home where I spent my childhood and a great part of my life; Indonesia is my second home where I won the greatest honours and success of my life."

Lee, Ricardo Arriola

(1948–)

Fiction writer, scriptwriter, social activist, Philippines

Ricardo Lee (李) is one of the Philippines' most important and influential writers across various genres. Considered the country's best-known and most accomplished scriptwriter, he has garnered almost all of the most prestigious local writing awards. His films have been screened at international film festivals in Cannes, Toronto, Berlin, Cairo, Tokyo, Hawaii, Singapore, and New York. Himala (Miracle), his most famous film, was adjudged CNN's "Best Asia-Pacific Film of All-Time", besting masterpieces of other Asian legends such as Wong Kar Wai of Hong Kong, and Akira Kurosawa of Japan.

Thematically, he has exhibited courage with his reportage, fiction, television, and film output that dared cross lines, especially during the dark years of Martial Law (1972–81). He continues to do so in his choice of controversial, groundbreaking, even taboo topics.

Lee was born in a small farming town in Daet, Camarines Norte in Southern Luzon. His father, Dy Hian Chin, migrated to the Philippines from Fujian after World War II. His mother, Clarita Arriola, died when he was still very young after which he and elder sister Lucy, were raised by their mother's relatives. His father saw Lee only occasionally.

Even as a shy, sickly boy tending his aunt's liquor store, Lee's dream to be a writer was the one thing that sustained him throughout his lonely childhood. He read voraciously from the public library, sat transfixed in the front row of Daet's only theatre whenever he could, invented stories which he would narrate to his cousins, and scrimped for postage for his letters to famous, Manila-based writers asking for advice.

His adoptive family could not afford to send him to university despite his being class valedictorian at Chung Hua High School. Thus, he ran away to Manila using the 50 pesos he had earned when his first short story, Mayon (1966), saw print in the Pilipino Free Press.

Lee spent his early days in Manila as a hungry and homeless migrant. He worked his way through university with a succession of odd jobs (waiter, math and English tutor, soap salesman, proofreader). He majored in AB English, headed the University of the Philippines Writers Club, and was active in other organizations, such as the Kapisanan ng Panitikang Pilipino (Association of Philippine Literature), and the Philippine-Chinese Friendship Association. He dropped out and went underground when Martial Law was declared by President Ferdinand Marcos in 1972.

Lee further honed his writing craft and garnered the top prizes for his fiction in two consecutive years (1969 and 1970) in the Don Carlos Palanca Memorial Awards for Literature, the country's most prestigious literary contest. He was dubbed by colleagues as the Chinese Bicolano, majoring in AB English at the University of the Philippines, and writing in Filipino.

Heeding the call of the times, Lee became an activist. He was secretary-general of Panulat Para sa Sambayanan-PAKSA (Writings for the Nation) and was openly doing critical, anti-dictatorship reportage. Among his most notable work is a profile of Romulo Jallores, one of the first martyrs of the then emerging New People's Army, Asia's most tenacious insurgent group, which is still waging a protracted war after forty years.

"Tsinoys were afraid to get involved politically during the Marcos dictatorship," he recalled, "Our idols during that time were the brave, crusading Chinese-Filipino journalists like the Yuyitung Brothers (Rizal and Quintin of the Chinese Commercial News)."

In 1973 Lee was arrested and imprisoned for a year. On his release, he tried his hand in writing for films. While he also periodically wrote probing magazine articles, he had found a genre and industry that brought together the orphaned child who sought hours of escape and solace through films and the socially critical artist who sought meaning through his writing. Few people know that the first movie script Lee wrote in the early 1970s was inspired by the Chinese-Filipino organization, Pagkakaisa sa Pag-unlad. It was a crime-suspense movie that reacted against the anti-Chinese sentiments of the time, especially in films where the Chinese were always portrayed as villains and criminals. The movie starred Joseph Estrada (who was then Mayor, who became Senator and President of the Philippines) and showed that like Filipinos, the Chinese also have the same problems, frustrations, heartaches and they can be victims and heroes too.

Since 1979, he has written some of the greatest Filipino screenplays for movies ever made: Himala, Moral, Brutal, Relasyon, Jaguar, Karnal and Salome, all of which were made during what is now termed "the second Golden Age of Filipino cinema".

Lee enjoys that rare distinction of having both critical recognition and popular acclaim for his screenplays. Appreciation from the film industry, with fifty trophies to date, comes regularly from award-giving bodies. His films are also embraced by the public, as they constantly reflect a familiar reality so true yet absurd. Lines from his films have found their way into pop culture.

National Artist for Literature Bienvenido Lumbera, even went as far as describing Lee as one of the "miracles" of our age, in that he excels in different genres. "He never ceases to learn, to experiment, to be open."

Lee's television credits also span almost twenty-five years — from documentaries to multi-awarded drama series and teleplays, which serve as a precursor to today's Philippine soap operas, and an acknowledged benchmark for excellent small-screen storytelling.

He authored what is considered the local scriptwriting bible, Trip to Quiapo, which became a best-seller and a required textbook for university communication courses.

After a three-year scriptwriting hiatus, Lee emerged in 2008 with Para kay B, o kung paano dinevastate ng pag-ibig ang 4 out of 5 sa atin (For B, or how 4 out of 5 of us have been devastated by love). The book immediately became required reading in literature courses and received glowing reviews from the academe and fellow literary writers.

As one of the country's major fictionists, he has earned top honours for his achievements in the field of Philippine Arts and Letters, including the Gawad Balagtas (1983) from the Surian ng Wikang Pambansa for outstanding contribution to literature and cinema; Gawad ng Quezon City (1995) as outstanding citizen of Quezon City in the field of film and literature; Kalinangan — Diwa ng Lahi Cultural Award for cinema from the City of Manila (1998), and; Natatanging Gawad ng Sining at Kultura (2005) from the Ateneo de Manila University.

Lee was given an award for excellence in the field of arts and culture in the 2002 Dr Jose P. Rizal Awards for Excellence organized by The Manila Times and Kaisa Para sa Kaunlaran. Upon acceptance, he felt "very honored and happy... because it's very rare that people remember that I am Tsinoy". His first thought was the wish that his father was still alive as he would have been proud to see his son being recognized by his Chinese-Filipino peers.

Observers consider Lee's generosity of spirit his main legacy to the country and the Asian region. Never-ending causes and countless scholars have been constant beneficiaries of his big heart. His hometown's libraries, including that of his alma mater, have been regularly replenished by book drives that he initiates among his colleagues and friends.

Asked about his greatest contribution to the industry, he mentioned his almost two hundred produced scripts, then humbly opined that he might have made more people more aware of "the work of a scriptwriter, the worth of a script".

More than this, Lee takes pride in the free scriptwriting workshops he has conducted for free for thousands of young and aspiring writers since 1982. A great number of writers currently working in the TV and film industry are products of these workshops. Many of them became some of the country's most important and innovative writers and directors.

As a teacher, Lee has also helped shape young minds when he served as professorial lecturer at UP, Ateneo, De La Salle University, University of the East, and New Era University, teaching Filipino, literature, film, broadcasting, and scriptwriting.

Furthermore Lee has always been in the forefront promoting the rights and welfare of writers. He has even stopped joining literary contests, believing that writers should not compete against one another. He has been active in anti-censorship campaigns (Free the Artist) and was the president of the Screenwriters Guild of the Philippines in 2001.

In a keynote speech to graduates of Chung Hua High School, he encouraged them to dream, not necessarily grandiosely, but have the dreams that can "make a difference, if not in the world, at least in the lives of others". He shared his belief that "success is not measured by what you get out of life, but by what you give back", and further enjoined the students to "join the forces of good and fight for justice and the truth... (to) work for a better society".

Lee San Choon

(李三春, Li Sanchun, 1935–)
Politician, Chinese leader, Malaysia

Lee San Choon was the fourth president of the biggest Chinese political party in Malaysia, the Malaysian Chinese Association (MCA). Taking over the helm of the MCA from Tan Siew Sin in 1974, he officially assumed the office of president in 1975 and his tenure ended in 1983. Lee could be perceived as a representative Chinese leader and political figure who rose to power from the grass roots. When he was the president, he steered the MCA towards the path of modernization, and also led the MCA through the political and education changes in the 1970s and 1980s.

Lee San Choon was born on 24 March 1935 in Pekan, Pahang. His father, Lee Debin (李德斌) was from Tianmen County (天门县) of Hubei Province. His mother was Yang Zhenling (杨贞龄). There were six children in the family with three boys and three girls, and he was the third child. His father, who came to Malaysia from Hubei, had a special skill for treating dental problems such ascavities and was also skilled in teeth extraction. The family led a moderate and simple life. In 1945, on the eve of the lunar new year, Lee San Choon's mother passed away. Lee was only ten years old at the time. Because his mother was not there to care for him while he was growing up, he learned to become a very independent person.

Lee San Choon studied Mandarin at Chung Hwa School, Pekan for two years and was then transferred to Sultan Ahmad School, Pekan, for a year of English education. However, he was forced to stop schooling because his father moved the whole family to Johor Bahru, Johor. He was twelve years old at the time. In 1948, Lee San Choon continued his schooling by attending Remove Class at the English College in Johor Bahru. After obtaining his Cambridge GCE 'O' Level Certificate, he was however not accepted into the Form 6 science stream, so, he went to Singapore to teach English at Dan Zhao (丹兆) Chinese primary school in Geylang, and to study science subjects on his own at night. Later he also passed the Chinese High School Examination organized by the Singapore Government. This showed the standard of his Chinese language competency.

Lee San Choon's interest and sensitivity towards politics is believed to be related to his natural endowment. He had always been very interested in politics since young. His twenty-seven years of political career started in 1956, when he first participated in political activities, and stopped when he called it quits in 1983. He was also a member of parliament for twenty-four years from 1959. He started very young at the age of twenty-four, and retired from politics while he was still fit at the age of forty-eight. In his political career of more than two decades, Lee San Choon witnessed the changes in Malaysia's history. Since leaving the political arena, he has been invited to be president of the board of directors of some commercial groups, and his stints, as such include Multi-Purpose Holdings, IOI Corporation, and Sunshine Holdings.

Lee initiated many important changes during his tenure leading MCA, but he also faced severe political challenges. First, he attempted to change the political image of the MCA as a party comprising towkay and also ang moh kia (an English-educated person) as perceived by the Chinese community. Additionally, he proposed five long-term development plans when he first took over the MCA as its president. These five major projects were: (1) A massive member recruitment campaign; (2) Construction of the MCA headquarters building; (3) Setting up of a multi-enterprise company; (4) Forming the Malaysian Chinese Cultural Association; (5) Developing the Tunku Abdul Rahman College. These projects injected new vigour into the MCA and brought about a fresh, dynamic outlook in the Chinese community.

At the same time, during his term as the president of the MCA, UMNO of which the MCA was a party, proposed to change the Alliance of the three ruling political parties into the Barisan National (National Front), comprising multiple political parties. This directly affected MCA as it would then be the only political party that represented the Chinese. He tried to defend MCA's position in the Barisan National, but could not change the fact that UMNO had become the single most dominating party, and hence MCA's status as a ruling party started to decline.

In 1978 he announced that he did not support the United Chinese School Committees and Teachers Associations of Malaysia that represented the Chinese associations and community in fighting for Mandarin to be made an official language and in the various Mandarin education (华文教育) campaigns, including the campaigns for the development of Chinese primary schools, as well as independent secondary schools, and the setting up of an independent University. Lee San Choon shared Tan Siew Sin's view that Mandarin education had no future in Malaysia and proposed a kind of Chinese education (华人教育) based on the demands of the market. Furthermore, he also advocated the transformation of Chinese secondary schools into national type schools. Though Lee San Choon knew Mandarin, the MCA under his leadership disappointed the Chinese community.

In the 70s, the government formulated the Industrial Coordination Act (ICA) and made it compulsory for listed companies to reserve 30 per cent of their shares for Bumiputra in order to protect the economic status of Malays. The discrepancies in the implementation of the New Economic Policy dented the economic position of Chinese. In order to promote the economic self-reliance of the Chinese, Lee San Choon proposed the setting up of Koperasi Jayadiri Malaysia, Multi-Purpose Holdings, State Holdings, etc. These proposals brought new hope to the Chinese economy although some cooperatives went bankrupt due to corrupt and fraudulent practices, causing the common people to lose all their capital and hard-earned money. In the end, when economics and politics interacted, many incidents of power struggles and scrambling for profits occurred on the political scene.

Lee San Choon's personal political career is a wonder. When he first entered politics, he defeated the Socialist Front strongman of the rival camp, Dr Wei Lihuang (魏利煌医生) and became the youngest member of parliament. After that, his political career saw a meteoric rise. He had faced the problem of internal power struggles within the party several times in the process of establishing the authority of his MCA leadership. For instance, his presidency was strongly challenged by the Chen Wing Sum's (曾永森) camp, but he remained unshaken. He also set the record of winning all the Chinese constituencies he contested in. In the 1982 general elections, he announced contesting in Seremban, a DAP stronghold, to have a fight to the finish with DAP president, Chen Man Hin (曾敏兴). In the end, he emerged the victor, claiming the seat of Seremban. This indeed spurred the resultant contest of seats all over the country, opening a new chapter in the history of the MCA. In the following year, as his political career was reaching its peak, he unexpectedly announced his resignation from the post of MCA president and later relinquished all his political positions. Lee San Choon's withdrawal from politics was unacceptable to many, especially the Chinese community, which answered his call to give the MCA a chance. It was anyone's guess whether his retirement involved any secrets not to be divulged. However, some commentators were of the opinion that he was not on good terms with UMNO leaders headed by Mahathir, and he failed to fight for the rights and interests of the Chinese, etc. Nevertheless, one of the key factors was that he had become weary of long-drawn-out struggles in his political career.

Lee Seng Gee

(李成义, Li Chengyi, 1921–)

Businessman, philanthropist, long-time Chairman of the Lee Foundation, Singapore

Lee Seng Gee was born in Singapore on 25 June 1921, the eldest son of rubber magnate Lee Kong Chian and Tan Ai Leh (the eldest daughter of rubber tycoon and community leader, Tan Kah Kee). At the age of four-and-a-half, the young Seng Gee was sent to study at the Sin Chew Kindergarten at Tanjong Pagar. Later, he enrolled in two primary schools — the English-medium Anglo-Chinese Primary School (which he attended in the morning) and the Chinese-medium Tao Nan School (which he attended in the afternoon) — because his parents wanted his to have a bilingual education. He continued going to two different schools during his secondary school days — Anglo Chinese School for his English education, and the Industrial and Commercial Continuation School (南洋工商补习学校), for his Chinese education.

After completing his secondary education, Lee was sent to read Economics at the University of Pennsylvania in 1939. There he met Lora Tong, daughter of Tang Shaoyi (唐绍仪, 1859–1938) who had been the first Prime Minister of Republican China (in 1911 and then again in 1922). When he graduated with a BSc in Economics in 1943, he married Lora and then proceeded to the Wharton Business School where he obtained in an MBA in 1944. An excellent student, Lee was accepted into University of Pennsylvania's doctoral programme but he did not complete his dissertation as he was needed back to Singapore in 1946 to help rebuild the family business.

Lee's father, Lee Kong Chian started out in the rubber business after working for his father-in-law for some years. In 1928, he started Nam Aik Rubber Company in Muar, Malaysia, and in 1931, established Lee Rubber Company, that was to be foundation for his multifarious business interests. Soon he diversified into banking (becoming Chairman of the Oversea-Chinese Banking Corporation or OCBC in 1932), oil palm and pineapple cultivation. By 1942, Lee Kong Chian was a highly-successful and respected entrepreneur and community leader. When the Japanese occupied Singapore from 1942 to 1945, all assets of the Lee Rubber Company were confiscated and business operations came to a halt. Lee Kong Chian happened to be in Washington DC attending the Rubber Study Group meeting when the Japanese invaded Singapore and most of the Lee family were unable to return to Singapore till 1946.

When Lee Kong Chian returned to Singapore in 1946, he was able to recover all his assets but had to restart the business from scratch. Most of his former employees returned and with a loan from the Hongkong & Shanghai Bank, he rebuilt his business empire. Lee Rubber's greatest losses during the War were in Indonesia where the Japanese murdered many of their managers and where the Dutch adopted a scorched-earth policy in their fight against the Japanese, levelling and burning all buildings as they retreated. Lee Seng Gee was sent to Indonesia to help rebuild the business there.

Lee spent some 5 to 6 years in Indonesia helping rebuild the processing plants that had been destroyed during the Japanese occupation. Starting out as a general apprentice and general staff, Lee proved himself to be a capable and astute manager and by the time of the Korean War, enabled the Lee group to profit greatly from the boom in rubber prices. Working closely with the Dutch authorities, Lee was able to get the processing plants back in operation within two years.

In 1952, when Lee Kong Chian established Lee Foundation and made clear his intention to spend more time on civic and philanthropic matters, Lee Seng Gee returned to Singapore to run the family's business. In 1955, he was placed in charge of the family's Indonesian companies. In 1965 he took over the reins of the company as Chairman and Chief Executive Officer of the Lee Group of Companies. His younger brothers, Seng Tee and Seng Wee also joined the business, taking charge of different facets of the family's business interests. Seng Tee was in charge of Lee Pineapple Company while Seng Wee was in charge of the family's interests in OCBC.

Lee Seng Gee ran the family companies very much in the same way as his father did. His approach to expansion and growth was cautious and self-reliant. Factories or new business were only started if the company had sufficient funds of its own to do so. The Lees would not borrow heavily from banks just to expand. At the same time, he ensured the company's managers did not speculate in rubber (as was the common industry practice in those days). High-risk, speculative schemes that would turn a quick profit were eschewed. Instead, the Lees believed in steady and sustained growth through the development of a strong and happy workforce, deployment of modern western business practices and computerisation. Indeed, under Lee's management, the Lee Group became one of the earliest companies in Singapore to computerise its operations. As early as 1954, IBM business machines were used to monitor the Group's operations at its branch offices.

Like his father, Lee treated all employees as family members and took great pains to ensure that staff welfare was given high priority. He managed his staff in a conciliatory manner, spending time to persuade and convince his senior managers of the value of his proposed changes and then letting them decide. But with new and younger staff, he was much firmer in his instructions and decisions.

Lee Seng Gee's first foray into philanthropy came at a young age when he helped his grandfather Tan Kah Kee raise funds for the China Relief Fund which the latter headed. Today, his name is synonymous with the Lee Foundation, the charitable foundation established by his father in 1952 and of which he became Chairman in 1967. The object of the Foundation is to aid "the advancement of education, medicine and cultural activities; helping the poor; and assisting victims of fire, flood and famine". Over the years the Foundation has donated over S$400 million to worthwhile causes, including social welfare, the arts, medical assistance, disaster relief, community outreach, women issues and sports. Particularly noteworthy is the Foundation contribution to education which included S$60 million to the building of the new National Library (2003); S$50 million to the Singapore Management University (2003); S$50 million to the National University of Singapore (2005); S$25 million for the Lee Kong Chian Natural History Museum (2011); and S$150 million to the Nanyang Technological University for the establishment of a new medical school (2011).

The Foundation has garnered numerous accolades and awards, having been named Distinguished Patron of the Arts by the National Arts Council for several years, and the National Volunteerism and Philanthropy Award Special Recognition Award in 2004. Lee Seng Gee was awarded the Public Service Star for his philanthropic work in 1992. The following year, he received the inaugural Ee Peng Liang Award given by the National Council of Social Services for his philanthropic efforts. In 2002, he was conferred an honorary Doctor of Letters degree by the National University of Singapore, and in 2007, was given the Credit Suisse-Ernst & Young Lifetime Achievement Award in 2007 for his success as a pioneering entrepreneur. In 2009, the Nanyang Technological University conferred on him an honorary Doctor of Letters degree.

A man of simple tastes and habits, Lee enjoys the company of his family and friends. His first wife Lora Tong, with whom he had four children, died in 1978. In 1991, he married Dr Della Suantio, granddaughter of Thio Siong Soe, a well-known Indonesian philanthropist and long-time business associate of his father. She works alongside Lee in his philanthropic work and in 2004 started the DS Lee Foundation.

Lee Seng Peng

(李成枫, Li Chengfeng, 1908–95)
Entrepreneur, philanthropist, Chinese education and cultural figure, Malaysia

Lee Seng Peng was a representative personage who devoted his life to Chinese education and culture. He was born in 1908 in the village of Furong (芙蓉), Mei Shan (梅山) of Nan'an County in Fujian Province, China. Due to poverty, he only went to a private school for three years or so when he was young. At age nineteen, he went over to Singapore alone to work at Tan Kah Kee's shoe factory. In 1930, he returned to China to get married. A few months later, he returned to Singapore to work as a clerk at Lee Rubber Co. Pte Ltd which was founded by Lee Kong Chian, a fellow townsman of his. Within the same year, Lee Rubber Co. Pte Ltd set up a factory in Kuala Lumpur and Lee was transferred there as its manager.

A diligent and honest worker of Lee Rubber Co. Pte Ltd, Lee served the company for fifty years. Most of Lee Rubber's staff in Indonesia and Malaysia were personally selected, employed, and trained by Lee. He even proposed and set up a charity fund — Lee Foundation that has benefited innumerable people in need. The eldest son of Lee Kong Chian, Lee Seng Gee, once openly credited Lee Seng Peng with the funding and structure of the Lee Foundation at the Xiamen University. Because of Lee's perseverance in facing hardships and his total devotion to Lee Rubber, he gained the complete trust of Lee Kong Chian and became his most reliable and competent right-hand man.

Lee Seng Peng's biggest contribution to society is in Chinese education. There are three Chinese schools closely associated with his great reputation, namely, Lai Ming (Chinese) Primary School, Lee Rubber (Chinese) Primary School, and Chung Hwa (Private) High School.

Lai Ming Primary School, established in 1929, was not personally founded by Lee Seng Peng, but it had since 1943 continuously been receiving his support and has finally become a well known Chinese primary school. On 13 May 1969, however, it was razed to the ground because of the May 13 Incident. Lee Seng Peng resolutely shouldered the burden of raising funds to rebuild it. He managed to amass over RM400,000 for the school rebuilding fund, thanks to the influence and reputation he had among the locals. However, the reconstruction project required over RM600,000 and was short of about RM100,000. This amount was taken care of by Lee Seng Peng and Tan Sri Lee Yan Lian, each contributing half the amount needed. Hence, the reconstruction work of Lai Ming Primary School could proceed and was finally completed in 1972. It is currently one of the model primary schools in Kuala Lumpur.

Lee Rubber Chinese Primary School on the other hand was founded by Lee Seng Peng personally in 1949. At that time, he was general manager of Lee Rubber Co. Pte Ltd in Kuala Lumpur and noticed that Chinese pupils in the Gombak area had to commute a few kilometres to study at Chung Hwa Primary School in Setapak. Many of the pupils were children of Lee Rubber Co. Ptd Ltd's staff members and due to the lack of public transport, Lee Rubber Co. Ptd Ltd provided them with transport using the company lorries. However, this could easily cause traffic accidents and Lee was once warned by the police chief of Gombak area that this posed a grave danger, with very severe implication. After that, Lee Seng Peng promptly thought of a solution. He identified and designated part of the land owned by him, situated next to Lee Rubber factory in Gombak, as the construction site of Lee Rubber Primary School. This school was officially completed and opened to pupils on 1 February 1949, with all fees waived and all expenses borne by Lee Rubber Co. Pte Ltd Two years later the land where the school was built on was bought over by Lee Rubber Co. Pte Ltd.

Lee Seng Peng's contribution to Chung Hwa Private High School was something dwelled upon with great relish by the Chinese community in Malaysia. When Lee first held the post of Chung Hwa Private High School's chairman of the board of directors in 1974, there were only 172 students in the school. He worked vigorously on the expansion of the school, and in 1978 the school was moved from Setapak to St Thomas Road, off Jalan Ipoh, where the new building was built;. In 1985, 1990, and 1995, the school successfully underwent three phases of expansion and reconstruction, all thanks to his effort. Currently Chung Hwa Private High School is not only complete with all amenities, but also has an enrolment of over 4,000 pupils. It has indeed become a Chinese Independent Secondary School that is well known far and wide, and on a grand scale too. Not only has Lee played an active role in leading Chung Hwa, he has also contributed a total of more than RM1 million in donation to this private high school.

Other than building and opening schools, Lee donated a large sum of money in 1991 to set up the Furong Foundation in his original hometown in Fujian, China, so that he could actively contribute to improving its public welfare by, for example, building kindergartens, constructing bridges and roads, etc.

In the fields of culture and economics, Lee was a very successful industrialist. He was the chairman of Nanyang Siang Pau from 1983 to 1993, and had held the post of chairman of Lee Biscuits' board of directors. In terms of social organizations, he was the vice-president of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Kuala Lumpur and Selangor, and the president of The Federation of the Rubber Trade Association of Malaysia. He died in 1995 in Kuala Lumpur.

Lee Seng Wee

(李成伟, Li Chengwei, 1930–)
Banker, philanthropist, Singapore

Lee Seng Wee and his two elder brothers, Lee Seng Gee (李成义) and Lee Seng Tee (李成智), are well known businessmen and philanthropists in Singapore. Seng Wee is also listed by Forbes as one of the ten wealthiest ethnic Chinese in the island state.

Lee Seng Wee was born in 1930 in Singapore, the third and youngest son of rubber tycoon and philanthropist, Lee Kong Chian (李光前, 1893–1967) and his wife Tan Ai Lay, who was the eldest daughter of Tan Kah Kee (陈嘉庚, 1874–1961), another well-known rubber tycoon and philanthropist. Lee Kong Chian initially worked for his father-in-law but in 1927 established his own rubber company known in Chinese as NanYi (Nam Aik) Shujiao Gongsi (南益树胶公司). In 1931, a year after Seng Wee was born, Nan Yi Rubber became a registered company known as Lee Rubber. Lee was also a major share holder of a small bank known as Chinese Commercial Bank Limited (华商银行) which would merge with Ho Hong Bank and Overseas-Chinese Bank to become the Overseas Chinese Banking Corporation (华侨银行 OCBC) in 1932.

Lee Kong Chian went on to expand his business in other areas and set up more companies such as Lee Pineapple, Lee Produce, Lee Printing, Lee Saw Mills and Lee Biscuits. In late 1941 Lee Kong Chian was chosen to represent the Singapore rubber association at a rubber conference in the USA. He took his wife and two sons, Seng Gee and Seng Wee, along with him. When Singapore came under Japanese occupation, the family prolonged their stay in the West. Seng Wee was thus exposed to a Western environment from a young age and only returned to Singapore with his parents after the Japanese surrender.

Seng Wee was educated at the Anglo-Chinese School in Singapore and went on to study engineering at the University of Toronto, Canada, obtaining a Bachelor of Applied Science in Engineering. He then obtained an MBA from the University of Western Ontario where he won the Gold Medal for academic excellence. Upon his return to Singapore, he joined the Lee Rubber Company and worked through the ranks to become its vice-chairman.

When Lee Kong Chian passed away in 1967, his businesses were divided up among his three sons with Lee Rubber under the control of eldest son, Seng Gee, Lee Pineapple under second son, Seng Tee, and interests in the Overseas-Chinese Banking Corporation overseen by Seng Wee. The Lee family had been instrumental in the establishment of OCBC with Lee Kong Chian serving as its first vice-chairman in 1933 and its chairman from 1965 to 1967. In 1965, Seng Wee became a member of the Bank's board of directors and his name has remained on the board since. In 1995, he became chairman of OCBC. At that time, his family was reputed to own 30 per cent of its shares. In June 2001, he made a successful $2.4 billion takeover bid for Singapore's sixth largest bank, Keppel Capital Holdings. He stepped down as chairman of the bank's executive committee in 2003.

Lee has also served in numerous public and civic organisations. He was chairman of the Singapore International Foundation (SIF) from 1991 to 2001 and was the first private sector board member of the Government of Singapore Investment Corporation (GIC). He also served on the Council of Presidential Advisers, the Board of Commissioners of Currency as well as the Board of Governors of the Chinese Heritage Centre. In 2001, he was conferred the Darjah Utama Bakti Cemerlang or Distinguished Service Order, Singapore's highest civilian decoration and award.

In 2007, Lee became the founding chairman of the Temasek Trust alongside Sim Kee Boon, Ratan Tata and Xu Kuangdi. A S$500 million trust was created to sponsor the activities of non-profit philanthropic organisations such as the Temasek Foundation, the Singapore Technologies Endowment Programme, the Singapore Millennium Foundation and the Temasek Life Sciences Laboratory.

Lee Seng Wee's son, Dr Warren Lee Tih-Shih, has been on OCBC's board of directors since 2003. An Associate Professor at the Duke Medical School as well as at the Duke-NUS Graduate Medical School in Singapore, Dr Lee is also a director of the Lee Foundation and several other companies within the Lee Rubber Group. In 2010, Forbes magazine listed Lee Seng Wee as the 10th richest person in Singapore, with an estimated net worth of US$1.3 billion. In 2006, Lee was honoured by the Woodrow Wilson Center with an Award for Corporate Citizenship at a glittering ceremony in New York.

In 2008, the Lee family locked horns with the family of the late Tan Chin Tuan (long-time Chairman of OCBC) in a public battle for the takeover of one of Singapore's oldest public-listed companies, Straits Trading Limited. The Tan family (trading through their holding company, Tecity) eventually outbid the Lees and have since taken Straits Trading private.

Lee is extremely publicity-shy and does not grant interviews. A Chinese biographer, Li Yuanrong, who wrote a biography of Lee Kong Chian has this to say about Lee Kong Chian's son:

"Lee Seng Wee is a king of wealth, but not many people recognize him. People only know his name, but do not recognise the person, as he seldom appears in public and does not like to show off. We are not only talking about overseas, even in Singapore, if he walks in the street, very few people would be able to recognize him. Lee Seng Wee has a motto: 'I like living a simple and contented life.'"

Lee Siew Choh

(李绍祖, Li Shaozu, 1917–2002)

Political activist, medical doctor, orator, Singapore

Lee Siew Choh is best remembered for being the first non-constituency member of Parliament (NCMP) as well as a vocal opposition leader who clocked the longest speech in parliament at seven hours and thirteen minutes, when opposing the proposed merger with Malaysia. Unbeknownst to many, this colourful public figure who led the Barisan members of parliament to boycott the first parliamentary session in 1965 also trained and served as a medical doctor.

In both his capacities as political figure and medical doctor, Lee strove to do everything that he thought was in the people's interest. Born on 1 November 1917 in Kuala Lumpur, he came to Singapore and graduated from Victoria Institution in 1934 before pursuing medicine at King Edward VII College of Medicine. Following his graduation in 1942, he immediately sought to serve the less fortunate in society by joining Kandang Kerbau (KK) Hospital in Singapore as a doctor. However, his medical career was unable to take off fully due to the onset of the Japanese Occupation. During which time, he was sent to the Thai-Burma border for two years to see to the prisoners-of-war who were building the Death Railway under Japanese orders. The war must have left an indelible mark on him, for he redoubled his efforts at serving the post-war community that was short of many day-to-day supplies, among them medical supplies. Thus, in 1947, he set up his own medical practice in Hill Street, at the International Dispensary, to provide affordable health care to peoples of all walks of life.

As with most of the Second World War survivors, Lee was a committed anti-colonialist who believed that Singaporeans had to defend and protect itself in trying times, rather than depend on a colonial power that was half the world away and unable to do much for its colonies. At the urging of Dr Goh Keng Swee, Lee joined the People's Action Party (PAP) in 1958 and campaigned for Singapore's independence. In 1959, his political career formally took off and he was elected the legislative assemblyman for Queenstown. The following year, he was appointed parliamentary secretary to the Home Affairs Ministry.

However, by 1961, the PAP experienced a schism within its ranks due to differences over the proposed merger with Malaya. Lee was opposed to the PAP not holding a referendum with a clear-cut "Yes" or "No" vote as to whether Singapore should merge with Malaya to form Malaysia. He, therefore, left the PAP and formed the Barisan Sosialis with those who shared his view on 13 August 1961. In his new capacity as chairman of the Barsian Sosialis, Lee made a passionate record breaking speech of seven and half hours in 1961. This speech was spread over two days and took place in parliament, where he argued the merger issue with Malaya.

While his passionate speech gathered him much support, it also seemed to rub the PAP the wrong way. The PAP government detained him in 1963 for allegedly participating in the City Hall riots. Unfortunately for him, he lost his Rochor constituency seat in the 1963 elections even though the Barisan Sosialis won thirteen seats. His never-say-die attitude did not flag with the electoral defeat. Both he and his party continued to remain active in politics, campaigning against what they perceived to be PAP injustices towards the rights of the people. Lee claimed that he wanted to give the people an alternative vision of history that differed from the official PAP history. As part of the protest against the PAP's politics, Lee and thirteen of his party members boycotted the first parliamentary session when Singapore formally withdrew from Malaysia in 1965. He later resigned from parliament. In turn, the Barisan Sosialis refused to participate in the 1968 elections as a mark of protest against what they deemed were the high-handed tactics of the PAP-dominated government.

Eventually, the Barisan Sosialis merged with the Workers' Party in 1988 and Lee took the opportunity to re-enter politics. This showed his indomitable spirit to do that which he thought was right for society. Accordingly, he stood as a Worker's Party candidate in the Eunos GRC. He narrowly lost the contestation, but became the first non-constituency member of parliament (NCMP) when he garnered the largest number of votes among the losers. The high number of votes he gathered demonstrated that his proposals to improve the socio-political lives of the people still captivated many voters. It also demonstrated to the PAP that he was a legitimate political force to be reckoned with. If anything, his foray into politics in 1988 showed that he was still very much a political idealist whose numerous setbacks did not deter him from holding his vision of what was a viable alternative to PAP dominance. Indeed, his status as an NCMP could be interpreted as a tactic nod by the PAP in acknowledgement of everything he had to offer society.

Unfortunately, old age caught up with him and Lee retired from politics in 1993. After battling lung cancer for three years, he succumbed to the disease and passed away on 18 July 2002 at the age of eighty-four. His political legacy of passionate idealism as an alternative to the pragmatic PAP stance remains today in the form of the Workers' Party and its party manifesto.

Lee Sin Cheng

(李深静, Li Shenjing, 1939–)

Leading businessman, Malaysia

Lee Sin Cheng is a prominent player in the plantation and resource-based manufacturing industries and property development. His Industrial Oxygen Incorporated Sdn Bhd (IOI) Group is internationally known as a leading global integrated palm oil player with operations stretching the entire palm value chain from seedlings to plantations to crop oil extraction to diverse value-added manufacturing across major continents, serving global markets in more than sixty-five countries. In Malaysia, his IOI Group is also prominently known as one of the leading property developers with significant investment holdings of prime real estates.

Lee was born in 1939 in Jeram, Kuala Selangor, north-east of Kuala Lumpur and his ancestral roots are from Eng Choon district of Fujian Province in China. His father ran a sundry shop and when the family business fell into hard times after the Japanese Occupation, he dropped out of the Chinese school he was attending at the age of eleven and started to go around rubber and oil palm plantations on a bicycle to sell ice cream to help support his family. Four years later, he resumed his schooling and completed his Chinese secondary school education before entering the labour market.

In 1961, at the age of twenty-two he obtained a job as a field supervisor in a small oil palm plantation in Bidor, Perak, and quickly worked his way up to become an assistant manager and then manager. Lee was a casualty of the fragmentation of oil palm estates in the 1960s when he was retrenched, but left with a golden handshake. When he applied for employment at the British-owned Dunlop Estate, he was rejected because of his inadequate fluency in the English language. Until 1970 foreigners, especially the British, had controlled 78 per cent of the oil palm hectarage and their estates generally were larger in size than the Chinese-owned ones. In later years, after having become a successful businessman, Lee singled out his failure to get a job at the Dunlop Estate as a turning point in his life because it spurred him to strike out on his own. And when he bought over the Dunlop Estate in 2000, about twenty years later, Lee got his "revenge" and recalled it as the happiest day of his life.

Lee's first business venture was in pig farming but it ended in failure when swine fever struck his farm and wiped out most of his stock. For him this period marked the lowest point in his life. With the small capital that he received from selling out his pig farm at his disposal, he started a petrol station in Petaling Jaya, then a booming satellite town of Kuala Lumpur. He also worked part-time in a plantation which was within commuting distance. With the capital he accumulated from his petrol kiosk, the ambitious Lee started to look around for other business opportunities and eventually ventured into property development in the lucrative Klang Valley market.

In 1975, Lee established a private-limited property company, Lam Soon Huat Sdn Bhd., which was renamed Lam Soon Huat Development Bhd. when it was converted into a public company in 1985. Lee's first successful property development project was the Taman Lam Soon Huat in Kajang, Selangor, which was completed in 1977. During the economic depression in the mid-1980s, Lee took a bold gamble in acquiring a piece of land in Petaling Jaya for RM$2 million and then launched the Taman Mayang Jaya housing project in 1987 when the economy was still depressed. But his gamble paid off and Taman Mayang Jaya turned out to be a successful project. Lee's biggest successful property project was the development in 1991 of Bandar Puchong Jaya, a comprehensive self-contained township development in Puchong, Selangor, covering an area of over 374 hectares. IOI has continued to be active in the property business in the Klang Valley, and has started to invest in other parts of Malaysia, especially southern Johor. It has also become a global property player as well, especially in the Singapore property market. In 1993, through a rationalization and restructuring scheme, Lam Soon Huat emerged as the property arm of the IOI Group and changed its name to IOI Properties Bhd.

IOI Corporation, established in 1969, had been largely a manufacturer of industrial gas, when Lee secured control of the company in 1982. Using IOI as the vehicle, Lee entered the plantation business from zero base and grew the company impressively over a twenty-year period through a series of acquisitions of established plantation companies. His initial entry was the acquisition of Bukit Dinding Estate in Pahang in 1983. His most strategic thrust into the plantation sector came with his acquisition of Dunlop Estate with its thirteen estates (a total of 27,880 hectares), two mills, two factories, and a research station in 1990. By 1990, IOI's total plantation holding had expanded to more than 45,000 hectares, and by 2009 its Malaysian holding had more than doubled to 150,000 hectares, with most of the new growth coming from its acquisitions in Sabah and Sarawak. It also holds another 83,000 hectares in Indonesia, mostly in Kalimantan. Lee's reputed hands-on managerial style and ready adoption of advances in agronomy sciences resulted in the company's superior performance in terms of oil yield and production cost per hectare compared with the industry average. With oil yield of some six tonnes per hectare per year in its matured estates, IOI is the most efficient plantation company in the world.

In the 1990s, Lee started to shift his focus from rationalizing his palm oil business to position the company strategically in various segments along the palm oil value chain. In 1997, IOI ventured into the oleochemical business with the acquisition of a 33 per cent in Palmco Holdings Berhad, which owned the largest and integrated oleochemical complex in Pasir Gudang, Johor. By the early twenty-first century, IOI had four refineries; two in Pasir Gudang Johor, and one each in Sabah and Rotterdam, Netherlands. The Rotterdam refinery has a refining capacity of 1.32 million tonnes, making it the largest palm oil refinery in Europe. The company's four refineries have a total refining capacity of approximately 3.7 million tonnes. In 2002, IOI moved further down the supply chain with the acquisition of Unilever's Oils and Fats Division, and Loders Croklaan BV, which has factories in the Netherlands, the United States, Canada and Egypt. Lee has thus vastly expanded the company business down the value chain such that IOI also produces a wide range of oleochemical products for food and non-food industrial applications and is the largest fatty acid producer in Asia. The IOI-owned Loders Croklaan is one of the world's leading suppliers of specialty fats and oils to the food sector.

In recent years, although Lee remains the executive chairman and chief executive officer of the IOI Group, he has started to roll back his role in running his business empire and is grooming his two British trained, lawyer sons to take over the reins. His eldest son, Lee Yeow Chor, is the group executive director of IOI, while his second son, Lee Yeow Seng, is an executive director. Aside from business, Lee has increasingly devoted his time and energy to a variety of philantrophic and community activities. Because of his own education experience, Lee established Yayasan Tan Sri Dato' Lee Shin Cheng to provide scholarships and education grants to outstanding and deserving young students, and also makes regular donations to Chinese schools. He is also active in providing his advice and guidance to a large number of industry groupings, associations, and social organizations.

Lee Tzu Pheng

(李子平, Li Ziping, 1946–)
Poet, academic, Singapore

Lee Tzu Pheng, who was born on 13 May 1946, is one of Singapore's foremost poets. Commonly regarded as belonging to the second generation of poets who came of age in 1960s Singapore, she has won acclaim both at home and abroad for her socially engaged poems that interrogate conventional wisdom, as well as for her lyrical, introspective poems. Her poems also have a feminist edge as seen in the way she draws attention to female figures marginalized by society and in her reworking of traditional fairy tales to reflect contemporary realities. Yet other poems are influenced by her religious faith, evoking a complex interior world of struggle over questions of spirituality and personal conviction. Lee's characteristically quiet and ironic tone, and her poetic craftsmanship as seen in her highly nuanced use of language, comprise a significant contribution to the overall range and depth of Singapore poetry in English. She is perhaps best known for "'My Country and My People'", a poem which has been widely anthologized and studied. As a university literary scholar and academic, and in her role on numerous arts-related committees and panels over the years, she has helped shape the literary and artistic landscape of contemporary Singapore.

Lee studied at Raffles Girls' Secondary School and completed her undergraduate education, majoring in English Literature, with first-class honours, at the University of Singapore in 1968. She obtained her Ph.D. with a thesis on W.B. Yeats from the same university in 1972. Until her retirement as associate professor, she was a lecturer in the English Language and Literature Department at the National University of Singapore (NUS), like the prominent first-generation poet, Edwin Thumboo, and fellow second-generation poet, Arthur Yap. She married and later divorced fellow academic Ban Kah Choon. Aside from her own writing and teaching at the university, Lee has served on the Drama Review Committee, and the Arts Resource Panel of the National Arts Council. She was the chairperson for poetry for the Singapore Literature prize in 1993, 1995, and 1997. She has also conducted numerous workshops on creative writing, given public readings, and mentored younger poets, both informally, or as part of the Ministry of Education and NUS Faculty of Arts and Social Sciences Creative Arts Programme for gifted pupils. Her interest in championing the cause of children's literature and encouraging reading among the young led to her book, Growing Readers: The Parent's Guide to Early Reading, in 1987.

Lee began writing poetry early — as an undergraduate in 1965 — but only published her first book of poems, Prospect of a Drowning, in 1980. The understated quality of her language and tone often belie a quiet intensity, and steely or tensile toughness. As she puts it in Against the Next Wave (1988), writing poetry is an attempt at self-control: "Making a poem is/ taking charge of yourself,/ your fears, incapacities, tears." ("If You Must Know", p. 12). She draws inspiration from everyday life, such as a night scene, the sound of birds, the experience of rainfall, the sight of a tree, or the image of a cyclist going by. These easily overlooked details of mundane existence, often imbued with symbolic significance, provide the occasion for Lee to express with deep feeling and insight the transience of things, the loss of the past, and the pain of suffering, as well as to meditate on the nature of language and silence. To Lee, words often fail, but they can also convey startling insights. Thus, she observes in The Brink of an Amen (1991), "Poetry is going/ into the dark,/ as much as/ it is a way through" but "no fabric so black but stretched/ allows light/ to come clear" ("The Fabric", p. 8).

Lee's poems have been praised by fellow poet, Shirley Lim, for their "interrogative mood on most matters" (Lim, p. 176). Indeed, her persistently ironic voice is captured perfectly in her most famous poem, "'My Country and My People'". In the poem, instead of confidently claiming to be nationally representative, or expressing a firm belief in a unified national vision, the persona expresses doubt about belonging, the contingency of identity and relationships, and the limits of her own knowledge.

My country and my people
I never understood.
I grew up in China's mighty shadow, with my gentle, brown-skinned neighbours;
but I keep diaries in English.
(Prospect of a Drowning, p. 52)

Lee has described the poem as being "an albatross around [her] neck". (Moving Worlds, p. 176). Meant to be "personal" (Chan, p. 53) it was interpreted as a public statement and was once banned from being read over public radio. As the literary scholar, Koh Tai Ann, notes in a detailed analysis of this often misread poem, it "addresses a critical question: as a local born, English-educated Chinese writer in English of immigrant origin who lives in a Malay region, what exactly – literally, metaphorically, or spiritually — does 'my country and my people' mean [to her]?" (Koh, p. 144) Lee's poetry is notable for containing a strong vein of social criticism directed at a Singapore run by an overbearing government quick to forget the past and obsessed with materialism, even if this is often expressed ruefully rather than angrily as in the poems, "Bukit Timah, Singapore" (Prospect of a Drowning, pp. 49–50) and "Singapore River" (The Brink of an Amen, p. 56). Her poetry seeks actively to evoke and reflect a radical private subjectivity — whether in search of peace, a stable, still point, or some kind of communion with fullness — which, by itself, may be deemed a critique of an overly intrusive state. In many instances, her desire to foreground a woman's point of view as an alternative perspective frequently leads her to provide an ironic commentary on social arrangements and gender inequality. Lee is also often moved to write because of a tragic contemporary event or a sense of injustice. Poems such as "Ethiopian Famine Victims: Mother and Child" (The Brink of an Amen, p. 40), where she expresses sympathy for the suffering of, and solidarity with, the disadvantaged, disclose her humanity and reinforce the sense of her persona as a trenchant if unobtrusive observer of society.

In 1989 Lee became a Roman Catholic, an event she described as "the best thing that has happened to me" (The Brink of an Amen, p. 63). Her later work is inspired by, and preoccupied with, religious conviction, redemption, spiritual solace, and the reconciliation of action with faith. Anne Brewster notes, for example, that Lee's fourth book, Lambada by Galilee and Other Surprises (1997), "seems to offer moments of reconciliation with the world" (p. 73). In the second half of this book, Lee's persona is a pilgrim who uses the occasion of travel to specific holy sites, such as Assisi and Medjugorje, to celebrate prayerful contemplation, ponder the conflicting demands of flesh and spirit, and deliberate over the search for God through a series of meditative lyrics.

Lee has received numerous prizes and awards for her four collections of poems. Her first three, Prospect of a Drowning (1980), Against the Next Wave, (1988) and The Brink of An Amen (1991), were each awarded the National Book Development Council of Singapore Award for Poetry. In 1985, she was awarded the Cultural Medallion for Literature, Singapore's highest honour for contribution to the arts and culture. This was followed two years later by the S.E.A Write (South East Asian Writers) Award given to outstanding writers from ASEAN countries. In 1995, she was bestowed the Gabriela Mistral Award, a distinction given only to fifty outstanding writers from around the world to commemorate the 50th Anniversary of Chilean poet Gabriela Mistral's winning of the Nobel Prize for Literature. In 1996, she won the inaugural Montblanc — NUS Centre for the Arts Literary Award for Poetry in English. Lee's poetry has been read over the BBC (British Broadcasting Corporation) and studied as part of literature courses in Singapore and at universities around the world.

She has a daughter and two grandchildren.

Lee Wee Nam

(李伟南, Li Weinan, 1881–1964)
Banker, business leader, Singapore

Lee Wee Nam was a prominent (some considered him to be the most recognizable) Teochew businessman and community head. He was the chairman and managing director of Sze Hai Tong Banking and Insurance Co., Ltd (renamed Four Seas Bank before its incorporation into OCBC). Lee, alias Eng How, was more commonly addressed as Wee Nam Ia (also spelt as "Yia" in some sources) – Wee Nam Road is the namesake of Mr Lee. "Ia" or "Yia" is an honorary title given to outstanding persons of repute within the Teochew community, specially for Lee's advocacy of his dialect group's interests.

Lee, born in 1881 into a household of modest means in Theng Hai District, Kwangtung province, brought up mainly by his father. He was the second child in the family after his elder brother. His mother had an untimely death when Lee was still very young. His father constructed coffins for a living. When Lee was sixteen years old, he expressed his desire to travel overseas to Singapore for new opportunities.

On arriving in Singapore, with almost no qualifications, training and little schooling completed and no pocket money, he first served as an apprentice in a company called Kong Meng Chay making a humble S$2 per month on-the-job training. He worked hard here for a few years and in return for his hard-working ethics and diligent attitude, he was treated well by his employers who found him an asset to the company. He was also a popular colleague.

Despite the good treatment, business prospects were limited and this convinced him to move to Kuala Lumpur (KL) to work for Lim Song Teng. Lim had spotted Lee's talents in Singapore. But good prospects continued to elude him and he went back to Singapore to assume an important position at the firm, Siam Hong Chan, where his fortune turned.

When Sze Hai Tong Banking and Insurance Co., Ltd (later renamed Four Seas Bank, and now part of OCBC Bank) was founded by prominent Teochew businessmen (including Ng Song Teng, Liaw Chia Heng (also spelt Leow Chia Heng), Na Kim Seng, Yeo Lee Chiang, and Tan Teck Joon), Lee was appointed a broker to the company in 1909 through the referral of Liaw Chia Heng. This was a part-time position, but his performance soon gained him a permanent staff status within the company.

In 1910, Lee was dispatched to Siam (now Thailand) as the manager of its Bangkok office, replacing his own brother. In 1911, he was redeployed back to Singapore as assistant manager of the bank. Lee rose fast in the hierarchy, first as a manager in 1913, before taking over Liaw Chia Heng's position as chairman and managing director in 1932 (a position that lasted more than 20 years).

Other than banking, Lee also ran two remittance firms, Chye Wah Seng and Buan Yak Seng, had his hands in the trading business through his firms, Chye Soon Long and Hai Chua, and Hai Chua Chan in Seremban. The two remittance companies assisted newly-arrived Chinese migrants to send their daily wages back to their hometowns.

Besides being a prominent businessman, Lee was also active in Singapore's Chinese community as the vice-president and then president of the Singapore Chinese Chamber of Commerce between 1927–28 and 1929–30 respectively.

Besides the Chinese business association, he was also president and vice-president of the Teo Chew Point Ip Huay Kwan for eighteen years from 1930–48, and appointed vice-president of the Ngee Ann Kongsi in 1920. Lee was the inaugural President of both the Malayan Teochew Association when it was established in 1933 and of the Kwangtung Hui Kuan in Singapore.

Lee was an activist in the field of education and was instrumental in the establishment of many famous schools in Singapore. He helped establish the Ngee Ann Girls' School (the pioneering all-Chinese girls school) in Singapore and did time on the committees of the Chinese High School and Nan Hwa Girls' School. He was also the president and trustee of Tuan Mong School (1940) and served as a committee member of Su Jin School.

Like many of his contemporaries, Lee was watching events in China closely. He solicited funds for famine victims in Honan, Hunan, and Kangsu in 1929. During China's war of resistance against Japan, Lee served as chairperson of the China Relief Fund (Teochew Section) and assisted to promote Liberty Bonds for China.

Because of his intimate knowledge of Chinese affairs, the Singapore Government invited him to be a member of the Chinese Advisory Board, the Po Leung Kuk, and the St John's Island Visiting Committee.

Because of his pre-war activism on behalf of China, during the Japanese Occupation (1942–45) in Singapore, Lee was imprisoned and tortured by the Japanese who also gave him death threats. But even the Japanese were impressed by his undaunting spirit during the incarceration and eventually set him free.

Lee advocated philanthropy within one's means. Before Lee passed away, he had established the Lee Hiok Kee Pte Ltd in 1963 and moved all his shares to the company, which was then inherited by his sons and grandsons. In 2001, in accordance with Lee's philanthropic tradition, the company donated the sum of S$10 million to the Nanyang Technological University (NTU) for the Lee Wee Nam Endowment Fund in Life Sciences and, in return, the university designated one of its libraries the Lee Wee Nam Library which includes the Lee Wee Nam (LWN) Library Learning Commons facility to encourage group work. The S$10 million donation is on record the biggest non-governmental sum of money given to a local university endowment up till then.

Lee was known for wearing traditional Chinese outfits decorated slightly with gold and jade in his everyday life. He is said to have good posture.

Lee died on 24 January 1964 (83 years old) after battling a drawn-out bout of sickness.

Lee Yee

(李逸, Li Yi, 1952–80)

Famous popular singer, Malaysia

Lee Yee was a representative figure in the Chinese music industry of Malaysia in the 1970s. His real name was Li Jinbiao (李金标) and his ancestral hometown was Putian City of Fujian Province, China. Lee was born in Penang, Malaysia, in 1952. He received his primary education at Shih Chung Branch School (时中分校) and secondary education at Chung Ling High School (钟灵中学). As a student, he loved natural scenery and painting, and started using the pseudonym, Lee Yee, for pen-pal correspondence. After completing his secondary school education, he helped out at his father's shop as a clerk and joined a band called Xuan Feng (旋风) as its singer and drummer. This truly showed his passion for music.

In 1971, at the age of nineteen, singing Ren Sheng Yi Tiao Lu (人生一条路) (The Journey of Life), he emerged as the champion of a regional singing competition in Penang, organized by Radio Televisyen Malaysia (RTM). Within the same year, on 19 September, he became the national champion of the same singing competition with the song Wen Bai Yun (问白云) (Asking The Cloud). Driven by his passion in singing, he undoubtedly let this success become his stepping stone in entering the music scene later. He recorded his debut album Wo Bu Gai Ren Shi Ni (我不该认识你) (I Shouldn't Have Known You) and the second one Bu Ru Gui Qu (不如归去) (It's Better To Return) after joining the Xin Lian (新联) record label. Although the result was not encouraging, Lee Yee's passion towards singing was nevertheless not shaken.

The year 1973 was the turning point in his career as a performer — Lee Yee joined the Li Feng (丽风) record company and in one year, produced six albums which helped establish his reputation and showcase his charm on the music scene. In 1974, he launched seven albums. The lead song in the album, Deng Wo Na Yi Tian (等我那一天) (The Day You Waited For Me), was an outstanding number composed by local talents — the melody by the famed composer, Li Junxiong (李俊雄), and lyrics by Ding Dong (叮咚), an experienced media worker. This was the first success of the combined efforts of the talented trio, dubbed The Iron Triangle (铁三角), who was most popular in the music industry at the time. Striking while the iron was still hot, The Iron Triangle produced the second album, titled Chang Shou Qing Ge Gei Shui Ting (唱首情歌给谁听) (For Whom A Love Song Is Sung). Not only was the lead song of this popular and well known far and wide, it became Lee Yee's representative work. More importantly, the biggest achievement in Lee Yee's life was popularizing songs composed by Malaysian talents. His subsequent albums all featured Malaysian compositions as the lead songs and in almost all of the albums launched, at least one of the local compositions would be popularized by him. This indeed opened a new chapter in the local Chinese song composition scene.

Other than showing a remarkable talent in singing and driving the local song composition scene forward, Lee Yee was also an all-round performer on stage, especially in musicals. He was able to play his role vividly and convincingly, and hence was crowned the "Prince of Musicals". Famous artistes who had performed with Lee Yee in musicals included Deng Lijun (邓丽君) (Teresa Teng), Huang Xiaojun (黄晓君) and You Ya (尤雅) (Yuya). In his life, Lee Yee recorded three musical albums that made him extremely popular, namely Chang Hen Ge (长恨歌) (Song of Endless Sorrow), Long Zheng Hu Dou (龙争虎斗) (Clash of the Titans), and Yun Er Yun Er (云儿云儿) (Cloud O Cloud). The first two featured Lee Yee, Chen Meifeng (陈美凤) and Qiu Qingyun (邱青云).

After his rise to fame, Lee Yee led the Li Feng Troupe (丽风巡迴团) on a tour to all major towns in Malaysia, performing and meeting his fans. He even went to Indonesia, Vietnam, England, and Holland, etc. to perform and achieved unprecedented success. Not only did Lee Yee pave the way for Malaysian artistes to venture abroad and record albums overseas, but he was also acknowledged by all to be the leading male singer of the Chinese community in Malaysia. In all, Lee Yee recorded twenty-four albums and three musical albums during his lifetime.

This number one male singer who took Malaysia by storm in the 1970s sang with all his heart, was full of emotions and deep feelings, as though there was nothing but tender love in his heart. His sentimental and deeply moving voice truly mesmerized and captivated the hearts of many young men and women. In 1975, Lee Yee married Li Hanqiong (李汉琼) (Ting Ting 婷婷). Unfortunately, just as his singing career was reaching another new height, a car accident in Kuala Lumpur on 27 July 1980 claimed Lee Yee's life that had been full of splendour and glamour.

Lembong, Eddie

(Ong Joe San, 汪友山, Wang Youshan, 1936–)
Community leader, social activist, leading pharmacist, Indonesia

Eddie Lembong was a leading pharmacist who became a social activist and community leader after the fall of Soeharto (May 1998). In fact, he was already active in the Pharmaceutical Association during Soeharto's time when he represented the association in dealings with the Indonesian Government.

Lembong was born on 30 September 1936 in Tinombo, Central Sulawesi, Indonesia.

The son of a petty merchant, Lembong is the fifth child in a family of ten siblings. He received his pre-university education in Manado, Sulawesi. After being educated in a Chinese-medium school up to the junior middle level, he went to an Indonesian-medium high school at the senior school level and graduated in 1957, after which he went to Bandung and was accepted by the Department of Pharmacy at ITB, the best technological institute in Indonesia. During his student days, he worked in the ITB pharmacy library. After obtaining a Drs. degree in pharmacy from that institute in 1965, he was appointed a lecturer (1965–67) and became a member of the editorial board of the Suara Farmasi (The Voice of Pharmacy), a journal on pharmacy. At the same time, Lembong worked as a pharmacist at Apotek Abadi in Bandung. About eleven years after obtaining his pharmacy degree, he and his friends established PT Pharos which was later developed into a major pharmaceutical company.

His university education made him a systematic worker and taught him the importance of information and research. During the first phase of the company's development, he founded a fairly well stocked medical (pharmacy) library. He also employed young people as he and his friends shared the notion that young people were capable of making contributions. Since he believed in the merits of "lifelong learning", he continued to upgrade himself in the profession and many of his employees were sent overseas for upgrading or training. His company soon won the recognition of members of the foreign pharmaceutical industry. The British Welcome Foundation entrusted Lembong with the production of Lanoxin, a medicine for heart diseases. When PT Welcome Indonesia was set up, Lembong served as one of the directors. His company was also proud of producing its own local drug for diarrhoea, which is well known in Indonesia.

Lembong was actively involved in professional organizations. He served as secretary general of the Central Federation of Pharmacy Entrepreneurs from 1972–75, and as its deputy chairman from 1975 to 1990. At the same time, he was elected head of the Pharmacy Department of Kadin (Indonesian Chamber of Commerce and Industry, 1978–99). In this capacity, he was given the responsibility of negotiating with the Indonesian Government on pharmaceutical matters. It was reported that he devoted a lot of his time to this and won the recognition of his peers. With increasing concern regarding the deteriorating situation of the ethnic Chinese, Lembong and a number of socially conscious Chinese Indonesian businessmen/businesswomen got themselves involved in Chinese community affairs as soon as President Soeharto was forced to step down. He was one of the founding members of the first social organization, known as PSMTI, with a view to improving the situation of Chinese Indonesians. However, it appears that there was internal conflict within the organization due both to different perceptions and personality, resulting in the departure of Lembong and a number of PSMTI members.

On 5 February 1999 Lembong and seventeen other Chinese Indonesians decided to found another social organization called Perhimpunan Indonesia Keturunan Tionghoa (abbreviated as INTI) and had it registered with the Ministry of Home Affairs. The association was officially established on 10 April 1999 with Lembong serving as the general chairman, Michael Utomo (an executive from a cigarette company) as secretary general, and Kuncoro Wibowo as treasurer. Nancy Widjaja (Ma Yongnan), a social activist and a business woman, was later elected as head of the women's section. Lembong stated that the establishment of this organization was aimed at resolving the so-called Chinese problem (which was a historical legacy) once and for all and, together with the other Indonesian national components, to create a new Indonesian civilization. It stated that the solution of the "Chinese problem" should be brought about by the full participation of all Indonesian citizens of Chinese descent, in the big wave of nation rebuilding in every field. The New Indonesian Nation could be more competitive in the era of globalization, and that Indonesian citizens of Chinese descent would be accepted as a component of the Indonesian Nation in serving the nation. This social organization is not a political party as its members have different ideological persuasions. It is open to any Indonesian citizen who agrees with the Indonesian Constitution.

When INTI was first formed, there were indigenous Indonesians who branded it an "exclusive organization". But Lembong refuted such criticism by saying that he "has lived among the [indigenous] Indonesians for 40 years and is familiar with this kind of view. But this is a stereotype advocated by only a certain sector". He argued that his organization was created for "the benefit of a large number of people and therefore cannot be branded as 'exclusive'".

Under his leadership, many branches of INTI were set up in Java and the Outer Islands. INTI was involved in improving ethnic relations in the country, especially between the ethnic Chinese and the so-called indigenous population; forums were created to facilitate interactions, as well as to help Indonesians who were in need, and those who were victims of natural disasters. In 2006 Lembong was made honorary chairman of the INTI. In order to implement his idea of promoting nation building, he and his wife set up the Yayasan Nabil (Nation Building Foundation), organizing seminars, sponsoring publications, and giving awards to foreign and Indonesian scholars who have made contributions to nation building. Claudine Salmon, a French scholar who has done significant research on the Indonesian Chinese, was the first recipient of the Nabil Award. The Yayasan Nabil was also one of the major associations responsible for the success of making Chinese Indonesian Admiral John Lie alias Jahja Daniel Dharma the "Pahlawan Nasional" (National Hero) in 2009. Prior to this, no ethnic Chinese had been recognized by the Indonesian Government as a national hero in Indonesia.

Lembong is able to communicate with the various Indonesian communities as he was educated both in Chinese and Indonesian schools. More importantly he went to an Indonesian university where the majority were indigenous students, many of whom went on to become the elite. His good command of many languages, especially Indonesian, English, and Dutch, have made it easy for him to move within the Indonesian communities. His working knowledge of the Chinese language also enables him to communicate with the Chinese-speaking community, although he was better known among the Peranakans than the Totoks. In October 2011, his biography entitled Eddie Lembong: Mencintai Tanah Air Sepenuh Hati (Eddie Lembong: Loving the motherland whole-heartedly) was published.

Lembong married Melly Saliman, a graduate of Pah Chung, a Chinese high school in Jakarta, in 1965. They have three sons, who have succeeded him in running his business.

(梁宇皋, Liang Yugao, 1888–1963)
Lawyer, politician, first governor of Melaka, Malaysia

Tun Leong Yew Koh was one of the founder members of the Malaysian Chinese Association in 1949 and its first secretary general. He was a member of Tunku Abdul Rahman's pre-Independence cabinet in 1955. After Independence in 1957, he was appointed the first governor of Melaka, the first and only Chinese to be appointed Governor of a Malaysian state.

Leong was born on 22 August 1888 in Salak North, Perak, the son of Leong Yew Teen, a wealthy tin miner who was credited with the development of the town. He was sent to Canton, China, for his early education but returned in 1901 at the age of thirteen to continue his English studies at the Anglo-Chinese School in Ipoh, and later at St Xavier's Institution in Penang. He won the Queen's Scholarship in 1908 and studied law in London, graduating with an LLB from University College and Inner Temple in 1912. Later he studied political science and economics at the London School of Economics and obtained his B.Sc. (Econ) in 1914. He was called to the Bar in 1921, and practised as an advocate and solicitor in Ipoh.

Together with Subbiah Naidu Veerasamy, a Kuala Lumpur lawyer and a partner of the firm of Messrs. Sanders and Co, and later the first Indian member of the Federal Council in 1928, he started the firm of Veerasamy and Yew Koh in Ipoh. He was for some time a member of the Federated Malay States Bar Committee.

The firm of Veerasamy and Yew Koh was dissolved in 1929 when Veerasamy became increasingly busy with his political work, and Leong went to work in China. He left Malaya in December 1929 and was admitted to the Supreme Court in Hong Kong the following year. In May 1930, Yew Koh came back to Ipoh and joined the legal practice of his cousin, Chan Kye Choo.

In 1932 he returned to China and served the Chinese Government in various capacities — as counsellor of the Ministry of Railway's legal adviser to the Executive Yuen; member of the Overseas Affairs Commission; adviser to the Treaty Commission of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and inspector of consulates, in which capacity he inspected the Chinese consulates in the Philippines, the Netherlands East Indies, Malaya, and South Africa in 1935. From 1935–37 he was senior Chinese commissioner in the Sino-British Joint Boundary Commission for the Investigation of the Southern Section of the Undelimited Yunnan-Burma Boundary. The following year he became counsellor to Ambassador Chen Kung Po, the Chinese emissary to Rome. Subsequently he left the central government to join the Yunnan provincial government as development commissioner of the Second Frontier District of Yunnan, and conjointly, magistrate of the

During the Second World War, he served as director of the Fuhai Office of the Kunming Military Headquarters, with the rank of colonel, in which capacity he exchanged intelligence with the British political officer in Loimwe Kengtung, Burma. In 1941, he resigned all civil appointments to join the First Detachment of the Chinese Expeditionary Force to Burma under Major General Liu Kuan Lung, as adviser. Later he served in the headquarters of the 93rd Division and the 6th Army, doing liaison work between the British and Chinese Forces in Burma.

After the war, Leong returned to Ipoh and resumed his law practice. In 1948 he was appointed a member of the Federal Legislative Council, representing the constituency of Ipoh and Menglembu. He was also appointed to the Consultative Committee on Constitutional Proposals for Malaya.

Then in 1949, he was one of the founder members of the Malayan Chinese Association (MCA) — later, the Malaysian Chinese Association — serving as its first secretary general from 1952 to 1957; and a member of the Central Liaison Committee. He played an important role in the formation of the Alliance, the union of the three political parties of UMNO (United Malays National Organisation), MCA, and MIC (Malaysian Indian Congress). Between 1953 and 1957, he was present in many committees to prepare a federal election manifesto for the general elections of 1955. It was Leong who helped to prepare the section in the election manifesto on economic aid to the Malays.
